The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

A PETITION FOR STATE SECULARIZATION.

To the Honorable Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress:

A republican form of government being based on liberty, equality, and fraternity, as both means and end, involves the separation of Church and State, whose union is the worst form of class-legislation and the most infallible sign of arbitrary power. A house divided against itself cannot stand. The institutions of this Commonwealth should be made homogeneous throughout. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of truth in whatever direction. Any infringement by government of this absolute equality of its citizens is the parent of manifold evil, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, this government was founded to "establish."

And yet, though the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," there does exist a union of Church and State, which gives to Christianity moral and material aid, and so proscribes other religions and forms of belief and unbelief, while taxing these also for the support of that special religion.

The ways in which this old alliance between Church and State still survives among us are:

1. Recognition of God and Christianity in State Constitutions.
2. Exemption of Church property from taxation.
3. Appropriations of public money for sectarian purposes.
4. Religious exercises, as the reading of the Bible, etc., in the public schools.
5. Laws enforcing the observance of the Sabbath on the authority of the Bible.
6. Religious test-oaths in courts of justice and on instalment into office.
7. Chaplaincies in the Legislature, the Army, and the Navy.
8. Fast and Thanksgiving Proclamations, which contain theological ideas that may or may not be acceptable to the citizen.
9. The vague and indeterminate sense in which the words civil and sac red are used when applied to the marriage contract; and the appeal to God or the Holy Scriptures by some of the states, as the final authority on marriage.
10. Making morality subject to church dogma, by describing it as Christian, instead of natural, morality.
11. The license rather than liberty given to religion by the first amendment to the United States Constitution, by forbidding Congress to make any law "prohibiting the free exercise thereof," which means, really, "the free exercise" of whatever anyone chooses to call "religion."

The necessity for this separation of Church and State is more apparent now than ever before, because of the still greater diversity of religious beliefs, the many forms of dissent from the religion which receives State patronage, and the growing signs of sectarian strife and ambition in the arena of politics. And emphasis needs to be given to the fact that the union of Church and State is a great hindrance to the employment of right methods in dealing with many questions of reform now demanding attention. And most essential is it at all times, and especially in the present, in order to secure for the law its due respect and observance, that the people's representatives should exhibit the strictest fidelity to their trusts by following the law in its letter and spirit.

Your petitioners, therefore, pray that immediate action be taken by the law-making power to bring into harmony the theory and practice of our government in making the following principle a part of the fundamental law of the land by amendment to the United States Constitution:

The total separation of Church and State, by prohibiting Congress or any State, County, Municipality, or Township from enacting any law that infringes the rights of conscience, or favors any practices in the name of religion, or of aught else, that interfere with private right or the public welfare.

Odds and Ends.

A CHINAMAN was baptized in Connecticut the other day, and thus one more case of water "cuer" is furnished.

"I SAY, Jim, do you know the difference between a fish and a woman?" "Not perzactly. What is the difference?" "There is no difference; they is just the same. If you drop a line to either you are apt to get them on the string."

A CLERGYMAN who holds very radical views on the divorce question made a funny slip the other day when he added a word to the usual formula, and said to the man, "Keep yourself only unto her as long as you both shall liv together."

THE absent-minded paragrapher, who was thinking about the Missouri State Convention, and the murder of a Chicago minister's wife by her husband, made the paragraph read: "A Chicago man shoots his wife on the first ballot, and is nominated by acclamation."

HOW differently the same sentiment sounds when put in another way. The story is told of a teacher who was reviewing her class in the last words of great men, and asked a little girl: "What were the last words of Webster?" expecting the answer, "I still liv." To her amazement a little girl called out, "I ain't dead yet."

"MY dear, look below," said a Harlem man, just as he stood on the bridge with his wife and gazed at a tug hauling a line of barges. "Such is life—the tug is like a man, working and toiling, while the barges are like women,—" "I know," interrupted Mrs. G., acridly, "the tug does all the blowing, and the barges bear all the burdens."

"DAUGHTER, why do you weep?" "Oh, mother! My heart is nearly broken!" "Speak out, dear child, and tell me the cause. Has he decieved you?" "Oh, no! Worse, worse than that. At church yesterday I saw everyone looking at May Carter's new dress and bonnet, and I didn't notice a single one looking at mine." "Oh, well, dear, you shouldn't mind that. If she had a finer dress and bonnet than you, and the congregation admired hers the most, of course God was on your side, for he is always the friend of the oppressed." "Oh—oh—I—I—know! But God isn't—isn't fashionable. Boo-hoo!"

"MR. B.," said the president of a bank to his cashier, "I understand you hav sold your trotting horses?" "Yes, sir," replied Mr. B., uneasily; "I found the luxury too expensiv." "And you declined an invitation to a champagne party the other evening." "Yes, sir." The cashier was getting white now. "And I also learn that you hav taken a class in Sunday-school, and hav become a member of the church choir?" "Oh, sir!" exclaimed the frightened man, "the amount is less than $10,000, and if you will giv two days' time I will restore every cent." But the president was inexorable.

THE HUNTERS AFTER THE UNKNOWABLE.

Across the moorlands of the Not
We chase the gruesome When,
And hunt the Itness of the What
Through forests of the Then.

Into the inner consciousness
We track the crafty Where;
We spear the Ergo tough, and beard
The Ego in his lair.

With lassoes of the brain we catch
The Isness of the Was,
And in the copses of the Whence
We hear the Think-bees buzz.

We climb the slippery Which-bark tree
To watch the Thusness roll,
And pause betimes in gnostic rhymes
To woo the Over-Soul.

THE minister called at the house of Mr. Snagwell the other day. "You are very comfortably situated," said he to the Christian wife and mother. "Your little place is almost self-sustaining, but, sister, where are all of your chickens? When last here I noticed flocks of them in the yard." "Yes," replied the Christian lady, "we raised a great many but they became so troublesome to our neighbors that, rather than giv offense, we sold them." "Very considerate, I am sure." "Oh, I cannot bear to be looked upon as an imposition, and—" "Ma!" called young Snagwell. "Yes, son." "Did you sell the chickens 'cause they was trouble?" "Yes, son; run along, now." "No, you didn't, 'cause I heard you tell pap that the chickens all had the cholera, an' that he'd better take 'em down an' sell 'em before they all died." The good lady imagined that the minister was not so cordial when he took his leave, and, shortly afterward, the boy had reason to believe that the mercury had gained an altitude of several inches.

THE MAN ON THE FENCE.

Oh, I am the man on the fence;
No mortal can drive me from thence,
I sit at my ease,
And I think as I please,
With an easy indifference.

It is quiet and cool on the fence;
The shadows are charmingly dense,
I climb to my seat,
And wait for the heat,
And hurrah for the fight to commence.

I hav prosperous times on the fence;
I am free from all care and expense,
I will not voluntari-
Ly contribute nary
A shadow of dollars or cents.

I can see all my friends from the fence,
For the crowd on each side is immense;
And this way and that
I keep doffing my hat,
With a heartiness simply intense.

But I'm bothered somewhat on the fence;
For the parties hav both left their tents,
And they wind in and out
And turn round about
Till I don't know just where is the fence.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Duke of Argyll estimates the age of the world to be ten million years.

"FIRST come the missionaries, then the consuls, and after them the armies," said King Theodore of Abyssinia some years ago to a French traveler, explaining his abhorrence of explorers and missionaries.

JAMES GORMLEY dropped dead at a church fair at Letauket, Suffolk county, New York, after eating nearly two quarts of ice cream. A case of death from eating too many oysters at a church fair is yet to be heard of.

A SAN FRANCISCO girl's claim to distinction rests upon the fact that, at a church fair, she stood on her head in the guise of a gypsy boy acrobat. She had a tent to herself, and each spectator of the feat was compelled to pay a dollar.

THERE is an unfortunate pastor in Montgomery county, says the Rochester Union, who for the year past has received only $15 by way of salary, and but for the charity of neighbors would hav starved. He has a wife and two children.

DR. G. L. BEARDSLEY reiterates the belief of many scientific men that death is usually quite painless, so far as physical sensation is concerned, and he is also of the opinion that mental numbness, or a feeling of sinking into rest, frees the mind of fear.

A CLERGYMAN named Hoyle was so indiscreet as to register his name at one of the Baltimore hotels. Within half an hour afterward no fewer than forty-nine anxious inquirers sent up their cards to his room begging to be informed if a flush royal couldn't get away with four aces.

THE pastor of a colored church in St. Louis bought an $18 Bible for his pulpit on the instalment plan, but never paid more than the first dollar on it. On a recent Sunday the agent of the firm which had sold the book seized and made off with it, in spite of the pastor's resistance.

THE cause of woman is looking up, even in India. There is now in that country a lady editor to one of the most popular vernacular journals, and there has been established at Calcutta a Zenana library, for the purpose of meeting the demand for healthy reading for the educated young women of India.

"IN the wine-producing regions of France and Germany, where people drink wine with their food as freely as we do tea or coffee, there are hardly any drunkards." Says a temperance writer, "Let us hav good cheap wine, and the cry for temperance will be ended when the present race of drunkards has passed away." A better way would be to giv up the use of stimulants altogether."

A WISCONSIN man of habitual profanity has been speechless since, as he writes out the account, he uttered some particularly blasphemous words while angered by a refractory horse. He thinks that he was smitten down as a punishment, and will never be able again to speak. Others believe that he fell in a drunken sleep, and dreamed so vividly that his brain was turned by it, his incapacity being imaginary.

THE Christian Advocate publishes an editorial headed "Freethinkers." All that the editor has to say about Freethinkers is that "their convention has been held." The remainder of the article is devoted to an endeavor to show that Christians (except Catholics) are themselvs Freethinkers. To borrow a popular phrase, THE TRUTH SEEKER extends to the Advocate assurances of its distinguished consideration.

IT is a strange and pathetic spectacle which Naples presents of crowds of devotees seeking to allay the ravages of cholera by religious processions, and policemen dispersing the processions under the direction of the sanitary authorities. Thus even in the face of death, which all in common are seeking to avoid, men will still be at cross purposes.—Sun. This is another way of saying that religion and common sense are bound to conflict.

A PAMPHLET issued by the New York Sabbath Committee estimates that no less than 250,000 persons are required to violate the Sabbath in connection with the running of the railways of the country on Sunday, and that one-half of this number are professed Christians and church-members, who thus, from fear of losing their places, violate their consciences and the laws of the church to which they profess allegiance.

A VILLAGE pastor at Warrensburg, N. Y., has withdrawn from the Good Templars Lodge, because it would not receive his wife also as a member. An elderly lady member gave as a reason for voting against her that she had been seen sitting in a hammock with a certain young clergyman. Other charges and counter charges were made, several members of both sexes were accused of improper behavior, and the lodge broke up in confusion.

DR. PHILLIP SCHAFF says that "the Christian world embraces three great divisions—Greek, Roman, and Protestant. As to numbers, the Roman Catholic church is the largest (over 200,000,000), and nearly equals the two others combined; the Greek church is the smallest (between 80,000,000 and 90,000,000); the Protestant (over 100,000,000) is the most progressiv in all new countries, where the Teutonic race and the English language prevail." This estimate givs a total Christian population of 380,000,000, or at most 390,000,000, against 1,056,000,000 who are not Christians.

THE numerous men of science assembled in Philadelphia were canvassed by reporters to learn their views as to the asserted conflict between science and religion. The Christian believers with one voice testified that not only was their faith unshaken, but that it was strengthened by inquiries into the methods by which the creator has seen fit to work. On the other hand, the unbelievers were united in the assertion that science was directly antagonistic to Christianity, and some insinuated that their Christian associates, being mostly connected with colleges, were afraid to say what they thought.

THE River Jordan was formerly accredited with miraculous healing powers bestowed upon it by the god Jehovah of the Jews. Naaman, it is related, found it efficacious for the cure of leprosy, and pilgrims from all parts of the world continue to bathe in its waters. Medical men now pronounce it unrivaled as a tonic, but attribute its strengthening qualities to the rapidity of its current, which runs like a mill-race, the river falling 3,000 feet in 136 miles. Religious people will be inclined to regard the stream with less reverence when they learn that science has placed it on a level, medicinally, with a watercure establishment.

THE people of Great Britain hav a plenty of that unfortunate class whom "you hav always with you." The London Chronicle says: "The official return, made up to June 24th, shows that in the week ending on that date there were 689,629 paupers in England and Wales, exclusiv of lunatic paupers and vagrants. This was nearly 2,000 less than for the previous week. For the corresponding periods of 1883 and 1882 respectivly, however, the numbers were 694,036 and 701,598. The total for the last week of the midsummer quarter for 1884, therefore, showed a decrease of 0.6 per cent compared with that of the corresponding week for 1883, and of 1.7 per cent compared with the return for the last week of the midsummer quarter of 1882."

THE priests of Russia are of course on the side of the czar as against the people. John Swinton's Paper tells the following story: "In a certain Russian village there was a certain Russian priest whose hatred of Nihilism rose to a mania. To show his zeal in the czar's service, he denounced the blacksmith of the village to the authorities as a Nihilist. The blacksmith was arrested, and condemned without trial to Siberia. By some means he managed to escape, made his way to a seaport, and thence to New York. The blacksmith did not forget the aforesaid priest, and hit upon a plan to punish him for his crime. He got hold of an old copy of the Nihilist periodical Narodnaya Volna, put it up carefully in an envelope, addressed it to his old enemy, and got it taken across seas by a traveling friend, who mailed it from Vienna to the priest. The envelope was, of course, opened by the Russian post-office spies, who gloated over the finding of a first-class prize. In the mean time, the priest himself had somehow been brought under suspicion of Nihilism; and the spies saw the chance to fasten it on him. They resealed the envelope, mailed it to his address, and sent orders that watch be kept upon him as to how he disposed of it. It was duly delivered to the priest, who took it to his home, opened it, looked at it, was startled, and was just about to rush out with it to the police, when a couple of friends chanced to make him a call. He locked the door and showed it to them; he read a few lines of it; they were interested. Then the police broke in his door. He was caught in the act of propagating Nihilism among his two friends, one of whom was a spy. He was seized and dragged to police quarters. The proof against him was complete; he had received a clandestin Nihilist document, and attempted to circulate its doctrins. He protested his innocence, threw himself on his knees, and roared in despair; but all this was taken as proof of his guilt, and confirmation of the rumors that had been set afloat about him. He was thrown into prison; his sentence speedily fell upon his head; the case was carried to the police administration at St. Petersburg; he was condemned to hard labor in the mines of Siberia; he was put into the next chain-gang for Siberia, and by this time he is far on his way there."

SEVERAL months ago the Rev. James Woodrow, Ph. D., D.D., LL.D., President of and Perkins Professor of Natural Science in Connection with Revelation in the Theological Seminary of the Southern Presbyterian church in Columbia, S. C., delivered an address before the Alumni Association of that institution upon the subject of evolution. Dr. Woodrow assumed advanced ground on this subject and became the proponent of certain theories which, it has been alleged by those who differ with him, are of Darwinian and Spencerian complexion and Materialistic tendencies. With one exception the entire Presbyterian press of the country condemns the learned professor, and the Southern church has been in a great quandary as to what action to take in the premises. At a session of the board of trustees of the seminary a paper was introduced strongly commending Dr. Woodrow, and indorsing nearly all the positions taken by him in the address on evolution. A substitute was offered which enjoined upon Dr. Woodrow to cease teaching in the seminary the doctrin that evolution is God's plan of creation, and that the body of Adam was probably evolved from a beast. This substitution was voted down, and another adopted indorsing the address so far as it set forth the doctrins of natural science, but condemning evolution as inconsistent with perfect soundness of faith. The minority then entered their protest against the action of the board in refusing to enjoin on Professor Woodrow not to teach that evolution is God's plan of creation, and that the body of Adam was probably evolved from the lower animals. Among the reasons given are that belief in evolution changes the interpretation of many passages of scripture from that now received by the church; that the view that the body of Adam was evolved from lower animals and not formed by a supernatural act of God is dangerous and hurtful; that the theory that Adam's body was formed by the natural law of evolution while Eve's was created by a supernatural act of God is contrary to our confession of faith, as that confession of faith has been and is interpreted by our church; and that the advocacy of views which hav no authority from the word of God, which tend to unsettle the received interpretation of many passages of scripture, and to destroy the confidence of the church in her doctrinal standards and may rend our church, ought not to be allowed. The synods of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, will take the matter up later on. In the mean time Professor Woodrow holds the fort, while evolutionists look on with considerable amusement.

News of the Week.

LAST Saturday was the Hebrew New Year, being the first day of the year 5889, or thereabouts, reckoning from the creation.

THE cholera epidemic which has been ravaging Italy has abated to some extent. Some new cases of the disease are reported in southern France.

SEVEN persons convicted were publicly whipped last Saturday in Wilmington, Del., one of whom also underwent the antiquated ordeal of the pillory.

A NAVAL court of inquiry has decided that the blame for the sinking of the United States steamer Tallapoosa rests with the master of the schooner with which she came in collision. The navy department approves the finding of the court.

THE Rev. Thomas Bacon, of the Dwight Congregational church, in New Haven, has raised dissension among his congregation by declaring for Cleveland. Dissatisfied members hint to him that political discussions are out of place in the pulpit.

IT is reported that the process of boycotting adopted against the New York Tribune by the printer's union has brought that journal to terms, and that it has become a union paper. The concession has been brought about, probably, more by political than financial pressure, the Central Labor Union having declared against Blaine.

A POLITICAL party called the American Political Alliance has nominated Capt. W. T. Ellsworth, of Pennsylvania, and Charles Waterman, of New York, for president and vice-president of the United States. The platform proposes suffrage for American-born women, and a residence of twenty-one years to enable a foreigner to vote.

AN earthquake shock on the 19th was felt in Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, and Canada. Glass was broken and clocks thrown down in parts of Michigan. A Methodist conference was in session at Toledo, Ohio, the members of which adjourned in much consternation, without waiting for any motion except that caused by the shock.

MR. KEELY, of motor fame, has applied his etheric vapor to the firing of guns. Experiments with the mysterious force were made on the 20th under the supervision of United States officers at Fort Hamilton, in New York Harbor. Force nearly equal to that of gunpowder was developed. Gen. Hamilton announced himself satisfied that Mr. Keely had made a great discovery.

JERRY MCAULEY, the revivalist, of this city, was buried last Sunday. Mr. McAuley was not formerly an ornament to society, having been a river thief and an inmate of the state prison for a term of years, from which he was graduated as an exhorter. He produced numerous conversions among the class with which he had associated previous to his enforced retirement. His funeral was numerously attended.

MISS LIZZIE MAYER, of East Orange, N. J., who has been sick for four years, now announces herself cured by the effect of prayer. Just what the disease was she is unable to state, but doctors hav variously attributed her illness to malaria, congestion of the stomach, bad liver, consumption, and diabetes. This variety of ailments excites the suspicion that not much was the matter with Miss Mayer anyway, and that her disease was of the same character as her cure—imaginary.

THE lot of a Salvation soldier is not without its vicissitudes. Lucy Johnston, known as "Singing Lucy," a member of the Salvation Army of Albany, N. Y., while entering the Army's hall one night last week, after a parade, was struck on the head with a stone or billy, and knocked senseless. The next day she was in a precarious condition. Her home is in Brooklyn, and she joined the Army four months ago against the opposition of her parents. She is a vocalist of considerable ability.

Rationalism and Catholicism.*

Where the currents of human thought and destiny are now drifting to, the wisest of us cannot determin with any degree of precision. We search in vain for a precedent to the form and pressure of the present age over all the past annals of the world. It may be that history repeats itself; but we hav now reached a juncture of social, political, moral, and intellectual forces which we look for in vain back through the dim corridors of time; and how history is to repeat itself speculation is overwhelmed in the attempt to decide, and vaticination is dumb.

Never in that tract of the world nominally Christian did aggressiv and defiant "Infidelity" close and grapple with the minions of the cross as she does to-day; and never since the Reformation era did the scarlet woman flaunt her skirts so proudly in the great cities of both the Eastern and Western Hemispheres. Protestantism has no geographical area that she did not win by the zealous fanaticism of her first rush. The Protestant countries of the sixteenth century are the Protestant countries of to-day, and no new ones hav been added thereto. Nay, and the old ones are rent and riven; and the seed sown by Luther and Spalatin, by Huss and Calvin, by Wycliffe and Sawtree, by Knox and Melville, has grown up almost choked with Romish weeds and Rational tares. The mentation and the aspiration of the fifteenth century were not identical with those that actuate the nineteenth. The floods of human folly hav worn other channels, the currents of human tendency hav torn their way through other rocks and over other shoals. The old battle-fields are deserted, and only through the mists of departed time we can descry them, with their rank grasses, broken and shapeless weapons, half-obliterated trenches, and dull mounds marking more or less dishonored graves. The battalions hav reeled and surged into other fields, and there, with other weapons and with other battle-cries, the often-changing but never-ending tide of human conflict ebbs and flows. Guns are yet planted on the roof, and there is a rattle and blaze of musketry from the windows of the old half-way house between Rome and Rationalism; but the shot and shell fall wide of the mark. Formerly, the old house was in the center of operations; now it is on the extreme left flank, and miles away the real conflict rages. The half-way house is tottering to its fall. The emergency to meet which it was built has passed away. Its giants are dead, its heroes are no more; its prestige is over, and "Ichabod" is inscribed over its gateway. A shabby despotism, three centuries ago, it modified a terrible despotism, and thereby justified its existence; but now, Why cumbereth it the ground? Hardly taking it into account in military strategy, up on the side of the windy hill the banners wave and the troops are ranking, the forces of Rationalism and Rome, and with them and no other rests the balance between victory and defeat in the Armageddon of these latter ages.

Everywhere now ecclesiasticism howls against "the spread of Infidelity," and everywhere Romanism is activ, from New York to Birmingham. In the latter town, the other day, a church dedicated to St. Anne was opened by his eminence, Cardinal Manning, with all the august ceremonial of pontifical high mass. In his subtle and able dedicatory address, his eminence is reported to hav said: "They believed all that God had revealed, unwritten and written, the old divine traditions of the church from the beginning—every jot and every tittle. But why did they believe this? The 'word' in the text did not mean the book, and they who would draw their Christianity out of the written scripture had proved for centuries the inefficiency of that rule of faith by the multitudinous contradictions and ever-increasing diversity of the interpretation that had been put upon that word. Without divine certainty they could not hav divine faith, and, therefore, the wisest human critic could giv him no definit certainty of the meaning of the holy scripture; the most learned scientific historian could not fix for him the meaning of the word of God. No one, however pious or good; no minister of religion or priest of the church, apart from the divine authority of the church itself, could venture to interpret that written word by his own light or his own discernment."

I am a soldier in the ranks of those who would face untold fatigue and peril to flesh their blades in the heart of Rome; but I heartily indorse the utterance of his eminence in regard to "the wisest human critic" being unable to express any "definit certainty of the meaning of the holy scripture." So far, I, a Rationalist, am in exact accord with a Romish cardinal. But when the learned cardinal proceeds to say that, although the esoterics of holy writ are too deep for human learning, too mystical for human wisdom, they can be infallibly interpreted by "the divine authority of the church itself," I join issue with him, and oppose him foot to foot and hilt to hilt. I positivly and emphatically deny that the church has, in the past, shown that it could interpret scripture more successfully than the mere "human critic" could. Nay, my lord cardinal, I will refer you to only one example—e. g., of how your church interpreted a certain scripture passage; but the example I will giv is such a striking, picturesque, and conclusiv one as should be able to explode forever your church's monstrous pretensions to divinely inspired hermeneutics. It is unfortunate, your eminence, for you and. yours that our more modern times hav laid the intellectual wealth of the world's yesterday at the feet of men who hav neither post nor pension from your church. It is unfortunate for you and yours that there are men of my type, who will read and study for many years in obscurity, anxious only to find out what is true, and never once asking what is profitable; studying for no profession, hoping for no preferment; poor, but aspiring to no gain, no crosier, no cardinal's hat; but freely giving learning and time and life to the most thankless of all causes—to a cause that for independence givs you poverty, for celebrity givs you infamy. What a pity you hav not still your Index Expurgatorius to prevent such as I from misusing the best years of their life in toiling over volumes the perusal of which can only be inimical to your hierarchy! How lamentable that you cannot now arrest pens like mine by giving those who wield them a twinge of the thumbscrew, or make the blazing fagots at the stake reduce the hand of the writer to ashes! Like its God, your church is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. Among the calcined bones of the mighty you would honor me by mingling those of this humble Scottish heretic and rebel, but that Protestantism held you at bay till the party that I in some imperfect way represent grew strong; and now an enemy infinitly more terrible than Protestantism confronts you.

Your church, my lord cardinal, has alone the true interpretation of holy scripture, has it? We shall see. You should hav ceased to make such assertions when it became possible for men like me to unearth and decipher the works of such writers as Glaber, Abbo of Fleury, Gennadius, and Corodi. You will, no doubt, my lord cardinal, hav heard of the Millenarian insanity of the tenth century, although you would undoubtedly that such as I had never heard of it. How excellently the "divine authority of the church" interpreted Rev. xx, 2, 3! The binding of Satan for a thousand years your church alleged began at the birth of Christ; so, of course, at the expiring of a thousand years from that date, Satan was to be let loose, and unutterable calamity, if not absolute annihilation, be visited upon the world. In the tenth century your church was in full swing, with its divine interpretations and all the rest of its monstrous jugglery; and not even one solitary bark of a heretic dog resounded through the caverns of your ecclesiastical Avernus. You had, or your own annalists belie you, a perfect plethora of dirt and piety and plague and pestilence. Like rotten sheep, your ignorant and filthy dupes died off in tens of thousands; while the half-naked, vermin-eaten, and nasty—but ignorant and holy—survivors crowded into your abbeys and churches and implored God to hav mercy upon them; but he would not. You showed them relics, and they wanted a bath; you treated them to the mass, and they wanted soap; you incited them to godliness, and they wanted cleanliness. So much attention was given to dying and to seeking the kingdom of God that the wheat and corn and barley remained unsown, or was allowed to be destroyed by blight and mildew; and the survivors of the plague for wild roots had to burrow in the ground like pigs, eat rats and other vermin, and regale themselvs upon diseased human flesh from the corpses of their plague-stricken dead.

In this state of affairs what did your divine and scripture-interpreting church do? What wine, and oil, and bread, and consolation did it giv to the scared and famished remnant plague and pestilence had left? Your holy Bernhardt of Thuringia turned to the twentieth chapter of Revelation and preached the immediate end of the world. As the clock struck midnight on December 31, 1000, the devil would break his chains, and, with blood, and fire, and misery, make a prelude to the day of judgment. The clergy of your church took up the cry of Bernhardt. It was howled from every abbey; it was thundered from every cathedral; and frantic monks, with cope, and stole, and cord, appealed in town, and village, and hamlet to a still more frantic populace. Portent and miracle, wraith and apparition, dark shadows on earth, and blood-red signs in heaven, bore evidence to the near advent of the day of doom. Europe was all but ruined, but what mattered that; your "divine church" was enriched. Kings and nobles rushed to the sanctuary to endow it with lands and wealth which they had won by carnage and fire. With the sword they had gained place and power by doing the work of the devil, and now they devoted all to the service of God, since they should hav to part with everything, anyhow, by the time the clock struck twelve, ringing the death-knell of the millennium and ushering in the end of the world. Kings and nobles, whose pastime was slaughter as regarded men, and lust as regarded women, in spite of the dominance of the church, grew suddenly penitent, and flung away the sword for the missal, and abandoned the couch of the voluptuary for the monk's shirt of hair. William of the Long Sword, Duke of Normandy, was fain to abandon his ducal rank and take shelter in the monkish cell. Hugh, Duke of Burgundy, was anxious to throw up all to find shelter in the monastery against the terrors of the day of doom; and Hugh, Count of Arls, was like-minded. The Emperor Henry II., crownless and unkinged, presented himself at the abbey gate of St. Vanne, howling piously from the Psalms: "This shall be my rest forever; here will I dwell, for I hav a delight therein." Numbers of nobles left lands, and castles, and all to the church, and hastened to the Holy Land, bare-footed, ragged, and penniless, in the cunningly church-inspired hope that those who, at the crack of doom, were found in the sainted clime in which the redeemer had died, would hav certain immunities from the horrors and terrors about to be wreaked upon the rest of the human race. Others stubbornly and desperately remained in their doomed castles, and on their estates, left to barrenness and weeds, and did not impiously attempt to propitiate the vengeance of God. But the altars were loaded with, and the church floors strewn with, legal instruments, venerable parchment, and dusty vellum, representing gifts to the church of some of the noblest estates in Europe, and thousands upon thousands of serfs and vassals. The church took them all, just as if the day of judgment had not been so close at hand. The monks, Cardinal Manning, were themselvs the conveyancers, and the deeds of conveyance began with the stereotyped words: "Seeing that the end of the world is now approaching, and that every day accumulates fresh miseries, I, Baron ——, for the good of my soul, giv to the monastery of ——," etc. The last day of the world was the harvest day of the church, and the twentieth chapter of Revelation was, for the time being, worth more than all the remainder of the book of God. And gloriously your church interpreted it, my lord cardinal, in the interests of your order. The nobles you had under your thumb by this divine gift the church has for putting the correct meaning upon scripture texts; and, as for the common people, they forgot all the instincts of human nature in their abject terror. They wallowed in ignorance, filth, and vermin, intense fear leading to an involuntary relaxation of the sphincters. An eclipse of the sun became visible to the Emperor Otho's army on their march. They at once recognized in it one of the apocalyptic "signs in the sun." They were paralyzed with fear. They dropped their weapons, broke their ranks, and such of the screaming and disorganized rabble as terror did not render motionless fled to the hills, literally calling to the rocks to hide them, and the hills to fall upon them.

On dragged the awful weeks, coming nearer and still nearer to the instant when heaven and earth should pass away. At length, in the end of the most terrible December the world has ever seen, came the last week of the year A.D. 1000. Then there was such agonizing suspense, such paralyzing fear, and such abandoned frenzy as never before or since has cursed such masses of the race of man. Your church, my lord cardinal, had indeed vindicated its claim to be "the divine interpreter of scripture." You took up the twentieth chapter of Revelation, and by your interpretation thereof exalted the hierarchy and well-nigh ruined the world. During this terrible week the work of the world was utterly suspended. For the ring of the anvil there was the yell of the maniac; for the whirr of the shuttle there was the shriek of the madman. Drearily rose the sun, and drearily set in the last few wintry days before his light was to be extinguished forever. Men held their very breath in terror. Blanched white were the dark-brown locks that so lately shaded the smooth and open brow of youth. In the halls of luxury, where the arras was of the richest, where the patines were of gold, and where the air was heavy with odors, now lay the dead and dying commingled, no sexton to bury, and no thief to steal the vessels of gold; and where the air was heavy with odors were now the filth of the living and the putrescence of the dead. Beauty was beautiful no longer, heroism was extinct, and valor was extinguished. The deer and the boar roamed in the greenwood unscathed. No household fires were lighted to shed a warmth through the wintry air. The wine cask was unbroached, and meals were no longer prepared. Men, women, and children, of all ranks and classes, lay huddled together, clutching each other convulsivly in imminent expectation of the crashing of chains that would herald the release of Satan and of the trumpet blast that should signal the end of the world. Love was banished, hate was forgotten, and terror was master of all. The thread upon the distaff remained unwound, and the sword lay rusting on the floor. Revelation xx, 3, 4, had conquered. Your divine interpreting church, Cardinal Manning, had driven Europe frantic that her riches might be purloined as she lay in delirium.

All vocations were dead, save that of the priest. With husky voice, haggard mien, and supernatural wildness of gesticulation the monk harangued in the market-place, and around him surged all that terror and death had spared. Nearer, nearer, and nearer came the end of the year, till only a few hours intervened between mankind and the day of judgment. Then the remnant of human beings crushed into the churches till they were filled to suffocation. Thousands clamored in vain for admission at the gate of convent, cathedral, and abbey. Resolved that it would be better for their souls should they perish among the ruins of the house of God, they who could not obtain admission scrambled up to the roof, and mingled their chants and wails with the roll of the organ which ascended from within. Midnight on the 31st of December was the utmost limit given for the release of Satan; but it was held that the release might take place an hour or two before night's solemn noon. The great candles of the cathedral shone under groined arch and by fluted column over the pale and upturned faces of a convulsed and motley multitude. There were no clocks, but, at regular intervals, on the great candles metal balls were fixed by inflammable strings, and as, hour after hour, the flame reached each string in succession, the ball fell into a basin-shaped gong below, with a clang that, in the breathless suspense which waited upon the burning of each string, resounded to the loftiest turret, and reverberated among the graves under the flagstones in the aisle. One by one, an eternity of suspense between them, fell the balls into the gong, and yet the end of the world did not come, and the winter morning dawned of the 1st of January, in the year 1001. The holy Catholic church had indeed interpreted the scripture—interpreted it to replenish her own coffers and augment her own power. The world slowly slunk back into its old work-a-days; but without taking pains to resent its having been duped and hoaxed by the unscrupulous cunning of Rome. Shame, my lord cardinal! Remember, you are not addressing the illiterate vassalage of the Dark Ages. Your words reach those who can criticise them without favor and reject them without fear. When you would speak of your church being the only divine interpreter of scripture, remember the twentieth chapter of Revelation and the year 1000 A.D., and be forever dumb.

Nay, my lord cardinal, the pretensions of your church are going the way of all the earth. You yet manage to hobble along on two crutches—the mental apathy and moral credulity of mankind. But the earth swings round, and the gnome casts another shadow upon the dial of time. A race arises that cares neither for your book nor your infallible interpretation thereof. Address, if you will, the present-day spawn of the bats and owls of medievalism; but the beams of the true sun of righteousness hav now broken through the gloom of your censer smoke and your windows, dim with the effigies of saints. The perdition which has overtaken Zeus and Isis is overtaking you. Untold opulence, the romance of history, the wealth of erudition, and the subtlety of intellect are yet on your side; and I admit that even I, the "Infidel," immeasurably more pronounced than ten thousand "Infidels" you hav tortured and burnt, hav some feeling of sympathy with you as, girt with the cestus of the mighty memories of two thousand years of the irrevocable past, you stand confronting your inevitable doom from the fiat of the merciless future. Hater as I am of tyrants and tyranny, the tears hav coursed down my face as I hav figured my fathers at Culloden amid ruin and rout, riven tartan and shivered claymore, perishing in the whirlwind that swept away the "divine right of kings." Like sympathy I extend to you and your church, Cardinal Manning, standing between the sunset of the world's yesterday and the dawn of the world's to-morrow, defending the divine right of priests. But, like a specter of the Brocken, your towers and citadels melt away into the viewless air. You hav made a darkly-interesting chapter in anthropology; but the race rises to the level of new developments and new eons, and, ere a long time pass, your censer will smoke no more; your Jesus will hav taken his place with the obsolete gods; and the candles upon your altar shall burn no more forever. The same sun in the heavens that has looked down upon the waning altar-fires of the faiths of the world's hoary yesterday shall yet look down upon your altars, cold, deserted, and desolate. The altar of the future will be the concave of the sky overarching in glory the everlasting hills. The worship of the future, irrespectiv of teleological dogma, will be the reaching forward to stronger brain, purer morals, and a happier world. To further the advent, my lord cardinal, of that nobler altar and grander worship, the Freethinkers of America are met to-day on the Cassadaga hights, and they permit me thus to shake hands with them, and add my feeble spark to the splendor of the coming day in a land where Romanism never had the mastery—on a continent of which your Jesus never heard.

Aunt Elmina's Book.

LITTLE LESSONS FOR LITTLE FOLKS, Vol. I. By Mrs. E. D. Slenker. Price, 30 cents.

This is just what its name indicates—a little lesson book of 152 pages, containing solid, substantial facts. The subjects are well and wisely chosen and constitute a variety of information and instruction. They are taken, mostly, as the author says in her preface, from the latest edition of Chambers's Encyclopedia, and are as reliable as can be obtained It is a good book for big folks as well as little ones, and should, as I trust it will, be in not only every family, but in secular and Sunday-schools as well. It is the only book of the kind I hav ever seen, and, I hav spent an hour very profitably to-day in the perusal of its pages. The children will all want "Aunt Elmina's Little Lessons," I am sure, and the well-known ability of Mrs. Slenker, as a writer on a variety of topics, should insure a ready sale for this latest one, so that she will feel that there is a demand for another volume.

The Contrast.

PRESIDENT BROWN'S OPENING ADDRESS AT THE N. Y. STATE FREETHINKERS' CONVENTION.

LIBERALS AND FRIENDS: The science of human existence began with our knowledge of a cell. The religion of superstition began with our want of knowledge of a sell. One is spelled cell, and the other sell. By the former we find all vegetable and animal life sustained. By the latter, all the fictions and follies of religion are expensively maintained. All physical and mental well-being depends upon the scientific cell. The priests and the preachers climb into power and support by the sell of faith. One protects the family and the state, and the other supports the clergy and the church. One teaches the natural ways of happiness, while the other compels the race to fear and dread. By the believers, the unknown is placed before the known as all-important. By this pious deception men and women are put upon their knees as slaves, dupes, and weeping dudes. A secular education raises humanity above the religious deceptions, into the utility and dignity of the state and the progress of intellectual liberty. By the sell in preaching, prayer, and faith, the family and the state have been robbed for years of their just rights. Idiots, paupers, and vandals have been the legitimate result. A pious fraud praying for bread, to be furnished by an unknown God, only finds it, at last, produced by the actual knowledge and industry of a sinning secular individual. The substantials of both church and state come from our secular knowledge and the work we do, not from religious faith or belief. The knowledge we have of the necessities and the happiness of life does not come by belief or prayer. It comes by our secular observation and experience. Our personal duties depend upon what we know, not upon what we believe. The sell of religious faith has always received its money and food from the industrious sinners who depend upon the science cell for a whole body and a correct thought. What we know about honor and justice does not require clerical support through religious fear and selfishness. We have paid taxes and tithes on church property, and for the support of the clergy, to the amount which would have settled every conceivable debt of the world which human necessity could demand. It is possible that a good God has not ability enough to save the souls of his own creation, without clerically robbing the industrious many, to religiously support the idle few in a perfect state of holiness? What a difference there seems to be between divine and human justice!

One shrewd sheriff and a good judge can prevent more real sin and crime than the unknown God with his whole posse of clerical police. They attempt to do their reforming by the sell of faith, while the sheriff and the judge do not wait until death before they deal with the offender. We think law and order is better maintained by persons who are secularly educated, than by holy men preaching faith and hope in a musical or a burning life after death. Their rewards are too far away for immediate practical influence. This immense clerical fraud depends upon the fiction in the phrase, "I believe." We know, or we do not know. What we know is in no sense what we believe. What we do not sense, and therefore do not know, is all we can believe. What we know is secular. What we do not know is our religion. When we sense and know, then knowledge has taken the place of our religion. When we say we believe, it is the best evidence we do not know. When we do know, then there is no need of the phrase, "I believe."

When we talk of the unknowable and the unthinkable, how can we expect our words will be anything but verbal and imaginary? What we sense is our knowledge. What we do not sense, and attempt to describe, is nonsense—no sense. If we desire to most effectually separate church and state, we should teach the rational difference in the utility of secular knowledge, and the folly of ignorant belief in the unknowable, and the impossible assumptions of religion.

Any person who has been educated to the practical good of this world, would not exchange it for any or all the religious faith and belief in the universe. Educate men and women to depend wholly upon their knowledge and labor for all they can enjoy, and we have fairly and truly separated church and state. Every person has a right to guess about the unknown, and a right to present that guess without fear or molestation. He should be protected in his belief until such time and place when knowledge destroys it. Then he should be secularly free to present his knowledge. In fact, scientific teaching and reasoning should be as free in every respect as the mystical and verbal bosh of religion. Before all guess-work or hope of a future life after death, the young and the innocent should receive a secular education and know the facts and the reasons whereby life, health, and happiness are safely maintained.

Scientific schools and papers should be fully protected and supported by taxing the church property, which has clerically robbed secular instruction, for years, of its just privileges. To teach that God only helps the believers, and not the knowers and doers, is the fiction by which the clergy selfishly hold the ignorant in the toils of the orthodox faith. Knowledge is a virtue. Belief is often a vice which supports ignorance and crime. Secular authority should govern all persons by the laws of the state, independently and impartially, for the sole good and equity of each and all whose citizen relations are lawfully established. A worldly education is about the only safeguard against the deceitful influence of religious assumptions and clerical impositions, perpetrated in the name of an unknown God and Christ.

Scientific instruction has as many rights as the heartless threats of religious damnation. The revenge of saints has no right over the knowledge of the sinners when both seek freedom and control. The best citizen grants to every person the similar rights and privileges claimed by himself.

The freedom of speech and press allows the only censorship, which demonstrated truths and facts place before the citizen, to freely use instead of his want of knowledge.

Truth and fact never need abuse freedom of thought, speech, or press. Error seeks control and denies fair discussion and free comparison with the demonstrable origin of correct thought. Religious revenge is not the jury by which the abuse of freedom should be tried and sent to prison. The impartial sinner has more real virtue than the revengeful saint.

The devil has a million sinners to God's one saint, and anyone of them has more generosity, industry, honesty and actual goodness, in daily life, than the one godly pet who begs his food and clothing, while idly living on the charities of the very sinners whom he dooms to hell, for no other reason than unbelief. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

What has man to fear but his own inherited ignorance? How could he sin more than try to keep under its useless influence and priestly control. One day of secular education is worth more than all the religions known since the word God was invented. Take from the believer his knowledge of forms and motions of matter, and he cannot even guess. To scientifically put off as long as possible our final individual destruction, and keep our forms and motions in existence, we are Freethinkers and secular workers, knowing the good it daily brings us. Of gods and devils we know nothing. We believe of them just what we do not know, and that fact destroys their utility to us.

We think sin is necessary to a worldly salvation by knowledge. There can be no salvation without sin. Secular knowledge is far more conducive to health and happiness than ignorance and belief. We are ready to know and do the fittest thing for the good of humanity, and let gods, devils, priests, and preachers look elsewhere for aid. Let us be faithful and sincere to what we know to be useful to our race. Of the myths and miracles of religion we have quite enough.

With knowledge and labor for the needy we are content.

The good of this world will satisfy the wise until we know something of a better or a worse existence.

On the question of secular rights and intellectual freedom we have but one controlling motto, which is said to have been given to the world six hundred and fifty years before Christ, by Thales, a thoughtful Grecian philosopher.

It is this: "Avoid doing what you blame in others."

Whoever strictly obeys this admirable saying will be a good example to his enemies, and a true teacher of all his associates.

If the believers in the religious superstitions had spent their time in studying the facts and truths which alone make them healthy and worldly-happy, almost the entire gloom and tears of the Christian mourners would have been prevented.

You know your worth and mental content depend upon your knowledge and reason.

And if we are in any danger of pain or fire after death, we will use the same or similar knowledge then we now find good.

If the real goodness of this world is worth anything in another life, if there be one, we cannot apply it until we arrive there.

Our selfishness can never correct our reason and understanding.

All we need to know and do is the inevitable, the must to be. Matter is the source of all known phenomena, and without its varied conditions we could not exist.

When we understand all the relations of forms and motions of matter, we will find no place or need for gods, devils, or their professing agents.

How do we know when we are doing right or wrong, except we be acting according to our knowledge?

To avoid knowledge is a crime. To prevent others from knowing the right, by their own study, is the crime of the priest.

To accept belief as better than knowledge is the vice of the zealous Christian.

To know what will keep us whole in body and correct in thought is the highest virtue with which man can become acquainted.

We live to enjoy what we know and do.

When we are taught to say, "I do not know," instead of saying, "I believe," then an honest affirmation will be counted better than a Christian oath, the test of which is to publicly kiss the dirty cover of a book of filth and fiction.

All that admits the book into the farce of religious courts is the sinful phrase so thoughtlessly and commonly used, "I believe," instead of saying, "I know, I do not know." In proportion as knowledge increases, religion decreases.

Knowledge and labor usefully remove religious faith, prayer, and belief. Our knowledge has improved, beautified, and made this planet a better place upon which to live and be happy. Our religious beliefs have reduced many victms of it to poverty, idleness, ignorance, crime, and indescribable misery.

To know is to succeed.

To believe is to fail.

Knowledge is mental health. Religion is a disease in the brain of those who teach that by belief we are saved, and not by knowledge. A secular education will save this nation from religious ignorance and the vandals of superstition.

To know and do is to be scientific and useful. To believe and pray is to be religious and useless.

Science produces and protects. Religion consumes and destroys.

Science is the known and the demonstrable. Religion is an assumption, making a great noise about the supposed.

Science is the possible. Religion is the impossible.

Science is knowledge. Religion is ignorance.

We should act with the actual, and not worship the impossible. Distinguish between the two and live and labor accordingly. Defend the right and the true. Oppose the wrong, the mythical, and the useless.

The Pioneer Work of Liberalism.

The work to be engaged in by Mr. Watts and myself is of a twofold nature: first, of course, to lecture among Liberals themselvs. This is necessary in order that fellowship may be more fully established and a greater impulse communicated to our organized force. We need to giv and take of the great new life and hope that is in the world to-day. We cannot liv alone and accomplish our best in the tumultuous and complicated civilization of the present time. We must join heart and hand and become powerful, not only within but without—strong in ourselvs, and able to confront that which, based upon the theology of past, sets itself so strenuously against progress. Therefore, through the platform as well as through the press, Liberals should be more thoroughly aroused. There should be a closer association and deeper sympathy, so that the organization already established shall be both permanent and effectual.

But, based on this more powerful union of those who are now Liberals, there is to be begun and carried on a vast pioneer work. This is the essential object of the $5,000 fund. It is not to support Mr. Watts and myself among Liberals, but to enable us, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, beyond all present Liberal organizations, to enter untried fields, to break new grounds, to plant the seed for new harvests. I want this point to be particularly understood by all contributors to the fund. This is not a contribution to enable us to hav a free-and-easy time among our own kith and kin, but to giv us an opportunity for work where work of our sort has never been done before.

It will often be necessary, in going into an entirely new community, to hire our own hall, pay for advertisments, etc., depending upon our own resources, and this we cannot do in any successful way unless the means are furnished by the combined generosity of the Liberals of the whole country. Anyone can see the magnificent results of such a work in the future. We are working for the future, and not simply for the present. It is not for our own comfort that we aim, but for the unending progress of humanity. We wish, therefore, to enlarge the circle of Liberalism and send its flame into every corner of our land. We do not regard ourselvs as a select company, the enlightened few, who are to liv for our own development, making all possible knowledge for ourselvs, and disdainfully, in the pride of intellectual achievement, letting the outer world rest in darkness. We are no such orthodox heathen as that, no such voluptuaries of thought, and epicures of wisdom, and gluttons of "sweetness and light." We regard ourselvs as the vanguard of the great future democracy of the world. In our hands are placed the treasures of the life that is to be. We are standard-bearers of the truth and right. We are the servants of humanity, and it is our greatest joy and noblest reward to be able to do something for its advancement. We realize the oneness of our race—that we are bound together and sweep forward upon the stream of united effort. Our own culture is not complete, our own highest attainment is not achieved, our own pleasure not supreme, until all others hav shared with us the knowledge we hav acquired and the hope founded upon that knowledge. Therefore, by its very nature, Liberalism must go forth in constantly increasing effort, for the spirit of truth is the spirit of growth. In order to expand ourselvs and reach our grandest hight, the whole world must come into communion with our thought and be touched by the same infinit possibilities. Herein lies the grandeur of our undertaking, that it is thoroughly democratic and cosmopolitan. It would build up the Ideal Republic, whose pillars shall be planted in every land, and whose arch shall be as universal as the blue dome of heaven.

It is for this great and onward work that we ask for contributions—that we may push ahead, and bring into play the yet unorganized forces of human growth. There are thousands and tens of thousands throughout our land who are ready to be enrolled in our ranks when they understand our purposes and see the sublime ideal for which we strive. They are dissatisfied with the old; it is dust and ashes to them. They hunger for the new; they would partake of the fresh life of humanity. But they are scattered here and there in a thousand communities; they are surrounded with hostil influences; the new thought is as yet vague and dim—it seems a confused mass, and they know not hardly whether it will build up or tear down. They hesitate, and, while detached from the old, they find no point of earnest effort and hope in the new. It is for us to make an opportunity for this unorganized multitude; to speak the word that, like a fresh element, shall strike brightness out of confusion, that shall crystallize what has hitherto been blindly floating into order and beauty and so into noblest use.

Shall any Liberal who has a dollar to spare hesitate to contribute to this all-important pioneer work? Will he not feel the electric thrill of brotherhood, and be ready to do his best in order that when the old has forever disappeared, the new may shine, not in disorganized fragments, but in a wonderful cosmos—a palace of delight wherein all humanity shall find an ample feast?

I am sure that Liberals will generously respond, so that our choice and noblest spirits may hasten to new fields, and so from day to day enlarge the domains of truth, science, and humanity.

In no spirit of boasting, but simply to show what can be done, I venture to state something of my past experience in missionary work, by which I hope to be able to accomplish something infinitly better for the future.

In my fresh enthusiasm for orthodoxy, immediately after my graduation from a theological seminary, I went to the prairies of Illinois, and joined my fortunes with a struggling band, and as the result of my effort a new church edifice was built, and I must confess that I was a little proud when I saw its spire pointing to the sky, for I felt that I had actually done something for humanity. I had, like St. Paul, planted a church where there was no church before. After a while I passed into the Unitarian belief, and, animated by its spirit, I went to the plains of Nebraska, almost outside the bounds of civilization, on the very verge of the red man's territory, and after two years' hard work in a somewhat uncongenial soil, built another edifice for the advancement of Christianity. So actually in my short life I hav been the means of rearing two church buildings for the benefit of the old faith. I hav served my apprenticeship, and believe I served it well. Now comes the real work of my life, and where I hav built one edifice for Christianity I purpose to build a hundred halls for Liberalism. I know it can be done. I hav not worked for nothing in the harness of the church. What I learnt there shall be put to the service of a far nobler cause. With an infinitly greater outlook, a greater faith, a greater hope, a greater enthusiasm, I can be one of those who shall help dot this land with the temples of humanity, where the worship of deity shall be transformed to love for our fellow-men. Giv us of your wealth, friends, and the cross shall vanish into the laboratory of science, and the pulpit be changed into a platform for the proclamation of genuin knowledge; and in place of the sepulchral tones of the priest shall be heard the beautiful pæans of man's eternal progress. This is the work laid out before us by the late action of the Liberal Congress—broad, manifold, far-reaching—a work for to-day and for the boundless future. It is to this progressiv and frontier labor for Liberalism that Mr. Watts and myself purpose to devote ourselvs, with the co-operation of a band of men and women whose genius and eloquence will be to us a constant support. I hav no fears for the success of our movement, for I hav no fears of the generosity of Liberals, and with their assistance both in spirit and in deed I know that an advance will be made in Liberalism that will be simply astonishing, such wealth of material is at hand, when the fitting moment arrives, and the wand of truth touches the fountains of life.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM,
Sec. National Liberal League.
Address: No. 55 East 9th st., New York City.

Elmina Attends a Seance and Visits a Cemetery.

To FRIENDS: September 16th I had my first introduction to spiritual phenomena. A friend invited me to his house, his daughter being a table-tipping medium. The table was a light—very light—stand. It tipped out the sentence, "You will believe in time," while she and her father sat to it with hands resting upon it, but gave no names or tests. We all tried it—Mr. Masquerier, Patience, and others. It finally tipped when I sat alone with the medium and gave the sentence, "Will you believe your mother?" I said, "Yes, it will be a test if it will rap her name with the initial of her maiden name as a middle letter." But it failed. I found I could, by pressing a trifle and drawing on the table toward me with the palm of my hand, easily start it to tipping, and as we closed I remarked this and the medium frankly said she could do so likewise, and also stop it on any letter, or between two letters, just as I could They seemed honest, true, and fair. They only experiment at home for themselvs and friends, so hav no motiv to deceive—perhaps may be self-deceived.

We tried a very heavy table that had been once said to hav been raised from the floor by invisible agency, but it didn't move a muscle.

I was, on the whole, not disappointed. I learned the modus operandi, and am promised a rapping seance soon. So I patiently bide my time.

CYPRESS HILLS CEMETERY.

A little group of us hav just been to Cypress Hills Cemetery. It lies on an elevated ridge of land usually known as "the backbone of Long Island." About four hundred acres of land are beautifully laid out in sections and plots, and it is, like Greenwood, a garden, park, and cemetery all in one, though not so well kept or so lovely as Greenwood.

At the entrance as we went in there was an immense plot set aside for soldiers' graves, and over them stood a grand monument, with the statue of a large and powerful soldier upon it, standing guard over the silent army of sle pers. The grass here, so thickly dotted with headstones, was of an emerald green, and as clean as human labor could keep it. Close by was a memorial plot sacred to the memory of Garfield, which was full of rare and blooming plants.

Then Mr. Masquerier piloted us to his tomb. The first thing I can remember of this great thinker is the unique fact of his having built his tomb during his lifetime. We found the monument in Section 9, near Locust Grove. A large and handsome one it was, too, and instead of the usual inscription of a death's-head and cross-bones, impossible flying women, and angels, he has ornamented it with brief inscriptions and memorial figures of scientific facts. On one face he has a declaration of his principles of right and wrong, and his idea of human progress and development. He claims to hav classed together the three great principles that must co-operate in the establishment of perfect rights and of as perfect happiness as is possible for us to enjoy—a separate and equal ownership in the quantity of soil, and an inalienable perpetuity and entailment of this ownership for both sexes, which will giv the power of self-employment and the right of self-government to each individual.

He claims that, while Archimedes boasted that if he had whereon to stand he could with his lever raise the physical world, he has suggested the more useful plan by which to raise the moral world to its highest stage of civilization.

He claims that, while Copernicus simply observed the fact that the planets were rolling around central suns, he was the first to discover the moral world revolving around the central hell of all the monopolized rights to property and government, and then to plan the reconstruction of them by dividing the whole earth into states, townships, and farmsteads that should be entailed and inalienable.

It looks very pretty (in theory) to see these little homes, where peace and plenty shall forever dwell, and where luxury and wealth may in time abide.

Like all enthusiastic reformers, he thinks his way best, that Owen, Comte, Proudhon, Cabot, S. P. Andrews, and others hav all missed the main points in their labors for communistic life by not giving to people these little farmsteads as inalienable homes.

It was a strange sight indeed to see this man reading these rights from his own tombstone and expatiating so earnestly upon them. On another side he had his alphabet, which he claims to be the only perfect alphabet the world has ever known, it giving the eleven vowel sounds in the human voice, and the twenty-two consonants, or strikings of the parts of the mouth upon each other. This alphabet he explained to us, and we clearly saw its vast superiority to the one now in use, but realized how hard it would be to get the world to adopt such a great and radical change, even though it might be perfection itself. On another side were the geometrical figures, and on still another his name and the date of his birth, with the blank for his death.

His wife is lying there waiting his coming to share her last resting-place. Her sister Patience, who was with us, gathered a beautiful bouquet of wild flowers and laid them as love's sweet offering upon her grave.

I'd lay me down where spring may crown
My grave with his earliest flowers,
Where zephyrs play and the sunbeams stray
'Mid the peaceful cypress bowers.

Friends, am I mistaken in thinking that the little I hav said of my visit here at Masquerier's will help to interest you in the work of this man, of whom we may well say,

"And still the wonder grew
How one small head could carry all he knew?"

If you would like to know more of him and his ideas, I will send you his book, price $1, for only 40 cents. It is called, "Sociology; or, the Reconstruction of Society, Government, and Property." I hope to receive many orders for it. Address me at Snowville. Truly, ELMINA.

Canadian Notes.

It is pleasing to note that activ steps are now being taken in Canada to establish a Secular Union throughout the dominion. This important work has been undertaken by Mr. Charles Watts, whose long experience in the Freethought movement pre-eminently fits him for the task. Practical knowledge, polemical ability, and ready tact are necessary upon the part of those who seek to organize our principles, and we hav every reason to know that Mr. Watts possesses a fair share of these qualities. His reception in Toronto and Hamilton, during the past week, has been all that he could hav desired, personal kindness and public favors having been most freely bestowed upon him. His bold, earnest, and definit mode of advocacy admirably suits the Liberals, both of Canada and the States, and there is no doubt that his time will be fully occupied in platform and general organizing labors. On the morning of Sunday, Sept. 14th, our friend opened a campaign in Hamilton which was thus reported in the Spectator of that city the following morning:

"Mr. Charles Watts, the celebrated Secularist speaker, writer, and debater, lectured in the Pythian armory yesterday morning to a good audience, which included quite a number of ladies. The subject of the lecture was the nature and aims of Secularism, the religion of humanity, which Mr. Watts and his co-workers wish to substitute for Christianity. He said that Secularism did not necessarily imply a denial of and disbelief in the supernatural, but it taught that, as this is the only world of which we hav any knowledge, we should devote our energies entirely to the end of improving our condition here, and should let the future take care of itself. He declared that Secularists did not seek to abolish the Christian religion, but wished to retain what there was of good in it and reject that part of it which they considered evil. Secularism, he said, was positiv philosophy, and provided for all the needs of mankind—physical, intellectual, emotional, moral, social, and domestic. At the close of the lecture an invitation was extended to any person who might wish to dispute any of the lecturer's statements or views to come forward and speak, but nobody responded. Mr. Watts said that this was the first of a series of lectures to be delivered in Hamilton by him. He announced himself as anxious to meet any or all of the city clergymen in debate on the comparativ merits of Secularism and Christianity."

The Rev. Dr. Sexton having lectured in Hamilton, the Spectator inserted the subjoined paragraph:

"An effort will be made to arrange a debate here between Rev. Dr. Sexton and Mr. Charles Watts, the former to speak on the side of Christianity and the latter to defend Secularism. Mr. Watts will lecture here again next Monday and Tuesday evenings, and on Wednesday evening he will organize a Secular society."

Mr. Watts arrived in Toronto from the Cassadaga Convention Wednesday evening, September 10th, and will make that place his headquarters while in Canada. He delivered a lecture at Hamilton on the morning of the 14th to a good audience. In the evening he lectured in Albert Hall, on "Secularism; Its Principles and Its Aims." The hall was filled before the hour set for the lecture, and still they came. At a low estimate at least two or three hundred disappointed people were refused admittance for want of room. He spoke for over an hour and a half without any sign of weariness in his listeners. Mr. Watts is a logician of the first order. His incisiv logic, together with a command of language that always conveys a well-defined idea, immediately arrested the attention of the audience; and the lecturer was often interrupted by applause that was given with enthusiasm.

On Wednesday evening, the 17th, Mr. Watts delivered a special lecture in Toronto in reply to the Rev. Dr. Sexton upon the subject, "If a Man Die, shall he Liv Again?" The next day the following letter appeared in the Toronto World:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE WORLD, Sir: I chanced to listen last night to Charles Watts's lecture wherein he labored to destroy the Christian hope of a future life. His cold and cheerless theory on this subject has no attractions for me; but at the close of the lecture he made a very serious charge against our city clergy which I think they cannot afford to overlook. The lecture being concluded, the chairman offered the platform to anyone who wished to controvert it. Christianity found its defender in an individual who mounted the platform merely to display his ignorance, and, by the nonsense he talked, to bring a keen sense of shame to those in the audience who sympathized with the cause he championed. When he had got through, the lecturer made a brief, and, I will do him the justice to say, a very courteous reply; but he said the clergymen of Toronto ought to be ashamed to leave the defense of the religion of which they were the paid guardians, to persons not qualified to debate these great subjects properly. It was either because they did not believe in what they preached, or were afraid to bring it to the test of discussion. If they did not choose to meet him at his lectures, he was willing, he said, to meet them in their own lecture rooms. As a Christian believer, I was pained and humiliated to hear such a challenge as this unresponded to. I should be sorry indeed if many of the difficulties raised by the lecturer as to the immortality of the soul could not be satisfactorily answered. I think they can, and if the clergy, whose lives are devoted to the study of these subjects, do not answer them, who can? I wish to ask them in all seriousness if they feel that they are doing their duty by sitting quietly in their libraries while many of their people are being drawn away into Infidelity by the teachings of this skilful English debater? The large audience that was present last night is sufficient proof of the influence this man is exerting in Toronto, and his ability is such that if he remains in this city many months preaching the gospel of unbelief with no one to oppose him, he will certainly make it a powerful force amongst us. If our ministers, through their neglect, allow the minds of their people to be poisoned and perverted in this way, their guilt will rise up before them on the judgment day. Let them study the example of the apostle Paul, who was "not ashamed of the gospel of Christ," and who was not afraid to meet the philosophers of Greece on Mar's Hill, or to stand up for his master in Rome itself.

"BELIEVER."

Thus it will be seen that Mr. Watts has already awakened great interest in Canada upon Secular philosophy. He is engaged to visit the various districts of Canada for the purpose of starting branch societies upon the basis of the National Liberal League, with a view of amalgamating the whole of the Liberals of the Dominion and the United States at the next convention of the League, under the name of "The American Secular Union." This proposition has met with general favor in all parts, and promises to be productiv of practical results in consolidating the vast Freethought elements which exist so extensivly throughout the continent.

Arrangements hav been commenced for the holdof a great Secular Convention in Toronto, the second week in December, when the new departure above referred to will be fully discussed. At this convention delegates will be present from all parts of Canada, and the leading lecturers of the States will be especially invited. A plan will also be submitted to the convention to secure a Canadian edition weekly of one of the Liberals journals now published in the States, and by these means it is hoped to obtain full publicity to the work of friends in Canada.

All communications as to this convention should be sent direct to the secretary, Mr. J. A. Risser, 185 Richmond street, West, Toronto, Canada, Ont.

The Rev. Dr. Sexton, of England, is now lecturing in Canada against the "Skepticism of the Age." He is the mouthpiece of all the denominations with the exception of the Roman Catholics. The doctor is evidently a very able man, but it is feared that with all his ability his friends in Toronto are afraid to put him forward to defend their teachings in debate. An invitation has been sent to the doctor's friends, by the Toronto Secular Society, for him to meet Mr. Watts in discussion, but up to the present the invitasion has not been accepted. The truth alone benefits through debate, and Christians are becoming aware of this fact more than ever.

Those Christian Judges Again.

The allegation made in THE TRUTH SEEKER, July 28, 1883, that all the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, except Mr. Justice Strong, were Infidels, was controverted by the Christian at Work, Parson Talmage's paper, which said:

"Chief Justice Waite is an Episcopalian; Justice Field is a true blue Presbyterian; Justice Bradley is an elder in the Reformed [Dutch?] church; Justice Gray is a Channing Unitarian; and Justice Blatchford is a through-and-through Episcopalian. We are not informed as to the remaining five [four], but we believe there is not an Infidel on the United States Bench."

When "Antichrist" made the allegation, he should hav said that it applied to the court as constituted before the retirement of Judge Strong, and that other changes had since occurred by which there were four new members upon the bench, to wit, Gray, of Boston; Blatchford, of New York; Woods, of Atlanta; and Matthews, of Cincinnati.

But in regard to the alleged piety of the five Christian judges, testimony began to come in from various sources, which the "Man of Sin" was wicked enough to re-publish. First, a correspondent of the Sun from Newark said:

"Aliunde Joe is put down as an elder in the Reformed church. Great Scott! you ought to hear him cuss once when in a passion."

Next came a public announcement that Chief Justice Waite had dined on the piazza of Coney Island on Sunday, with Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, to the music of Gilmore's band. And the Christian Intelligencer remarked: "This example will fill God-fearing hearts with sorrow."

Then upon inquiry the "Man of Sin" was informed that Judge Field, the "true blue Presbyterian," like Aliunde Joe, was given to cussing.

And now we clip from the New York Tribune, edited by a Scotch Presbyterian, the following "Personal" in relation to Judge Gray, the "Channing Unitarian:"

"Somebody in Washington has just unearthed the following good story, told at the expense of Controller Lawrence. He was arguing an appeal before the Supreme Court last winter, in the course of which he quoted a decision quite unfamiliar to the members of the court. 'Pardon me, judge,' interrupted Justice Wood, blandly, 'what is your authority for that?' 'Lawrence I.,' was the rather hesitating reply. His embarrassment was not lessened at the titter which ran through the room, as bluff old Justice Gray exclaimed soto voce: 'Well, if that isn't cheek, I'll be d——d!" The controller had been quoting from his own decisions."

Now let us sum up the evidence as to the present court, and see how it stands upon the question at issue. The acknowledged or presumed Agnostics, or knownothings, are:

Miller, of Iowa.
Woods, of Alabama.
Matthews, of Ohio.
Harlan, of Kentucky.

The other five are claimed to be nominal churchmen; but they hav certain characteristics which worldly-minded men are accustomed to regard as belonging to the class of unbelieving sinners. That is to say, Chief Justice Waite, Episcopalian, breaks the Sabbath by dining on the piazza at Coney Island with another English chief justice, also a churchman, while Gilmore's band plays profane music.

Judge Bradley, of New Jersey, an elder in the Reformed church, is so profane that "the man who carted a load of apples up a steep hill wasn't a marker to him."

Judge Field, of the Pacific coast, "a true blue Presbyterian," is said to be not far behind his brother Bradley in the use of cuss words.

Judge Gray, of the Hub, "a Channing Unitarian," and supposed to be incapable of profanity, or even of laughing audibly, while on the bench of the full court, whispered, "I'll be d——d," causing a titter throughout the hall of justice, while even the stony goddess herself shook with suppressed agitation, until the scales in her outstretched hand vibrated in telephonic sympathy with her diaphragm.

And now will some one who knows Judge Blatchford please inform us whether he is too good an Episcopalian to break the Sabbath or use cuss words?

ANTICHRIST, A.M.

Literary.

BY way of the Investigator we glean the following from the New Bedford Signal:

"We understand that Miss Susan H. Wixon, of Fall River, has in course of preparation two new books, to be issued the coming fall. From her well-known and marked ability as a writer, and a denouncer of all shams and superstitions, the public has a right to expect a rare treat in the issue of two new volumes from her facil pen. For nearly one year Miss Wixon has been engaged in editing the "Youths' Department" of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a well-known independent journal of New York city. Her editorial labors hav met with a just appreciation, and the youthful readers of that paper are said to be much attached to their kind and friendly editress. While the fame of Miss Wixon has extended abroad, and her former book, "Apples of Gold," has been translated into the Bengali language, in distant India, yet so quiet, retiring, and unassuming is she that few in her neighborhood, outside of her immediate family, know how industrious she is, or how great a work she is accomplishing."

To which Mr. Seaver adds:

"Miss Wixon is an accomplished writer, as well as a very worthy lady, and as her occupation is Liberal literature, we suggest to all our readers that they purchase a copy of each of her new books as a compliment to her ability and industry."

The children will be pleased to know that we hav the book for them in hand, and that it will be out in season to ornament the Christmas-trees of as many of them as make a festival of the sun's winter birth. We expect every little pagan in the land will want a copy, and not giv his or her parents a moment's rest till one is ordered.

Lectures and Lecturers.

J. E. REMSBURG has been lecturing in Pennsylvania since the Cassadaga Convention. He spoke in Doylestown the 11th; Chalfont, 12th; Lansdale, 13th and 14th; Altoona, 15th; and Waynesburg, 16th and 17th.

DR. JULIET H. SEVERANCE was called away from the Freethinkers' Convention at Cassadaga by a dispatch that her son, Frederick W. Stillman, a member of Rentfrues' Jolly Pathfinders, was seriously ill at Grand Rapids, Mich. She has been obliged to cancel her engagements to speak at Pittsburgh, Worcester, and Boston, and is now at home, whither she has removed her son, and is caring for him and attending to other professional duties.

ARRANGEMENTS are being made for Mr. Charles Watts to make a lecturing tour through the states immediately after the presidential election. Mr. S. P. Putnam will accompany Mr. Watts, and it is the intention of these gentlemen to establish activ auxiliaries of the National Liberal League in each city they visit. In the mean time, we are glad to see that Mr. Watts is so busy and successful in similar good work in Canada, a prolific soil for the cultivation of Liberal principles. We trust that his efforts to organize the Freethinkers of the United States and Canada will be as successful as they deserve to be. He and friend Putnam hav our warmest support, and we ask the same for them from the Liberals throughout the country.

In Memoriam.

Honoring the Honored Dead.

PROCEEDINGS AT THE D. M. BENNETT MEMORIAL MEETING OF THE N. Y. STATE FREETHINKERS' ASSOCIATION, FRIDAY EVENING, SEPT. 5, 1884.

After music by the choir, S. P. Putnam opened the proceedings. He said:

There are two great forces in the world's advance, the book and the man, literature and life, thought and personality. Many wonderful things are enshrined in books; they contain the wealth of untold generations; they are companions to many a solitary hour, sweeter even than our dearest friend can be. But abstract thought, even though clothed with the living hues of poetry, cannot exert the mighty influence which some powerful personality does in whom thought has become concrete, a living soul and an inspiring presence. The history of the world has been the history of great men, of heroes and martyrs, and from them hav flowed the most potent fountains of impulse and action.

It is right, therefore, that we should celebrate the lives of these notable men, for they are greater than themselvs; they are representativs of thought; they are the incarnation of principles; they are the burning focus wherein is intensified and flamed forth the most ardent hopes and aspirations of the race.

We hold these memorial services in honor of D. M. Bennett, founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER, because he stands as the embodiment of eternal principles. He was a man so placed that in him we see the illustration of those ideas that must finally conquer the world. When we speak of D. M. Bennett, we go deeper than his individuality and touch the horizon of all thought, for in him were blended those characteristics that must endure so long as man has an illustrious history.

D. M. Bennett represents independence of thought. He was thoroughly free from the trammels of the past; he was sturdily intellectual; he was a thinker; he admitted no authority except that based upon human reason; he was afraid of no conclusions; he stuck firmly to the fundamental verities of nature, and maintained their inevitable logic. He was a soldier of the truth—a seeker of it in advance of others. He was the pioneer of freedom. He was also thoroughly sincere. He kept back nothing. He was not all things to all men, but simply himself. He relied upon his own manhood. He would wear no false colors; he would speak no hollow word; he was a constant rebuke to the hypocrisies of fashion; he put on no style, but wore the plain garment of his own humanity. Simple D. M. Bennett he was, without a touch of artificiality, full of life born of the spirit of truth, regardless of rules and regulations when they seemed but the sepulchral ornaments of a respectability born of theological niceties. Mr. Bennett's morality was of the highest because he was so utterly sincere and so thoroughly natural. Morality in its essence is life—energy; it is that which pushes on, which makes things fresh and the world alive, which seeks for the new and so for the beautiful. Of morality in this noble and natural sense, Mr. Bennett was a rugged expression, like the tree from the soil, like the mountain from the plain. He had no smooth servility; he was no polished courtier of the things that are Upright and downright he was with himself and with his fellow-men. He hung his banners on the outward walls, and what was truth to his inner nature was truth to all the world from his vigorous pen.

Mr. Bennett was a man also of transcendent courage. He seemed to hav no sense of danger when his convictions were thoroughly aroused. He was equable even in the most trying circumstances. With surpassing insight he saw the danger that threatened us. What was trivial in the eyes of others was to him all-important. A vital principle was threatened; no matter what the consequences, he resented the blow. Through him he felt that America's dearest honor was at stake. There was no hesitation. There seemed to be no particle of fear. He did not stop to consult others. It was right, he knew it was right, and if not a single friend upheld him, he would advance. Friends did stand by him, but their own courage received an added impulse from his imperturbable spirit. His apparent recklessness was the result of a determined conviction. His bravery was founded upon his conscience. For him there was no retreat. The harder his enemies pushed, the more vigorous was his advance. He sought not for applause—he sought for the simple truth. He obeyed the truth, for to him that was the one supreme thing in the universe. He had no policy. He did not hedge or quibble—he simply acted from the grand convictions of his soul. Thus he was born leader, because he was so pre-eminently truthful, because he looked first of all to what his own soul commanded. He was willing to take his life in his hands and endure all—the dungeon and the stake, if need be, and even the desertion of friends—if so the tremendous logic of truth declared. He was the seeker of truth, and when the truth was found he was the servant of truth.

Furthermore, in the noble spirit of truth he was thoroughly Liberal. Truth is not bigoted—it is universal and all-embracing, kindly even to error when held in the spirit of honesty and sincerity. The truth never yet persecuted, it never put into prison; it advances by reason, and not by force. It is charitable, for in the might of its own nature it can afford so to be. In this serene spirit of truth, Mr. Bennett conducted his paper. He was willing to hear all sides. He gave an opportunity for the expression of every honest thought. The most opposit opinions found respectful consideration. His own earnestness of conviction made him regardful of the like earnestness in others, though they differed from him. He even admitted to his columns attacks upon himself. He did not believe in repression, but expression, no matter how crude, how erroneous, if only genuin from one's own heart. He knew that truth only asked for a fair field and no favor. On this principle he founded his journal, and crowned its career with success.

Thus we honor him for his independence, his sincerity, his courage, his liberality. His enemies thought to destroy him. They hav only made his name more illustrious, his memory more dear. They thought to crush him, but they hav crowned him. In the firmament of Freethought he shines so long as man advances, so long as he has hope and aspiration, so long as he presses forward and seeks the new truth in reverence of the old.

We are in the sacred presence of the memory of D. M. Bennett. It givs me pleasure to stand here as one of the witnesses who can testify to the bravery, honesty, and industry of the man who founded THE TRUTH SEEKER. When I think of the labor of liberty and free speech which he performed we all lament his death, and feel as if we should carry on the Liberal work he began. In doing this we can follow his example and feel we are honoring the dead, and doing our Liberal duties.

While he was in prison at Albany I visited him. I found him cheerful and not appearing like a martyr. He was satisfied to liv out the term of the law for the good of the cause. He had given himself to advocate and practice liberty of speech and press, and bravely take the consequences. It cost him more in his time than it now costs us. No matter what Mr. Bennett did, he never lost sight of the cause of mental liberty. He never left unexposed any error or folly of the orthodox religion. It seems to me he has done more for the freedom of the press than any one man save Horace Seaver of the Boston Investigator.

While we are true to the dead, may we be kind and faithful to the living, that we may be remembered by those we love. Longer than slavery may be remembered the efforts of Mr. Bennett to liberate the minds of men and women. As long as we liv let us practice what duty commands us to defend in the deeds and name of D. M. Bennett.

J. H. Burnham, one of the most eloquent speakers at the Convention, and one of the most unflinching friends of the principles for which Mr. Bennett fought, spoke next. Among many brilliant sentences we caught the following:

The memories of our dead are chiseled upon the polished face of granit and marble, but the disintegrating touch of time will wipe out every name, however elaborately engraved thereon. The monuments of the dead of long ago, for whom the pyramids were erected, are crumbling into dust again, and all traces of those whose memories were to be commemorated are lost, and these silent wonders of the world continue through the centuries pointing to the skies meaningless. The memory of D. M. Bennett, though it is on marble in Greenwood Cemetery, will rot down, and every particle composing this block of memory will be blown by the winds, yet he will liv in the memories of mankind. He has burnt into coming ages his monument, which will defy the touch of time. He will liv in a pantheon without walls, dedicated to the living, and not the dead, when the tones and memories of his revilers and defamers (whose lips blister with their shame) shall hav passed into the silence where memories are not. Brave and noble men hav too often been doomed to wait the centuries before recognition came. This is one of the great faults of the ages—to wait until it is impossible to help the struggling hero. Thomas Paine, and Shakspere, and many others, were thus doomed to decompose and be lost in the whirls of dust before justice could be done, and thus it must be with Mr. Bennett. True, he is, and has been, defended by a host of brave, noble men and women, but he must wait for a century before the mist of superstition will clear away, and his enemies will venerate his memory. He is one of the noble benefactors of mankind, and his thought and work liv; his courage and bravery will and must command the respect of friends, and foes can but respect a man in whom such traits are illustrated as they were in D. M. Bennett. We fondly cherish his memory, and are thankful that his suffering has made it possible for us to do what we perhaps could not hav done without. All honor to the brave man whose memory we celebrate to-night.

The choir followed Mr. Burnham, and after them came Mr. Billings, who talked so fast that the reporter could not follow him, and the colonel forgot to hand in the promised abstract of his remarks. Mr. W. S. Bell, an intimate and warm friend of Mr. Bennett's, then came forward. He told this story:

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 6, 1880, Mr. Bennett said: "He (W. S. Bell) has said he was 'proud to be known as a friend to THE TRUTH SEEKER,' and THE TRUTH SEEKER, in return, is proud to be known as a friend to him." I knew Mr. Bennett intimately and well. I became acquainted with him soon after he came to New York, and was with him at Watkins when he was first arrested. It was on that occasion I began to form some idea of his courage. The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will remember that Miss Josephine Tilton, Mr. Mosher, and myself were arrested at the same time. I was engaged, at the moment of arrest, in selling books for Mr. Bennett, or rather, I was leaning carelessly upon a pile of books waiting for the next customer, when I was tapped on the shoulder by some one saying to me, "Mr. Bell, I want you to go with me, and Mr. Bennett, too." Without turning round, or before I did, I asked innocently, "How far is it?" supposing it to be some kind friend wanting us to go home and take supper with him, as D. M. and W. S. were usually quite jolly when together. He replied, "Not far." Then speaking to some one else, he said, "Here, John, you take charge of Mr. Bell, and I will see to Mr. Bennett." Then I turned about to see a policeman in full uniform take a position at my side. Perhaps, if I should say I was not agitated, I would torture the truth. It was a new experience, never having been under arrest before, and I hardly knew what to think, as I was entirely unconscious of having made myself liable to such a procedure. But before I had time to get any information from "John" regarding the occasion of the arrest, I found Mr. Bennett and myself marching off the grounds toward the court-room of the police justice. I was near enough to him to hold conversation, but I noticed that as soon as we left the park, where the out-of-door convention was being held, Mr. Bennett drew from his pocket an apple of no small dimensions, and began to eat it, with as much sang froid as if taking a stroll for pleasure. After we had reached the hall of justice, I waited impatiently to see the last bite of that apple vanish, that I might hav a little mutual understanding about this new departure. But, to my surprise, no sooner was the last clip from the core of that apple gone, than he put his hand in his pocket and drew forth another apple much larger than the first. This seemed so absurd and grotesque from my alarmed point of view that all my fear left me, and I had to laugh and wait. The court was in a state of perturbation, and it was some time before our case was called. Bail was given and we were soon free again.

On this occasion I caught the first glimpse of his heroism, which flamed up before the American people afterward when he went home from that place resolving to test his rights by selling "Cupid's Yokes" openly, let the result be what it might. I need not say that he made this a test of his own rights, for he had a higher aim. He had the rights of others in view. He threw up THE TRUTH SEEKER as the ægis of liberty, and did his utmost for humanity.

Mr. Bennett was a democrat. He was one of the people, and one with the people. And his work was successful chiefly because he held himself sternly on that level. Take his style of thinking and writing. He expressed himself always in the commonest and plainest language. I am sure this had much to do with his popularity and success. Besides, he showed himself a democrat in his publication of good books at the very lowest price. No publishers hav equaled him in this. When Amberley's "Analysis of Religious Belief" was selling for $10 (English edition), Mr. Bennett brought it out in a handsome volume for the small sum of $3; "Supernatural Religion" (English edition) sold for $12; he produced it for $4. And so, also, with Paine's works, and other valuable publications. In thus presenting the best books at the lowest possible price, Mr. Bennett became a noble benefactor of the English-speaking people of America. I would enroll his name high up on the scroll of fame for this most excellent work. His labors are still felt throughout this entire country. Though dead, he yet speaketh. His memory shall be as unfading as truth, and honor will be paid his name wherever liberty is cherished in the heart of man.

Charles Watts, though enjoying but slight personal acquaintance with the hero of the evening, yet knew him well enough to know he was worthy of respect as a man and of imitation as a laborer in the cause of freedom. He was one of nature's noblemen. In opening, Mr. Watts intimated that he was no hero-worshiper, but preferred taking a discriminating view of the merits of their departed friend. In order to judge accurately of the character and actions of a man, the times in which he lived, and the circumstances by which he was surrounded, must be taken into consideration. The speaker here expounded the doctrins of circumstances so far as they affect human character, as taught by Robert Owen. Alluding to D. M. Bennett, Mr. Watts said that his acquaintance with him was comparativly brief; twice had he met him in America, and twice in England, and also in Brussels. On each occasion he was forcibly impressed with the candor and ability of his amiable nature. Our duty now is to endeavor to learn some lessons from the dead to guide us in life. In Mr. Bennett's career were exemplified the virtues of earnestness, honesty, industry, and respect for the opinions of others. Having pointed out how these noble influences adorned the actions of the "great departed," the speaker said Mr. Bennett had no vain and empty ambition; he aspired to glory, it is true, but it was that glory of which Pliny wrote, consisting of having done something worth the writing, having written something worth the reading, and having sought to make the world nobler and better through having lived in it. This was the desire that actuated Mr. Bennett through an activ and fruitful life. To achieve this result, he limited his researches to no race and to no country. In the evening of life he ventured "round the world" to gather treasures with which to enrich human thought and dignify human character at home. Mr. Watts then expatiated upon the leading Liberal principles identified with Mr. Bennett's propagandism, and concluded as follows: Our friend has gone, but he has left us a legacy that is to continue the work in which he toiled, suffered, and through which he died. We revel in the thoughts of the great intellects of the past; as those thoughts hav been handed down in the vast literary treasures of the day, let us so emulate Mr. Bennett that if our thoughts are handed down to posterity, they shall indicate mental training and moral disciplin. Mr. Bennett won the highest of all immortality, the consciousness that during life his actions had been such that the world should hav no cause to reproach his memory, and that the loved ones left behind should hav cause to delight in the recollection of their mutual associations. It may be that the name of Bennett will never be engraven on your national marble slabs, but certain it is that his name will be cherished with fond remembrances by those to whom he endeared himself by acts of kindness and disinterestedness.

It is, perhaps, enough to say of the warmth of Mr. Watts's tribute, that one of the audience stoutly maintained that he was inspired.

C. B. Reynolds closed the speaking. His remarks were certainly inspired—by love and veneration for the dead. Mr. Reynolds is one of the best Liberal laborers in the field to-day, and for him the cause is indebted to D. M. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Reynolds's address reads:

This session of the New York Freethinkers' Convention is, with most proper regard to right and justice, set apart to do honor to the memory of the beloved and lamented D. M. Bennett, the model truth seeker, the noble, fearless champion of civil and religious liberty.

It must ever be our proud privilege and most grateful duty to make these public demonstrations occasions for rescuing his name from the unmerited reproach and calumny heaped upon it by the mendacious sycophants of the Young Men's Christian Association, Rev. Joseph Cook, and A. Carey Comstock, and to impress upon the minds of the liberty-loving people of this republic the solemn truth that we are indebted to the genius, courage, and self-sacrifice of such men as D. M. Bennett for the degree of religious liberty we do enjoy.

Never before hav I so realized my lack of ability and littleness as on this occasion, when attempting to address you after the brilliant and thrilling eloquence of the grand veteran orator (Mr. Charles Watts) who has preceded me. But love, gratitude, and admiration of the noble hero and martyr to the cause of Freethought, D. M. Bennett, giv me courage.

I realize is impossible to say anything to his honor that will not be a repetition of what has been oft more ably said. Yet it affords, perhaps, some consolation to know that it is not in the power of his most venomous calumniator, A. Carey Comstock, or even that most experienced professor of malignant mendacity the church has ever produced, the Rev. Joseph Cook, to coin any new lie in regard to him. The vilest and most atrocious they or their satellites can conceive will be but a repetition, a mere echo of what has been uttered before. But this does not lessen our delight to do honor to his memory, and to "stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance," by a recital of some few of his claims to our esteem and regard.

D. M. Bennett never made war on aught that was good, right, pure, or true. He did make terrific and destructiv assaults upon the false dogmas, superstitions, and usurpations of the church. Like Luther, like Wesley, his warfare was not against the good, but the evil foisted on the good; on the wrong perpetrated under the pretense of religion.

It has been the fortune of few men to be so persistently misrepresented and calumniated. Although well known to be a man of genial disposition, of kindly acts, moral incentivs, and noble purposes, he has been—and with persistent malignancy born of defeat and hate, is still—painted by his clerical enemies as a monster of wickedness, a panderer to obscenity, an enemy to morality. This bitter hate and misrepresentation was, and is, because priests and parsons realize how utterly they hav failed to defend the dogmas and superstitions he attacked, and the fallacies which he so clearly exposed. He was an honest, truthful, candid man, possessing the moral integrity and courage to proclaim his convictions in language so clear and plain that the most simple fully understood. He scattered broadcast the seeds of truth. The good he did livs after him. The great work he commenced is still continued in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which he founded, and which, under the able editorship of that most modest, energetic, and talented of his disciples, Eugene M. Macdonald, instead of sinking into oblivion, as they most earnestly hoped and devoutly prayed, is yearly doubling its influence and quadrupling its circulation.

These are the reasons why the church has persecuted D. M. Bennett; why they basely persist in vilifying him even in his grave. They do so in the hope they may thus deter others from daring to giv public utterance to truths prejudicial to the interests of the priesthood.

The arrest and imprisonment of D. M. Bennett was a blow at the rights of every citizen who dares to express his honest convictions, who has the manhood to refuse to fawn and cringe to the power of the church. It should be impressed on the memory of every Liberal that the little pamphlet, "Cupid's Yokes," sent through the mail in response to a decoy letter of the infamous informer, Carey Comstock, had been, and still continues to be, sent through the mails, and no one now pretends to claim sending it by mail is any violation of law. D. M. Bennett was not its author or its publisher. He never wrote or published one line that could he construed into obscenity. The attorney-general, over his own signature, declared the little pamphlet sent through the mail by Mr. Bennett, on which the charge was made, was not obscene.

D. M. Bennett was the first and only prisoner whose pardon was petitioned for by over 200,000 of his fellow-citizens. Twelve thousand personal letters were written requesting remittance of his unjust sentence. On his release he was tendered a reception at Chickering Hall, New York city, which was a grand ovation, between two and three thousand persons being present anxious to honor one whom the power of the church had sought in vain to crush, to silence, and disgrace.

His remains lie in Greenwood Cemetery, covered by a beautiful monument, erected by a thousand friends.

It was the irresistible logic with which he attacked and exposed the fallacies of Christianity that caused the influence of THE TRUTH SEEKER to be so dreaded, and its editor and founder so bitterly assailed. The exactions of the priesthood hav been onerous and heavy. They claim the first fruits of the harvest, and the choicest of the flocks. The fat of the land, as well as the fattest yellow-legged chicken, must always be sacredly set apart for them. D. M. Bennett labored to save us from their exactions and rapacity. Costly temples, cathedrals, churches, and parsonages without number hav been erected for their service and occupation; the money to build and sustain them extorted or cajoled from their dupes, or swindled by church fairs, festivals, grab-bags, donations, and necktie parties from worldlings. D. M. Bennett labored to save us from such waste and demoralizing amusements.

Priests hav ever been a dead weight upon the human race. They hav dwarfed the intellect with superstition, discouraged education and mental liberty, using their every effort to hold the human mind in vassalage to themselvs. D. M. Bennett labored to save and redeem us from this slavery, and deliver us from the incubus of priestcraft. Talent and wealth enough are expended in the support of churches to educate all the young in the truths of science, and provide happy homes for all the aged and infirm. D. M. Bennett labored to save this misapplication of talent, wealth, and energy; to hav every church transformed into an institution of learning, and every priest educated to become a teacher of science, instead of superstition. In the United States there is the enormous sum of over four hundred millions of dollars' worth of property entirely exempt from all taxation. This property belongs to a privileged class, who assume to be better and holier than others, and who claim—and by the government are declared to be—exempt from taxation on that account alone. This property is by unconstitutional law held exempt from taxes the poor widow is compelled to pay. The humble little frame house of the mechanic, the home so long toiled for, earning which exhausted the health and strength, and left the poor man and family of little helpless children dependent on the poor wife and mother's earnings, is sold to pay taxes, while the extravagant and wealthy church, together with fifteen hundred dollars' worth of property for each and every pious preacher, are exempt. D. M. Bennett labored to save the poor from the gross inequality of taxation. Kind friends, let us continue the good work to which he devoted his life. Like him, let us labor for a revival of reason, truth, and common sense; like him, be willing to spend our time, our strength, our lives, in promoting the good of those around us. Like him, let us be fearless in avowing our honest sentiments and convictions. Let us not be governed by the opinions of deluded fanatics or narrow-minded bigots. Let us, like him, under all circumstances and conditions faithfully discharge every duty, ever laboring to increase the happiness of others, and thus best insuring our own.

And last, not least, let us one and all be inspired by his memory to consecrate our lives to the cause. Let us earnestly unite in perfecting the organization of the National Liberal League, so that through its instrumentality we may secure the secularization of our government, afford to all facilities to acquire scientific education, promote sociability, and giv a mighty impetus to the cause of universal mental liberty.

Will the History of the Church Repeat Itself?

It is said that in the affairs of national governments, in the rise and fall of kingdoms and republics, history always has repeated itself; and the argument is often advanced to show the frailty of our boasted strong and powerful republic, of which we now boast as the most powerful nation on earth. Without pausing to show the fallacy or truth of the statement, it doubtless has been true in most of the great affairs of the world that history has repeated itself, and especially among all nations where there has existed so great a diversity of sentiment as has existed in so-called Christian nations and its religions. Nearly nineteen hundred years ago, Jerusalem and vicinity were the seat and location of the Christian religion. There was the home of Jesus himself. There was where he raised the dead to life, and blind to see. There was where the multitudes could and did (as stated) testify to his walking upon the water, and preached for three years the way of salvation according to the decree of his father, who he claimed had sent him. And now I notice the Evangelical periodicals of our country congratulating themselvs upon the great work of foreign missions in establishing Christianity in the ancient city of Jerusalem, and throughout the land of Palestine. Truly may we not reasonably expect that in eighteen hundred years hence we may be visited by missionaries from Jerusalem to teach the way of life (of which they too will then know nothing), and try to lift us out of Mormonism, or some other dogma, which will, perhaps, then hav superseded Christianity? Truly, history is repeating itself.

Blaine and Ingersoll.

The New York Sun of the 12th prints a letter which purports to giv the true relation of Blaine and Ingersoll in this campaign. This letter distorts to his prejudice the fact that Col. Ingersoll is not on the stump this year. The fact is that Col. Ingersoll had planned a trip to the Pacific coast before the nominations were made. He has traveled through Dakota, Montana, Washington territory, and Oregon, and has everywhere met hosts of old friends, who hav given him cordial greeting.

The letter claims there is a coolness between Blaine and Ingersoll, and explains it by referring to Ingersoll's relations to President Hayes, saying: "Ingersoll sought under two administrations recognition for his services as a campaign orator. He said to Hayes that he wanted merely the recognition." The truth is that he never asked Hayes for the office, that he was in Illinois when it was reported that he was to hav the mission to Berlin, and Ingersoll never asked Blaine to help him with Hayes, and was never offended with Blaine because he was not tendered that office. He has never asked any office as a recognition for political services.

The letter continues: "But when it came to the Garfield administration, controled by his two personal friends, Garfield and Blaine, the same policy of non-recognition was pursued." This is untrue. Mr. Ingersoll distinctly told Mr. Garfield that he asked no office for himself, and the personal relations of President Garfield and Mr. Ingersoll were never interrupted up to the day that the president was assassinated. This shows the absolute falsity of this further statement: "Then Ingersoll, who is very sensitiv, withdrew forever from politics, and swore that he would never take any part for any person or party."

The letter then givs an interview with Col. Ingersoll just after Blaine's nomination, in which Ingersoll said he should do nothing in the campaign, and the gentleman replied that was a wise resolution. "How is that?" asked Ingersoll. "It is simply for this reason," he replied, "you can never be recognized by any administration so long as you liv. I believe about as you do about religious matters, but I recognize the fact that there is a sentiment in this country that would break any administration or public man that should appoint you to any office of honor or trust. You are simply ahead of your time, and must abide the consequences. I admire you as much as any man, but I should advise against any recognition of you if I had anything to do with any administration. You ought to be clear-headed enough to see this." This is an assertion that the Republican party is made up of cowards, and any administration it may elect will be too cowardly to recognize an Agnostic. I do not know, and cannot guess, who this Republican orator is, or who the correspondent is; but writing in an atmosphere quivering with the magnetic influence of Blaine, it indicates a degree of cowardice in the "plumed knights" which makes the name a synonym for poltroon. If such men are the spokesmen for Mr. Blaine and his chosen advisers, he may well ask to be delivered from his friends.

This correspondent also asserts that Ingersoll's nominating speech at Cincinnati gave Ingersoll his great success as a lecturer, and lifted him from obscurity into national notice. This is untrue. Ingersoll had a reputation at the bar, and on the political platform in Illinois and the Northwest as the leading lawyer and orator of his day. He had canvassed the state of Maine years before, and was well known there. The Indiana politicians knew him and solicited his support in 1876 for Gov. Morton. When he made his speech at Cincinnati, the tide was against Blaine, but his magnificent eulogy of Blaine would probably hav secured the nomination had the vote been taken the day it was made.

The correspondent concludes: "Mr. Blaine fully appreciates Bob Ingersoll, but he is too good a churchman to ever publicly recognize the greatest Agnostic of the day."

The Agnostics of the country are interested in knowing whether this is true. The writer seems to speak from personal knowledge of Mr. Blaine's views. If it is true, then Agnostics hav nothing to hope from Mr. Blaine's election. They are neither in the mood to trust cowards nor to honor them with their votes. They prefer an open enemy to a pretended friend, who privately assures you that he would recognize you if he dared to, but he must protect himself at your expense.

If a candidate who declared himself in favor of an absolute divorce between church and state in 1874 or 1875, dare not define his position on that question in 1880, but insists that the Morrison tariff is the sole great issue, he notifies the friends of the secular movement that he is ashamed of their company, and will only accept their support when concealed by the secrecy of the ballot. The Secular question is not a purely local one, but is a national question. The United States legislates for the District of Columbia, where the question of the exemption of church property from taxation, and the exclusion of Agnostics from the witness box, are vital questions. Congress legislates for the territories, and the question whether a witness shall be excluded from giving testimony, because he does not believe in a God and hell, is a matter which they not only hav a right to ask Congress to legislate upon, but to expect a president who talks about equality of rights to recommend legislation which shall giv the Agnostic, in territorial courts, the same rights as a Christian. He should also recommend that the laws governing the practice of the United States courts should be so amended that Agnostics and Christians should stand on the same footing, and that mere religious faith, or opinions on religion, should not affect the competency or credibility of witnesses.

These are not local questions, as Mr. Blaine says prohibition is, but national questions, which affect the rights of every man who asks protection to his person or property. They are questions which no candidate has a right to dodge. The protection of human rights rises above the paltry question of the Morrison tariff. The right to testify in civil and criminal cases, to protect person and property in the courts, is a grander issue than protecting the industries of Maine.

Again, it is proposed to donate to the several states millions of dollars for educational purposes. The friends of the churches demand that the fund shall be permitted to go to sectarian schools. Every voter is interested in knowing whether Mr. Blaine, if elected, will veto such a bill, or not. They want to know his position to-day on that question. It is not enough to point to his proposed secular amendment to the Constitution, which he carried through the lower house of Congress in 1875. That read: "No state shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; and no money raised by taxation in any state for the support of public schools, or derived from any public fund therefor, nor any public lands devoted thereto, shall ever be under the control of any religious sect, nor shall any money so raised, or lands so devoted, be divided between religious sects or denominations."

Since Mr. Blaine dodged the question of prohibition in Maine, he cannot expect the friends of Secularism to take his past record as an index of his action if elected president. What will he say now? What does he propose to do in the future? Has he the manliness to state his exact position? Will he, if elected, put up as the Republican sign-board at the White House: "No Agnostics need apply?" Or will he declare that the constitutional provision, "but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States," shall be enforced in spirit as well as in letter?

In 1876, Ingersoll described Blaine as "a man worthy of the past, and prophetic of her future;" "a man who has the audacity of genius;" "a man who is the grandest combination of heart, conscience, and brain beneath her flag;" "the man who, like an intellectual athlete, has stood in the arena of debate and challenged all comers." "For the Republican host, led by this intrepid man, there can be no defeat."

In 1880 and 1884, this eulogy was scattered broadcast by the thousands over the land to secure the nomination of Mr. Blaine. Under that operation he won at Chicago. If he is too good a churchman, as the Sun says, to ever recognize the greatest Agnostic of the day; if he dodges the Secular question, then he has obtained his nomination under false pretenses, and the Republican party may look for defeat.

Washington, Sept. 13, 1884. W. S. BUSH.

MISS WILLARD, of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, sneers at the men who accept the theses of Col. Ingersoll, saying that they are known by their beer and their meerschaums. She believes in prayer, though it failed in Ohio last year. No doubt a Freethinker's vote would be solicited at the polls; but the Union and the party proscribe women and men who are not orthodox.

THE New York Evening Post says that "ministers cannot be expected to know much about the morals of people outside of their congregations." But it is presumed that they know considerable about the morals of people inside their congregations which they would not like to make public.

The League.

The National Liberal League is at last upon a working basis. Heretofore its principal use has been as a figure-head to conceal the individuals really doing the work which should hav been undertaken by the League as an organization. As a rallying point for the auxiliaries, it has, however, been invaluable, and has served, also, as a standard held aloft by a few brave and devoted souls, supported by a few stanch and unflinching Leagues. But it has been only a standard. Within the past two years, certainly, it has not been a real weapon of offense.

The action at Cassadaga has changed all this. The League is now in position for aggressiv warfare upon and resistance to the encroachments on our liberties by the church. Two workers—the nucleus, we believe, of a great army of workers—are to be put into the field. They are to be paid, and can be held responsible. This is a most important change, and an innovation that should hav been introduced earlier in the League's existence. No man can devote his whole time to any work without its yielding him revenue sufficient to support him. And justice can be done to no cause whose advccates are not in the field constantly. Messrs. Putnam and Watts are salaried at $1,500 per year—a small sum for men of their ability—and allowed further a thousand each from lecture receipts to pay traveling expenses. They will hav to travel very economically to stretch this sum—less than $20 per week—over the year. But it is the best the League could do at present, and with it we look for results never before accomplished. The campaign fund, if all raised, will yield $2,000 to be spent in missionary work, which will do a great deal toward righting some of the legal wrongs Freethinkers now suffer, and will also put a large amount of Freethought literature before the people. The Cassadaga Congress emphasized also the amendment to the League Constitution adopted at Milwaukee, which if properly enforced, and we trust the auxiliaries will see that it is, will giv a good reserve. The emphasized amendment is:

"In order to provide an adequate revenue to the treasury of the National League, to enable it to carry out the requirements of sections, 4, 5, and 6 of Article III. of this Constitution, and to do other legitimate work of the League, every auxiliary is requested to contribute a certain sum monthly, not less than five cents per month from each one of its members, for the use of the National League. The amount thus collected should be remitted quarterly on the first day of January, April, July, and October, by the secretary of the auxiliary to the secretary of the National League."

All of this ought to put the League on a substantial basis, and if this is done, with no satisfactory results, we can then inquire into the conduct of the officers. Previous to this Congress, officers hav been elected and told to go ahead and wage warfare upon the foe, and then left to their fate. The new departure is a vast improvement upon the old policy.

The narrowing of the platform to the Nine Demands will undoubtedly prove to be the right thing. Upon these, all Liberals are in accord; upon more, differences of opinion must inevitably exist. And it is in the nature of things that these differences should lead to lukewarmness and apathy, if not to a positiv opposition. Without in any way prejudicing other reforms, the League should insist upon the prominence of its own reforms, and its complete adoption by all parties seeking Liberal aid. There has been some danger that the original objects of the League would be covered up and lost sight of by the multiplicity of planks thrown upon them by individuals who placed certain ideas or notions ahead of Secularization, and under this policy the League was constantly helping others at the expense of its own integrity and influence. The last Congress has rectified this error, and, by narrowing the work, rendered its performance within the immediate probabilities. Our German friend of Milwaukee, the Freidenker, regards this action as retrogressiv, but whether it be or not, it is right, and that should count for something. Concentration of effort upon our demands will effect them; but a scattering fire does little damage to the enemy.

The officers were selected with the view of carrying on the work outlined in the Nine Demands. The Radical Review calls the election of Messrs. Ingersoll and Watts to office a stultification. It does not seem so to us. Who in the country is more worthy of honor from the Liberals than Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll? What living man has spread our principles so widely, or can reflect more credit upon the League? The first vice-president, Mr. Watts, was chosen as a man experienced in organization, of rare abilities as a lecturer, and because he can giv his whole time to the cause. Liberalism is cosmopolitan, and the accident of his birth should not prejudice him in the minds of the people. But if it did, the objection is removed by his declaring his intention of becoming an American citizen. The officers complement the platform, and upon the adoption of that, as in their election, there was perfect unanimity at the Congress. We hope that those of our journals who would like to use the League as an all-around reformatory agent will not refuse to co-operate because it is not inclusiv enough. Too much inclusivness has been found to be a bar to practical work, and certainly every Liberal journal in the country can conscientiously and enthusiastically support the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

The pioneer work of the League—for this is really the beginning of its true existence—is outlined by the secretary in another column. It is his intention to push into new fields, to organi ze new Leagues, and revivify the old ones; to inaugurate the building of Liberal halls in such places as may furnish a sufficient number of Freethinkers to support them, and in all honorable ways to work for the good of Liberalism. It is proposed also to do some legal work, such as the repealing of Sunday laws, of blasphemy laws, and laws disabling Freethinkers in our courts. And the League will take a part in the fight for free and unsectarian schools. In short, the program is to be a vigorous attempt to obtain what for the last ten years the Liberal public has been contented to demand. This program is to be followed year after year, if necessary, till victory is won.

Of course money will be needed. To supply this the campaign fund should be speedily raised. A dollar from each Liberal in the country would swell the amount to enormous proportions. And a dollar is not much to sacrifice for the object of sincere desire. It seems to us that the amount should be not only subscribed but paid in within the next quarter. This first year is experimental, and the continuation of the new policy will depend on the showing the officers make at the next Congress. But let us giv them a generous and hearty support for the next eleven months, so if they fail they cannot say it was the people's fault.

The Necessity for Organized Action.

As if to emphasize the necessity for positiv action by the National Liberal League, the Western papers are chronicling a congress of the "National Reform Association," held on the 16th and 17th of this month at Indianola, Iowa. In the call for the convention, Messrs. R. C. Wylie and M. A. Gault, district secretaries, lament that—

"The United States Constitution makes no mention of almighty God, the author of our nation's existence; nor of Christ, the ruler of nations; nor of the Bible, the fountain of law and morality. This is inconsistent with our Christian usages, and with nearly all our state constitutions. Because of this, Liberalists demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of Christian morality shall be repealed. Many are claiming constitutional liberty to violate the law of the Sabbath, and their claims are legalized by the Supreme Court of California, and many lower courts which hav decided that Sabbath laws are unconstitutional. For the same reason, Infidels and Catholics urge the exclusion of the Bible from the schools. The school boards in most of our large cities hav yielded to this demand, and the Supreme Court of Ohio and many inferior courts hav sustained it. The Liberal Leagues demand under the Constitution the taxation of all church property; and the exclusion of chaplains, religious instruction, and prayer from prisons, asylums, the army and navy, and from Congress and legislatures. Even the government takes character from this fundamental error of the Constitution by requiring no moral qualification for civil rulers, and by Congress, the post-office department, and railroad corporations openly and persistently violating the law of the Sabbath. Official and political corruption everywhere prevail as the legitimate result of a government ignoring the divine law-giver."

The object of this National Reform Association, as we hav before pointed out, is, to use the district secretaries' own words, to "secure such an amendment of the Constitution as will suitably acknowledge almighty God as the author of the nation's existence, and the ultimate source of its authority; Jesus Christ as its ruler, and the Bible as the supreme rule of its conduct, and thus indicate that this is a Christian nation; and place all Christian laws, institutions, and usages on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land."

Among the subjects discussed at this convention were some with such suggestivly retrogressiv titles as "Is there a Higher Law than the Will of the People?" a query the society answers in the affirmativ; the "Bible the Life of the Nation," an assertion contradictory of all American principles of government; "Sabbath Laws—How can they be Maintained?" "What will the Religious Amendment Affect?" "The Highest Law for Nations;" and others of the same nature.

This convention was for the state of Iowa. The national association is every year perfecting its organization, begun in 1863, and now it has district branches in most of the eastern and middle states. Some of the highest dignitaries and most influential men in the churches are promoters and contributors to its purposes. It belongs to no particular sect, but is a movement of the whole church toward a union with the national government—stronger than any mere state—in which the latter shall be tributary to the hosts of Christ and subordinate in all matters which the church shall presume to take to herself for decision, such as the enforcement of "Christian morality" and the suppression of individual right of judgment. The movement is a dangerously formidable effort to establish the dogma of a "higher law than the will of the people," and should be met and thwarted at every turn by the League. Should it be allowed to grow unopposed, the people will lose liberties now possessed, and the country be whirled back to medieval hierarchism. Its proximity to success in the Senate in 1876 has emboldened the association, and it has strong hopes of securing its ends when next the trial is made.

The new officers of our League will find in this society something tangible to combat—something which must be combated if our Union is to remain even partially free.

Of Course.

At one of their meetings recently, the resident and visiting clergymen of Saratoga discussed "the relation of scientific and philosophical thought to the Christian pulpit." The conclusion arrived at was that the ministers, of this country at least, had better stick to the assumption of plenary inspiration, and preach precisely as though the truth of the Bible had never been disputed. The sense of the meeting was that science and philosophy should be left severely alone.

The Independent coincides with this view. In its judgment, "the Christian pulpit is not the fitting place for such discussions. But few ministers are really competent for the task; and if all ministers were competent, there are but few persons in an ordinary congregation competent to understand and appreciate such a discussion. The attempt, in most cases, would be a failure on the part of the preacher, and would be more likely to generate and make difficulties than remove them."

The Christian Advocate also says "the proper place for philosophical disquisition is not in the pulpit." And again:

"The time was when science, star-eyed, though patient and plodding, felt itself honored, or, at least, was content to be called the handmaid of religion, though the service rendered to religion during the Middle Ages was not much to speak of. In these latter days, which hav brought to us such vast conundrums as to the relations of masters and men, and such upsettings of the old social order of things, it may be expected that science will assume a new role. To say the least, the pages of the great ledger are yet open. The account is not closed. In assuming the place of arrogant mistress, as well as handmaid, it may be that science will fail of any service to the Christian religion."

This arraying the church against science is no more than must be looked for in consistent Christians, but it will surely be calamitous to the church.

Broadly, science consists of what is true. If the church is to take sides against the truth, her days may be reckoned as very few in the land our forefathers gave her. Already there is in the minds of thousands upon thousands of sincere church-members—honest men and women, and not mere worldly hypocrits looking upon the church as an aid to business—grave doubts of the truth of the scriptures and of the plan of salvation. The attempt to stifle this uneasiness of faith can only result in compelling a further examination of the evidences of Christianity. Science is now regarded by two-thirds of the civilized world as the one means of ascertaining truth. In itself it is truth. And if the doubter is authoritativly informed that science and Christianity are at war, that one cannot be discussed by the exponents of the other, then his resolution will be quickly taken. He will adhere to what he knows, to what can be demonstrated, and faith will hav to whistle for her converts.

We are glad, though, that the church shows signs of being honest in this. The decision makes things clearer. It draws the line just where the line exists, but which was in danger of being obscured by the mixture of reason and revelation by such eminent professors of both as Beecher and Chadwick, who are in reality bald Infidels, but skilfully conceal their want of faith under clouds of beautiful but meaningless rhetoric.

Let the line be sharply drawn by every minister in the country, and see how many are got to stand within the fold. We will guarantee the smallness of the number will surprise some religious editors.

Stop This Nonsense.

On Coaster's Harbor Island the government has erected a college to instruct the officers of the navy in the art of "blowing into eternal froth" the brains of our country's enemies. Last Saturday Admiral Luce, just detached from command of the North Atlantic squadron, proceeded to the island to "christen" the college. Arriving at the building, he put his hand upon the door and said:

"Know all men by these presents, and in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, I christen this building the War College of the American Navy."

Will Admiral Luce point out the laws authorizing him to lug a special religion—and the most absurdly superstitious part of that religion, at that—into his official actions as representativ of the United States? Most of the people of this country do not believe in the Holy Ghost, hav little faith in the Son, and are in doubt as to the existence of the Father. Their money helped pay for the building of the college, and their money pays Admiral Luce for his services. To them his mummery is a gross insult, and flagrant abuse of official position. If he is not acquainted with the Constitution and national laws of the country whose flag he has dishonored, let him ask one of his midshipmen. A babe in pinafore would appear to be his superior in knowledge of the Constitution.

Editorial Notes.

WHATEVER may be the difference of opinion between the Spiritualists and Materialists, and whatever may be thought of the efficiency of Mr. Watts's reply to Mr. Chainey at the Cassadaga meeting, we submit that the distorted report of his speech by Lewise Oliver in the Spiritual Offering is an outrage. Without giving even the substance of Mr. Watts's words, the self-sufficient scribe (whose "pen never failed to defend" him) abuses the orator in this way: "Yesterday, Sunday, in a lecture upon 'From Day to Night and From Night to Day,' he [Mr. Chainey] took up the subject [of his 'conversion'] at greater length, assuring the Materialists that he was becoming sensualized as well as others, that the tendency of Materialism was to demoralization, giving them to understand that he was well aware of their disparaging remarks, their ridicule, etc., and in his usual eloquent manner and glowing periods completed their discomfiture. Then they rallied around the John Bull of their herd, Mr. Watts, of England, who was booked for a speech in the evening. You should hav heard him—language fails me. Figurativly, he bellowed, he stamped with his hoofs, he gored with his horns, he tore up the earth about him, casting the turf and stones into the faces of the Spiritualists. The misrepresentations and perversions, from beginning to end, were marvelous; he accused Chainey of being too womanly, he ridiculed his soft voice and reaffirmed the unwarrantable gossip that a woman had, or could hav, converted him. His greedy, bulging eyes glared like those of a snake swallowing a toad. After he had finished his disgusting personalities he pounced upon Spiritualism. 'What is a spirit?' he demanded, 'and who ever saw one?' and the whisper ran round, 'Not he, any more than an ox.' He had 'been at seances and circles and had never witnessed any genuin manifestations!' Can spiritual manifestations come to a hide-bound buffalo of the plains, or a hippopotamus of rivers dank? Let the beef-consuming, ale-guzzling Englishman talk of something for which he has a capacity, the material things of this earth, and the irreligious inconsistencies of similar men who hav preceded him. But he would do well to hesitate before again addressing an audience composed largely of intelligent women, who, he said, 'should never enter man's domain!' You would hav thought he was the pope of Rome, and that he was issuing a 'bull' to us. It is he who should never, in this life, again attempt to enter woman's domain of spirituality, unless he puts himself in training, and upon a diet calculated to reduce his surplus corporosity. Any pure spirit could not get within one sphere of those dreadful eyes; and it is small wonder that he 'spoils all the conditions.'"

IN sending us the following clipping from the World of Sept. 12th—which prints it under the caption of "Poor old Hayes—cut by friends, ignored by strangers, and despised by all"—Mr. E. W. Chamberlain says: "I believe it would be gratifying to 'the old lion's whelps' if you were to reproduce what the World of this date says about the infamous wretch who, knowing and admitting our noble old hero's entire innocence, still refused, from sordid motivs of policy, to relieve him by pardon from the outrageous sentence inflicted upon him by a time-serving judge. This wretch is president of a 'Prison Reform Association.' A nice association it must be! I hope you don't forget that when Hayes's duplicity and meanness became known to our hero, 'the whelps' received this message from Mr. Bennett: 'Don't any of you ever again ask Hayes to pardon me.'" The body of the dispatch from Saratoga reads: "'A rural-looking gentleman, wearing a shiny, old alpaca coat, was pointed out on the United States Hotel piazza as Mr. Hayes, formerly president of the United States. He sat in a corner, quite apart from any of the guests, and looked thoroughly lonesome and out of place as he ran his fingers mechanically through his beard, that is rapidly showing streaks of gray. He has been here several days attending the meetings of the Prison Reform Association. Except at these meetings he has not been seen to talk to any of the guests, though the house is full of prominent men and women who know him well—they say too well. But the ex-president is being politely cut and deliberately shunned. At his approach there is a quiet dropping of eyes and an increased attention to other things. He sneaks in and out of the dining-room unattended and is almost the only one of the three hundred guests who dines quite alone. And yet in the same dining-room, almost at his elbow, certainly within eyesight, there are fifty men whom he once called friend. He seems the more out of place because of the absence of Mrs. Hayes, who so frequently accompanies him. 'Poor Hayes,' whispered a politician of national note, pointing to the ex-president, 'he seems to be utterly ignored. And this contempt, do you know, is not because he stole the presidency. Why, that has been forgiven long ago. It is altogether a personal feeling expressiv of disgust at the littleness of the man's character, at his commonplace mediocrity. The Americans are a generous people and can't bear a stingy man, and his stinginess has done more to ostracize him than any other quality. I guess that is why I dislike him.'"

THE Rev. Tiddy Witt Talmage is responsible for a good deal of rotten pulpit oratory, but about the worst specimen of his decayed buncombe is this from his last Sunday's sermon:

"It is a notorious fact and most alarmingly patent that suicide is on the increase. Agnosticism and Infidelity are the causes, and they are doing their work well. Never a man yet committed self-destruction who had faith in the life to come. Infidelity has always been apologetic for self-immolation, and Agnosticism has impelled its victim to hurl himself into the oblivious nowhere or the glorious somewhere. Rousseau, Gibbon, Hume, Montaigne, and Voltaire are the apostles of Infidelity, and their victims are legion. Beware this terrible specter. It is the leper of creatures and the buzzard of nations. Part man, part vulture, part leopard, part reptil, its hands are red with gore, and its feet crimson with human blood. Suicide ever follows in its track. Life is a special trust to us from God. Make the best of things, not the worst. Seek not to break the rim which surrounds us, nor to peer into eternity. Liv a Christian life, and God in his own good time will reward it with a Christian immortality."

This has not even the merit of originality. It is but an echo of an editorial in the Tribune of the Sunday previous. The editors of that journal are such notoriously prejudiced persons that we had not thought it worth while to notice them, but now that their misstatement has started on its rounds, we just rise to remark that of the many cases of suicide lately occurring, not one has been of an Infidel, but many of good Christians who were induced to commit the rash act by the hope of escaping worldly troubles, and enjoying the celestial bliss pictured up by the advocates of Christianity. That the world may be better off without their presence has no necessary connection with the impelling motiv.

HAVING been accused of the fearful crime of receiving pay for attending a miners' meeting at Crewe, and taunted with not having denied it, Mr. Bradlaugh mildly says to his Christian critics: "I did not deny the suggestion because I was unaware it had been made. As a matter of fact, except from the annual miners' meetings I hav never in my life received one farthing, even for traveling or hotel bill, in connection with any outdoor meeting, although I hav often paid very heavily. The miners after their demonstrations usually vote and send me a sum intended to cover, but not always covering, the traveling and hotel bill, but even in these cases it has always been at their own instance and without any demand or suggestion by me. In several instances I made very much larger donations to miners suffering from explosion or on strike. As I hav no sort of fortune and no means except what I earn from day to day with tongue and pen, I should hav seen no shame in being paid if the Crewe meeting had been one at which payment had been charged for admission; but it has been a rule of my life, without exception, never to charge or accept payment for attending free public meetings on the political questions of the day. It is true that my tongue now often earns large sums, if it did not I should hav to starve; but it is also true that I giv from the earnings of my tongue to help working men larger sums than most public men. I do not want to boast of this, but Conservativ journalists should hav a little decency."

THE Observer, Presbyterian, of this city, laments the effort to secularize the first day of the week, which it says has "again broken out East and West, and is sweeping over wide sections of our country. It begins in the cities, of course, but it does not stop in them, but runs through the land." The most discouraging feature of the effort at secularization of the Christian holy day, the Observer thinks, is that very many Christians, and even Christian ministers, seem to hav so far yielded to the temptation to join in this movement in some of its varied forms, and that thus their conservativ influence has been lost. It asks: "What use is it for preachers to declaim about Sunday railroad trains, as long as they use them? Or, for laymen to cry out against them, and hold their stocks and draw their dividends from them without protest or rebuke?" What the Observer views with discouragement is precisely the peg upon which many hang their optimistic hopes. Liberalism, secularism, is getting into the churches, and finding congenial soil only in activ brains naturally mounts some pulpits—for there are many wide-awake ministers—instead of going to sleep in truly orthodox pews. But who ever knew of a really conservativ minister rebuking his wealthy supporters for contributing money from dividends earned by Sunday trains? When self-interest conflicts with Christianity, the latter loses. Hypocrits are they, every one—just such fellows as Jesus is said to hav driven from the temple in Jerusalem!

MR. WILLIAM FLORENCE, the actor, and Mgr. Capel, the famous prelate, hav been friends for a number of years. It is not known whether a trifling incident which occurred a few days ago has interrupted their friendly relations. They met on the street in Chicago, and after a general conversation, Florence asked Capel whether he had ever spent an evening at the theater, intending in case of an affirmativ reply to invite him to one of his performances. Capel shook his head. "No," said he. "It has been twenty-four years since I attended a theater, and I cannot conscientiously bring myself to patronize a place where the devil is preached." Mr. Florence protested that the monsignor placed a false estimate on the theatrical profession. "Ah, no," replied Capel with a sad smile. "You people are sincere enough; you don't know it, but you preach the devil all the same." "Well, your grace," inquired Florence, with great urbanity, "which is worse—preaching the devil from the stage without knowing it, or preaching Christ crucified from the pulpit and not believing it?" "Both are reprehensible," replied Mgr. Capel, and bowing stiffly he went his way.

THE New York Christian at Work observes that, with all that may be said of an encouraging and hopeful nature respecting the progress of Christianity, "the Christian sky is not altogether clear and roseate—many a cloud hangs over the horizon," while "in the rural districts the God of our fathers continues to be worshiped with devout sincerity, and by ever-increasing numbers. In our great cities Agnosticism and indifferentism are, it must be frankly confessed, two evils so widely prevalent and so hateful in their results as to awaken the saddest, not to say most alarming, reflections." The editor states that inquiry in one manufactory where forty-five men were employed, showed that there was but one of them a professing Christian, and in another where were over one hundred workmen, but four ever entered the sanctuary, except, perhaps, to attend a funeral or a wedding. One thing he observed with surprise in his investigations, that "the more intelligent of the workingmen" were the most ready to deny the doctrins of Christianity, and advocate Agnostic and skeptical views.

THE Bennett Memorial Services of the Freethinkers' Convention, printed in another part of this paper, cannot be read without stirring anew the feelings of love and admiration for a man whose memory it is a sacred privilege to honor. Mr. Bennett was one of those who, like Thomas Paine, were anxious, if there was to be war, that it might come in their day, that their children should hav peace. The war which he waged was a necessary one, and, as the principle for which he contended is now everywhere tacitly conceded to be the true one, and as the book for selling which he was imprisoned has ever since passed unmolested through the mails, he was assuredly victorious. But for the heroism and martyrdom of D. M. Bennett this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER might not hav seen the light.

WHENEVER a Christian is driven to the wall by the analytical Infidel, and he has to admit that the Bible is not historically defensible—that it is mostly anonymous, contradictory, absurd, and self-destructiv—he puts out as a last shield the proposition, "Well, it teaches morals anyway." Mr. Remsburg's Cassadaga speech breaks through this shield completely, and shows some twenty crimes that the Bible, directly and indirectly, commands or sanctions, and that it is the most immoral of books when taken as a guide. We shall begin the publication of this address within the next two weeks, and also put it into pamphlet form at twenty-five cents. Orders for either paper or pamphlet will be received now. The essay is to the Bible what "False Claims" is to the church—a dynamite bomb completely shattering its pretensions.

THE clergymen of New South Wales, assisted by their lay supporters, recently waited upon the Premier with the stupendously arrogant request that he suppress Freethought lectures and entertainments on Sunday evenings. They met, however, with little success, the Premier informing the pious bigots that he had no power to grant their prayer.

THE Canadians hav kept Mr. Watts so busy that he has not had time to write out his reply to Mr. Chainey. He has, however, found opportunity to promis it soon, and those interested in the discussion of Spiritualism may look for it within the next two weeks.

Letters from Friends.

BURR OAK, MICH., Sept. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am now fully satisfied that the members of every Christian home in the land ought to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER. When it publishes letters from members of the Salvation Army, isn't that proof that it is an orthodox paper? In the issue of Sept. 6th, "J. H. P." giv us to understand that there are "vile Infidels, pretending to be converted so that they might use the cloak of religion to accomplish their wicked aims." From this I learn that religion has a cloak. Any "vile Infidel," trying to accomplish a "wicked aim," who would "use the cloak of religion," instead of getting one of his own, ought to be "fired out" so quickly that he would think he was Saul of Tarsus on his way to Dam—if I can remember where he was going. There is a grave query here. When they are all dressed much alike, and all pray much alike, how can we tell which are the "vile Infidels," and which the woolly kind who need a shepherd, and who sometimes make their peculiar noise so loudly that the ungodly policemen are obliged to "gather them in" to the calaboose fold? "J. H. P." considers "the Salvation Army the most consistent set of Christians in this or any other country." I don't know whether that is true or not, but in the absence of accurate statistics from all parts of the globe, I do not feel justified in denying it. They hav done more good than "cold Infidelity has or ever will." I rather think that is true; that is, if the Infidelity is very cold. This cold Infidelity has been making trouble among the Liberals this summer, but I did not suppose the Salvation brother had found it out. Then he says: "Look at the enormous number of drunkards, thieves, blasphemers, and other sinners of all kinds that they hav reformed and snatched from a terrible doom—an everlasting hell." Of course the invitation to "look" is extended to everybody, and I am ready. I stand prepared to start any day—yea, even to rise from my downy couch at any minute of the night, to borrow a "biled" shirt and start for New York to feast my gaze on that "mastodonic aggregation," that "greatest of all shows." But "J. H. P." must guarantee that the whole affair will be on exhibition—the everlasting hell and all. Perhaps the brother can get the use of Central Park, or some good site over in godly Brooklyn, upon which to set up his show, and during the winter he may make Barnum think that his (Barnum's) is only a side-show. I will borrow an opera-glass, but I can't agree to giv even a glance at a sinner who was saved by the persuasiv power of eloquence or the touching appeal of pathos. In order to remove all suspicion of any "snide" about this exhibition, our good brother must be prepared to furnish vouchers for the fact that every one of them was snatched from a terrible doom. Every sinner who was not snatched will be ruled out.

"J. H. P." pleads guilty to visiting a place called Freehold, N. J. I suppose N. J. stands for New Jersey, or some other "furrin" country adjacent to the United States. "There is a branch of the Army" there, "led by two estimable young ladies." This statement is immediately followed by one that there are "some young men who hav joined the Army there," and "thereby hangs a tale." And "the change that has come over them is something that both themselvs [there are two of them, it seems] and their friends may well be proud of." Frankly, this boast is premature. "J. H. P." should hav waited at least one year before saying this. Those who hav watched the salvation business for many years will hav a lurking suspicion that it would not be extremely surprising if, in less than that time, there should be some changes in the vicinity of Freehold, of which the young men and their friends will not be at all proud. Then there are others who "would willingly respond to any inquiries," etc. Thanks, brother. I will take your word about the "peace and comfort" without making "any inquiries." "And they are not done in Freehold yet!" Freehold must be a stronghold of sin. Alas, for Freehold! What Sodomic sins (I think that is a new adjectiv. I giv it for the benefit of the clergy) hast thou committed? Thou art threatened with an everlasting siege, a picture of whose horrors will make the Bartholdi statue weep. The captain's ultimatum has been issued. They "will never rest until they save every soul in the place," but the devil may hav the bodies for all they care.

Then comes this stunner: "Can your useless Infidelity boast of ever having reformed a drunkard, a thief, or a criminal of any kind?" This question plainly demands a negativ answer, and I am constrained to admit that it cannot. Useless Infidelity is very much like useless Christianity. We are just now trying to rid the earth of both of them, but let me here assure "J. H. P." that a man's reformation depends vastly more on himself than it does on either Infidelity or Christianity. Again: "At almost any time in any of our cities drunken men may be seen staggering along our streets, yelling and cursing, entirely unmolested by the police authorities." That is bad, if true; but then you know, "J. H. P.," this is a Christian country. Then we are told that "a rum-soaked politician may get up on a platform," and shout and yell politics for hours to "the hardest and roughest set of men that could be gathered together, calling one candidate a liar, another a thief, and so on." And never says a good word for anybody, I suppose. I must admit that "a rum-soaked politician" on a platform calling one candidate a liar, and another a thief, with a hard crowd around him, does not present a remarkably dignified spectacle; but who was the politician, on which street was the platform, and who were the candidates, one of whom was a liar, and the other a thief, according to the r.-s. p.? Giv us names and places. That statement was altogether too general. We may want to hunt down that politician and those candidates, to find out whether one was really rum-soaked, another a liar, and the third a thief. "J. H. P." assures us that the "Salvation Army will continue 'marching on to war' when Infidelity and aristocratic Christianity are numbered with the things of the past." We thank thee, thou noble reformer. Infidelity must "go," but it will make its exit in aristocratic company. The low refuse and trash, the dirty, useless rubbish, will be left with the Salvation Army. But what in the name of heaven and—all the other places—will be the use of "marching on to war" when the enemy has been squelched, pulverized, annihilated? This Army has developed the war spirit so strongly that this modern Alexander is even now sighing for other worlds to conquer. "But God is on their side, and they are bound to prosper." If they can't hold their own with a "rum-soaked politician calling one candidate a liar and another a thief," it strides me that God is a very slim support, or else "J. H. P." is mistaken in supposing that "God is on their side."

Whereas "J. H. P." has evidently enlisted for the entire campaign, and whereas it is only a question of time when Freehold, N. J., must unconditionally surrender, in consideration of these things, I hereby promis, in the presence of all the occupants of THE TRUTH SEEKER reading-room, that just as soon as I find a real, wrinkly ram's horn, one of the kind which the priests blew that day the wall of Jericho "fell down flat," I will send it, neatly done up in tissue paper, with a motto and my compliments to "J. H. P." for his kind invitation to come and see his "unparalleled show."

Come again, "J. H. P.," and bring your wife along. Step right into the reading-room. The Liberals hav been rather surly for some time, and they need some sort of curiosity to wake them up and put them in good humor. N. G. W.

HATBORO, PA., Aug. 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of August 23d, Mr. Willis writes under "Red-Hot Politics." He says if Cleveland or Butler is elected, we will hav a solid Democratic South, with a solid Democratic North, and you and I and every friend of freedon and liberty will soon become the vassals of the dictation of the solid South. So we are going to hav a solid Democratic North, too, if either of these men is elected. We hav heard a good deal of bloody-banner talk, and solid South from red-hot Republicans, but Mr. Willis is not only red-hot, but still heating. We had hoped this bloody talk about the South, and this mixing religion, and other side issues, in politics, were among the things of the past, and that we would hav a fair issue once. He says, "For sixty-three years I hav watched the solid South [a good while]. To-day she is as disloyal as she was in 1860, only let her hav power." Such language as the above needs no comment. In April, 1861, I enlisted in the first call for troops. I believed the South was wrong, and the Union should be preserved at all hazard. I am glad slavery was wiped out, but I hav thought maybe had some of us in the North been brought up in the South we might hav gone with the masses. Locality and training often hav much to do with one's opinion. Now let us be honest. We sometimes find fault with Christian bigots, and bigoted Christians hav used and treated Infidels and Atheists as though they were brutes; and yet they were honest. Many of the Southerners fought and acted as though they believed they were justifiable in what they were doing. Mr. Willis may be a Liberal. I used to think the Christian's hate toward the unbeliever was the worst hate imaginable. We presume Mr. Willis believes the only road to salvation for those who fought against the government is through the Republican party. They washed away the sins of the meek and lowly. Mosby and others, poor fellows! hardly know now that they ever belonged to the solid South, and committed the unpardonable sin. Mr. Willis's talk about Ku Klux is the old story told every presidential campaign, but which lies dormant for four years after. He says, "Look at that noble resolution of James G. Blaine's in December, 1875, worthy of the thanks of every Liberal Freethinker." What was that resolution? If Mr. Blaine has done more for the Freethinkers than Grover Cleveland, let us know it.

In an article by J. E. Remsburg, the writer asks, "How shall we vote?" The choice of Liberals is not between Blaine and Cleveland, but between the Republican party and the Democratic party. Mr. Remsburg says, "I hav thus far adhered to the Republican party because that party is the enemy of the Catholic church, the most dangerous superstition of the age." We will ask Mr. Remsburg who imprisoned Mr. Bennett for his honest opinion. Was it the Catholics? Several Freethinkers hav been arrested on trumped-up charges within a few years past, all on account of their disbelief in orthodox Christianity. Was it done by Catholics and Democrats, or were they Protestants and Republicans? Will Mr. Remsburg please answer? I am not pleading for the Catholic church. I believe unless church and state are kept entirely separate, no matter which should gain the ascendency, Protestants or Catholics, the country is doomed. Mr. Remsburg has said and done many good things; he has struck heavy blows at superstition, and deserves much credit, but isn't he taking a little Republican sugar in his Liberalism now?

Yours, A. J. READING.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., Sept. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I wish those scribblers in THE TRUTH SEEKER against the Republican party would stick to the truth and not misrepresent as they do. The writer from Corn-Planter, Pa., said J. G. Blaine is a Catholic. It's not true. He makes general charges without proof. He lauds Ben Butler. Now I defy him to produce a greater tyrant than Butler is. He took the Back Salary grab of five thousand dollars; Blaine did not. Butler goes for pensioning rebel soldiers. If president, I hav no doubt he would go for paying for every slave set free. I hav no patience with such scribblers who chime in with such howlers as Higginson, Schurz & Co. No political party on earth has done so much for the country and humanity as the Republican party has. A pretty idea to pay traitors who murdered hundreds of thousands of our loyal soldiers, and giv them life pensions for the crime. That is what Butler recommends. He lies about his forty years' work for the laboring man.

Please insert this. Yours, H. WILLIS.

BURTON, TEX., Sept. 1, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Is it not strange that we can hear nothing of these Ku Klux outrages, or disloyalty of the "solid South," and the general abuse of those people coming from the North, until the candidates for president are brought out? But, on the other hand, the two sections at other times can shake hands cordially across the bloody chasm; meet at each other's reunions to decorate the graves of those who fell on each side; and each vowing that it is best and wise that it is thus; the tomahawk be forever buried, never to be unearthed. But let the contest come for election of president, and the bloody shirt as usual is brought out at once; the bloodhounds of lies and slander are unyoked and started on their hunt for blood and crime; and soon we see in every paper such reports as that of H. Willis, who goes back to '79, and from one or two butcheries of the blacks by some lawless scamp, he weaves a thousand crimes; and winds up by saying we people are just as disloyal as ever, and require still the master's rod over us to keep us down. Why don't he hav something to say about the negro Rugg, and many other such, so cruelly slaying so many of his own defenseless color? No, the poor, old, blind, and aged can be butchered in their own quiet homes in their midst; but Mr. Willis and his scandalizing friends can see no cruelty in this at all. It is never thought of or mentioned after the first excitment is over. To do so would not serve their purposes in carrying the election.

I mentioned this Rugg case because he appears to hav been more fortunate than the rest in evading the law and in slaying more victims; but scarcely a week passes that I don't notice cold-blooded murders committed in some portions of the North, mostly women and old men, and many by negroes too. They seem to be taking the Indian's mode of retaliation, i. e., if the proper one cannot be found, any other of his tribe will suffice for revenge. These people hav long since found out who it was that enticed them by fair promises of land, etc., to leave their Southern homes to emigrate to a far-off chilly climate, where so many perished, and suffered so much before they could work their way back South; and all this, too, for political purposes. When the North, and South, too, can scourge the country of such low-down political workers, and elect such a man president as Gen. Butler, then I will begin to hav hope for the future welfare of this country; but the way things hav been going on, especially the last few years, our system of government will soon prove a grand failure, and wind up with a war that the last would not compare with.

Yours truly, H. B. JONES.

GAHANNA, OHIO, Sept. 11, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It seems strange that a man calling himself a Liberal should work against the Republican party—a party that has done more for the country than any other party that has ever existed. Now, there are mean men in the party, but that proves nothing. The party as an organiization has always been on the right side. So, too, there are good Democrats, as neighbors and citizens—but that proves nothing. For the fact stares us in the face that the Democratic party does not now and has not for over thirty years favored free speech. Examin its course, and you will find that it has opposed education, Liberalism, progress, and universal suffrage. In many parts of the South the Democratic party has driven away, and in some instances maltreated unto death, Greenback, Independent, and Republican orators. Greenback principles were spreading rapidly at one time in the South. But the Democratic press set up the howl that "those that are not for us are against us," and Greenbackism soon became pretty effectually squelched out. A writer from Tennessee, in the last number of the Toledo Blade, says he can show the graves of six white men, who were in the Union army, and after the war were Republicans. They were taken out in the dead of night, and killed. One of them was said writer's neighbor. A little daughter followed the Klan along to the gate and begged them with tears streaming down her cheeks to spare her papa. No, the demons in human form cursed her and told her she could see her damned old Yankee father in the morning. He was found dead next day, not far from his farm, where they had shot him. The Democratic papers make little of this murder business, and call it "waving the bloody shirt," and try to lay these murders to some other cause. But it is all done to keep a solid South to menace the government. Gentlemen, these murders are political, from the fact that the victims are never Democrats. The Democratic orators and Democratic press never condemn these outrages, but either speak in extenuation of them or deny them in toto. The Democratic party's cry of reform is sheer hypocrisy, as evidenced by the abuse heaped on Senator Geo. H. Pendleton, for his authorship of the civil service bill. For that act, Pendleton to-day is a nonentity in the party. Why, all that is necessary to make a truth seeker a good Republican is to reside in a partly Democratic community for a short time. Nine-tenths of the saloon loafers in my town are Democrats, and are opposed to woman suffrage and every move of a progressiv nature. And I make the assertion that this is the case all over the land.

Now the election is coming on apace. No third or fourth party has a ghost of a chance. It is to be either Blaine or Cleveland. Cleveland has nothing to recommend him to the people but a life-long adherence to the Democratic party—that alone should condemn him; while Blaine's course has been that of a patriotic American. As a Spiritualistic Infidel, I say, Hurrah for Blaine! WALLACE MOORE.

JACKSON, MICH., Sept. 9, 284.

MR. EDITOR: How is it possible for anyone with a spark of humane feeling to look upon the horribly graphic illustration and read the intense and thrilling poem by Elliott Preston, "The Vivisector's Death-bed," together with the remarks and extracts from letters, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 6th, and not be profoundly impressed with the need of earnest efforts to procure the abolishment of vivisection? Whether it is justifiable to shock the sensibilities by such illustrations, poems, and articles will perhaps be questioned. At first thought it seems not to be, but when we consider how indifferent people are to the most monstrous wrongs, if they hav only heard of them in a general way, or if they are not personally affected by them, it is apparent that oftentimes the only way to bring them to a realization is to shock them into it. The fearful curse of human slavery would never hav been overthrown had it not been for the heroic course of those grand old anti-slavery agitators, who in the face of ridicule and persecution dared to drag the crime of slavery to the judgment-bar of the tribunal of eternal justice. In no way could this hav been done so effectually as by an exposure of the terrible atrocities committed under the sanction of that "divine institution." As with slavery, so now with vivisection; painful though the task is, it may be necessary. May the time hasten when such means will not be needed, when such evils will cease to hav an existence. How thankful I hav often felt in having been too young to realize the horrors of slavery! And now behold a worse evil in some respects than slavery is here. There is a significant lesson taught by this poem and illustration which applies to more than vivisection. It is this, that retribution always follows the commission of evil deeds; that sooner or later an awakened conscience with remorseful sting will bring the erring human soul to judgment, until, purified and repentant, it resolves to "sin no more." The bed of death is not always the opening nor the closing scene. We are accountable beings—accountable, not to an imaginary God, but to the moral law which governs the spiritual and soul elements of the universe, as physical law controls the material. When we violate that law we must pay the penalty, as when a physical law is disobeyed we must suffer in consequence. Each act of life, whether for good or evil, possesses inherently the germs of compensation or of retribution, and will make its impress on the character. One cause of so much injustice and wrong-doing is the false teachings of theology that faith, not good deeds, is the way to salvation; that, no matter how vile and wicked the sins committed, they can all be forgiven and the penalty escaped. These erroneous doctrins hav greatly retarded the moral development of mankind, but a new era is dawning, in which the humanitarian element will more largely predominate than it now does, or ever has done in the past; when our duties to ourselvs, to each other, to all animate existence, shall be better understood and more nobly fulfilled.

MATTIE C. MITCHELL.

ALEXANDRIA, Sept. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read Mr. Chainey's expression at Cassadaga Lake, with great sorrow. I hav no objection to Mr. Chainey being a Spiritualist, but I do wish he had passed quietly and directly from his former religious whim to his present fancy, as I fear all the good he ever did will be more than counterbalanced by the weakness of mind he is now showing. Mr. Chainey, as near as I can see, is "un enfant gate." He has been spoilt by too much petting, and nothing but high sensations can stay his craving appetite for emotion. I can but pity the (otherwise) good man. The emotion of his spirit fancy (not belief) will not always last. His mother with excessiv kindness, and his church with fiction, hav poisoned his mind, and now permanency is poison to him and he must be fed with novelties; and when one's system ceases to digest the high stimulant of Spiritualism, what can he resort to next? Mr. Chainey is not a Spiritualist; at least, he givs no reason for his being one, except his fancy. I am sure no one could interpret his discourse at Cassadaga Lake otherwise. He makes the blunder common to all Spiritualists, to all postulants on any unknown subjects, which has also been the common blunder of all religious people. He makes a god of his ignorance. I will here repeat what I hav several times said before: a man is not an individual separate from the rest of the universe, or from other men; life is composed of two elements—one is the body, and the other is the air which we breathe and in which we move; put a man where this air is not, and the man is no more. He does not die; he has no need of dying, as without this indispensable component of life, his body is a dead mass of matter. In this part of life—the air—we all liv in common, as one whole existence; we are identical only in our body, and then only as a limb of a living whole; and detached or displaced from our proper position in the whole embodiment, this limb livs no more, but goes to fragments to mix up with the big bulk of similar substances to again help form limbs of the living whole, and I am of opinion that the portion of air, or the other component of life (call it what you like), also returns to the big bulk, and that individuals hav no identity after death; but in this I will not be positiv. I remain open to conviction, but let us see the first proof and hear the first convincing argument in support of personal identity after death. No such proof or argument has been produced yet. We all know more or less about the extraordinary freaks of nature; we all admit that great wonders are performed and not yet explained, but for God's (or any other fancy's) sake, do tell us what proof you hav that those phenomena are caused by the (imaginary, for all we know) spirits of departed friends or foes, any more than by the still existing and partially disorganized spirits of the occupants of the nearest insane asylum. If you possess convincing evidence that either is the case, why not giv it to the world? The only argument yet offered is the cherished Christian fancy of immortality. On the wings of this delicious fancy they fly to the desired conclusion, and thus, as the Indian did when prompted by fear, make a god of their ignorance. An Indian was once engaged to carry two hundred dollars a long distance, from one white trader to another. On the way the messenger listened to the temptation of appropriating half of his cargo. On receiving the one hundred dollars, the trader looked a moment at the wrapper and says to the Indian, "You hav been entrusted with two hundred dollars for me, and here you only deliver one hundred; where is the other?" "Who tell you?" inquired the astonished Indian. "Who tell me?" says the trader, "that paper tells me." The poor redskin dropped on his knees, produced the other hundred dollars, and retired, saying, "White man is God; he makem paper talk." What is the difference between that Indian and anyone else that ascribes a phenomenon to a cause not known to exist? None that I can see. Both are making a god of their ignorance.

I understand that Sister Elmina has left for the spirit-land. Let us wait for her report before we form a conclusion. And let us hope that she will not suffer herself to be prompted by a fancy, but giv us good substantial reasons for believing in spirits, or not believing.

Allow me to remark here, I love the letters of your brother George. They are amusing and interesting, and the easy style brings to me a sweet rememberance of dear Mr. Bennett.

Yours for truth and good sound reason, CHAS. LAPERCHE.

DIAMOND, MO., Sept. 13, A.B. 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Sorry to trouble you again. It is not my wont to be obtrusiv; but as the life-long and bitter foe of cruelty to animals, I feel impelled to say a word in approval of the "Vivisector's Death-Bed," and illustration, presented in the recent issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. "The fear o' hell's a hangman's whip," wrote the good Burns, and although it would be stupid to present such a farcical terror to the imagination of a Liberal as a restraint upon cruelty, it is, nevertheless, reasonable to suppose that such distempered visions, such grim and grisly phamtoms, as are delineated in the poem and picture, would be likely to usurp the realm of ideality at the close of a life devoted to such deeds of cruelty; else there is no retributiv justice; and, as Liberals, we hold the penalty of evil deeds to be inevitable.

It would seem to be the peculiar province of Liberalism to lead in this mission of mercy to the brute creation, our mission being, professedly, one of benevolence, to mitigate the evils of life and alleviate the woes of the world. Such being our motto, it devolves upon us to render such aid and encouragement as comport with our ability to those few harbingers of mercy who with no hopes of pecuniary recompense, with slender aid from pseudo-philanthropists, with the obstacles of open hostility of satire and contumely to encounter, hav nevertheless courageously taken the front in this noble cause. And I feel assured that Infidels will respond to this call of humanity with a will—that the appeals already made in behalf of the dumb and defenseless animals hav reached the hearts of all true Liberals. "Coming events cas their shadows before." Several papers in the West and South hav already espoused the cause. Chas. Froebel in a recent essay says: "To those whose love goes forth to the meanest thing that breathes, who, in the trees and flowers, greet their slumbering sisters, and who tread tenderly on the rock lest they giv it pain, recognizing that man is but a part of universal, living nature," etc; also there was published in a late issue of the Nashville Liberal Dr. Monroe's "doubled-geared, back-acting, grace-before-meals," which "grace" asks forgivness of the "poor murdered innocents that hav died that we may dine," and which grace, by the way, will liv with increasing luster so long as the human heart shall feel "the gentle touch of pity." These facts, slight as they may appear, show the sentiment to be gaining ground. And I am glad to know it; for in my capacity of laborer and general roustabout on the farm, and whilom cattle-herder on the Kansas plains, in my isolation from human society, I hav consorted much with the equine, the bovine, and the canine species, and, perhaps, through force of habit I hav gradually come to feel a sense of companionship in them; I hav learned to love them, and my affection has gone forth to the wandering Bedouin whose love for his horse is but little less intense than that for his family, and my sympathy has extended to the gentler Hindoos, who, in the kindness of their hearts, could people the realm of their imagination with such creations as the great Nirvana, who, in the time of destitution, offered his flesh as a feast to the famishing tigress. Think for a moment what the influence of such a belief would be upon a people. Ah! there is no hell in that, my Infidel friends; nothing but pity. Nirvana as far transcends the feeble denuded effigy of him that our benefactors, the Christian priesthood, hav presented for our adoration, as the light of the sun surpasses the feeble glow of a tallow-dip. But to resume the subject, I hav been embroiled in frequent squabbles, when cruelty to brutes was involved. Sometimes it was impossible to look on and observe neutrality. My muttered curses hav become audible, and serious troubles hav ensued. My experience has taught me that a man who will wantonly abuse a brute is a d——d infernal coward. I hav seen such fellows tested when valor was a sine qua non, and they hav invariably shown the white feather. And, again, why havn't our spiritual guides, the pulpit-whackers, ventilated this subject? They probably hadn't time. With one eye on heaven, and the other on the contribution box, their time has been wholly engrossed in watching and praying; not a moment to spare for the poor brute. I hav known a poor ignorant farmer, whose cattle needed shelter, giv his last dollar for the support of a sky-pilot. Gave all to pamper that lazy, arrogant, lascivious "cuss," already swelled with pride and gorged with plenty, redundant with obesity and redolent of eau de cologne, resplendent in broadcloth and lavender kids—a sanctified Falstaff—with ecce deus homo expressed in every smirk of his sensual face. And I hav thought if the farmer had bought a few boards with the money and nailed up a shelter for his perishing cattle, his god would hav been infinitly better pleased with him. It must be a gratifying reflection to the leaders in this cause to know that some of the best men who ever trod this little world of ours were the inveterate foes of cruelty to animals. The gentle Cowper "would not enter on his list of friends, the man who needlessly set foot upon a worm." The brilliant Pope exclaims:

> "Has God, thou fool, worked solely for thy good,
> Thy joy, thy pastime, thy attire, thy food?
> Is it for thee he feeds the wanton fawn?
> For him as kindly spreads the flowery lawn."

And Shakspere's beautiful Cordelia, thus:

> "Mine enemy's dog,
> Though he had bit me, should hav stood that night
> Against my fire, and wast thou fain, poor father
> To hovel thee with swine?"

It needs no prophetic vision to forsee that in the evoluted sentiment of mercy and right, to which Liberalism is steadily and surely tending, the present pioneers of pity will be regarded as having espoused no ignoble cause; that in the esteem of all good citizens they will rank in honor with the Howards, the Burdette Couttses, the Peabodys, and the Girards, and they will feel amply repaid in the reflection that goodness is its own reward. Feeling that I hav trepassed far beyond the bounds of your readers' patience, should these disjointed crudities escape their proper repository, I am,

Yours truly, JOS. TOWSLEY.

GERTRUDE, CAL., Sept. 12, 284.

MR. EDITOR: It appears to me that the fool-killer has not visited Battle Creek just yet. How any sane man can become so strangely misinformed upon the history of his country is a great mystery to me? That any sane man can crowd so many misstatements and mistakes into so short an article "takes the rag." Your readers will observe that in the latter part of his (H. Willis's) article (TRUTH SEEKER, Aug. 23d) he givs the lie to the main statements contained in the body of the article in these words: "His noble and humane cause when governor of Kansas sank deep into the heart of every true Republican, while he was denounced and slandered in unmeasured terms by the Democratic party, and a reward was offered in Mississippi for his head, dead or alive, and a declaration was made that if his head could be obtained, it would be stuck on a pole to let the 'niggers see the damned rascal,' that was enticing them to run to Kansas." Now, I hav no means of knowing whether this was his last or biggest misstatement or not, but I will submit that it disproves (if true) the rest of the article, for it makes it plain that, so far from the Southern people running the blacks out, they wanted them to stay.

There are a good many Liberals in this part of the country. Some take the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, and some of my friends hav sent for books. I had to go ten miles to send ten dollars to you, and then pay fifty cents expressage on it. These grand old mountains incline men to freedom.

Let us think. I go for Cleveland. The Republican party has given away great tracts of the people's land, fostered monopoly and national banks, to rob the people. Let us try the Democratic party once more, and if they do not do better, then try our power as a Liberal Anti-monopoly party. Let not Liberals run after side issues in politics. One or the other of the great parties is bound to win, so whoever votes for either Butler, Pomeroy, or any other side candidate does worse than to throw his vote away. Why will not sensible men see? Because the human race is just emerging out of barbarism, and cannot think correctly. Men who think themselvs educated cannot read Spencer's writing and understand it. I am with you for the education of the masses. B. B. TRAVIS.

CENTERVILLE, UTAH, Sept. 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you 50 cents for the colored lithograph of the D. M. Bennett monument. At this time I am so situated that I cannot write much of a letter, as I would with to; but I must tell you I received the books all right—"Ancient Man in America," and Col. Ingersoll's "Orthodoxy"—and I must say the first is a very peculiarly interesting book. I would like to write a good long letter, but I hav not the time at present to do so, as I am fixing up to go to work in a mine in the top of the mountains of Farmington Canyon, where the perpetual snow lies.

I admire the grand and wise and noble sayings of our late D. M. Bennett that you publish every week at the top of the column of the "Gems of Thought" in THE TRUTH SEEKER. The sayings of that worthy man are a monument that will not die or lose its luster, but will be handed down to the people of the future for good. So go ahead; don't show this theocratic orthodoxy any quarter, for you know it is destined to be all smashed up; and this damnable, treasonable, beastly Mormon outfit of this priest-ridden territory as well, for it is a stink and a disgrace to human kind, let alone a reproach to the government of this nation.

I must say I admire Miss Wixon's corner for the little folks. In some of it there are good lessons for some of us gray-haired children. So I say, "Miss Wixon, bless you; go ahead."

Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its contributors, and its host of readers and subscribers. WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

PRESCOTT, IOWA, Sept. 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The books which I ordered some time ago arrived in due time and in good shape, and are highly satisfactory. I now hav a very complete Liberal library, and one which is open and free to all who will read, take care of, and return. I thank you for your generous discount in the sending of so numerous tracts and pamphlets.

Let me add my word of praise for Col. Kelso's new book, "The Bible Analyzed." The book is all that the name indicates—a thorough analysis of the Bible. It is written in a plain, straightforward, and manly style, and proves beyond refutation that the Bible is of human origin; in fact, it entirely upsets the Bible and theology, leaving no vestige of either upon which supernaturalism can maintain a foothold. In force of logic and clearness of style Col. Kelso cannot be surpassed. No one can read, with an unbiased mind, this work and remain a Christian. It is a sure missionary document, and should be in the hands of every Freethinker. Its every page is fascinating, and one cannot read but with admiration. Every Liberal who is able should at once procure a copy, read it, and lend it to his neighbor. In style of workmanship it is the neatest that I hav seen from THE TRUTH SEEKER office, and is hard to excel. Yours for Liberalism,

JNO. W. YEADON.

AUSTIN, MO., Sept. 12, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The grand old TRUTH SEEKER comes to hand regularly, and I take more comfort in reading it than I do all the other papers I take; it is my Bible, my light and life. I often wonder how I did without it before I knew of its existence. You may put me down as a life-time member, and when you fail to receive my subscription you will know I am head. R. A. SMILEY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Lives longest though he soonest die."

At Grandmother's.

Under the shade of the poplars still,
Lilacs and locusts in clumps between,
Roses over the window sill,
In the dear old house with its door of green.

Never was seen such spotless floors,
Never such shining rows of tin,
While the rose-leaf odors that came through the doors
Told of the peaceful life within.

Here is the room where the children slept,
Grandmamma's children, tired with play,
And the famous drawer where the cakes were kept,
Shrewsbury cookies and caraway.

The garden walks where the children ran,
To smell the flowers and learn their names,
The children thought, since the world began,
Were never such garden walks for games.

There were tulips and asters in regular lines,
Sweetwilliams and marigolds on their stalks,
Bachelor's buttons and sweet-pea vines,
And box that bordered the narrow walks.

Pure white lilies stood cornerwise
From sunflowers yellow and poppies red,
And the summer pinks looked up in surprise
At the kingly hollyhocks overhead.

Morning glories and larkspur stood
Close to the neighborly daffodil;
Cabbage roses and southernwood
Roamed through the beds at their own sweet will.

—Youth's Companion.

Cole's Station.

You wouldn't be able to guess what a pretty and inviting spot it is—Cole's Station. A little shed-like depot, with a bench extending the length of it inside, and an old-fashioned settee on the outside, where passengers may sit while awaiting the train. The walls of the rude building are adorned, inside and out, with crude drawings and autographs of distinguished (?) persons, perhaps, who hav from time to time walked the length of the platform and listened for the shrill whistle of the locomotiv. A small box fastened to the building, bearing the mystic letters, "U. S." reveals the fact that Uncle Sam is recognized in that locality by somebody.

"But," you say, "all that is not very inviting, or pretty." Perhaps not.

"How do you get there?" you inquire.

Well, I'll tell you how I got there. With the two Bethiahs, I hopped on board the train at Bowenville, and, with a scream and a screech, a good deal of puffing and blowing, away went our "iron horse," followed by its load of human freight and its attendant luggage. They do not carry any other style of freight on that road, as I incidentally learned in this way: A lady had two bags of vegetables which she desired to put in the baggage car.

"Can't take them taters," said the baggage-master.

"Why not?" asked the lady.

"Don't carry taters on this train."

"Nor cabbages?" said she, almost gasping, as two magnificent cabbages rolled from the bag and off the platform to the rail below.

"No cabbages—only the kind that walks on two legs. That trash must go by boat;" and as he walked bravely on, the lady eyed him as though she thought there was one cabbage head on board when he stepped on the train.

A turn, a slight curve, and in a minute or two, the cars were moving very slowly over the beautiful bridge that spans the river at this point. Underneath, carriages and horses and foot-passengers are crossing the bridge, and, just after we pass, the big draw swings gracefully upon its great hinges, to allow a three-masted schooner to pass on its way up the river to Somerset, or Taunton.

Off the bridge, the way is along a winding river road. Across the blue water is the beautiful city of Fall River, with its busy, bustling factories, where is manufactured into cotton cloth one-twentieth of all the cotton produced in this country. The dry dock, Wilbur's pond, and many farm fields dot the way, till, all at once, the conductor on the train calls, "Brayton! Brayton!" and the cars stop just long enough to let one catch a view of a straight road, some marshy bogs, and a sparkling water view.

"What did he call this place?" inquired a deaf old gentleman, nudging me with his elbow.

"Brayton," I replied, speaking pretty loud to make him hear.

"It used to be Hog's Neck, when I was a youngster," said the old gentleman.

"They hav more euphonious names in this generation," said I.

"Yes, yes," said he, adjusting his spectacles, and taking a pinch of snuff, "they pretend to be wiser in these days, but I don't believe they know much more. You may call it Brayton as much as you please, but you'll never make me believe that it isn't Hog's Neck, all the same. Hav some snuff?" and he kindly proffered me the snuff-box.

I shook my head, whereupon he eyed me suspiciously, as if there must be something wrong with one who could refuse the allurements of a snuff-box.

In a few seconds there was another halt, and then we were at Cole's. There was the lovely river by the same name, running down and flowing into Mount Hope Bay, the railway bridge across it, the green meadows, the clean, well-kept farms, some hens and half-grown chickens idling over the fields, and a long line of wild grape vines tangled thickly over the walls, and laden with ripe fruitage.

Dudley was at the station, and obligingly took us in his carriage, the two Bethiahs and I, to our destination, the oldest, quaintest, queerest, oddest farm-house of a hundred years ago that ever you saw.

Dudley was dressed in his bicycle suit, white flannel—or what was once white—knee pants, dark stockings, blue flannel shirt, and a pretty red cap on the back of his handsome head.

Dudley livs in New York in the winter, and not far from Cole's Station in the summer. As we rode along we asked him all the questions we could think of, while admiring the winding rivers, Cole's, Lee's, and Kickemuit, the fleet of sailboats in front, and beautiful, historic Mount Hope, once the Indian King Philip's home, on the right from the little shed-like depot.

But the farm-house—I wish you could see it, with its low ceiling, its wonderful fireplace, in which we seemed to see the crackling flame and the big logs of a century ago, and the old-fashioned, clumsy wooden latches a foot long on the doors.

There was an old-fashioned well, too, with a "well-pole," reaching into the next lot. A rope was suspended from the pole above the well, on the end of which was a hook, and on this hook was hung "the old oaken bucket." Creak, creak, creak, went the hinges of the pole as one end went up and the other down, but the water that came up in the bucket was "sparkling and bright in its liquid light," and cold as ice.

And then the hearty, old-fashioned welcome of the hospitable inmates of the farm-house was worth a day's journey to receive.

Charley had made a clam-bake, a real, old-fashioned—I like the old-fashioned ways—Rhode Island clambake, and it was to this feast that we, the two Bethiahs and I, were invited.

The long table was spread under the branches of an old, old apple-tree. And such clams! and potatoes! and green corn! and dressing! and such bread, both white and brown! such cucumbers! and butter! such tea and coffee, and real cream! and such a ripe watermelon! and such a merry time as we all had out there under the apple-tree, with the apples overhead, and the clams below, and Johnny's beautiful spaniel under the table, licking out the clam-shells, and occasionally nibbling the toe of my new boot just for fun!

The birds were singing their September songs, and came close by, glad, I thought, that we had come outdoors to be merry with them. A doctor was in our company, who partook of the primitiv dinner more generously than I should like to take his medicins.

After the repast was over, the two Bethiahs and I, with Charley's sister, took a walk over the fields, jumping a stone wall, climbing a hill, and on, past many stately cedars, stopping frequently to admire the scenery, inhale the spicy fragrance of the trees and herbs, and then over the rocks, and past pellucid springs, till we came to an opening, where handsome cows were lazily browsing. They stared at us, winking their great eyes slowly and wonderingly.

One Bethiah was afraid of the cows, thus showing her city bringing up.

"Take off that red shawl," said she. "It will madden the cows, and they will hook us with their terrible horns, and trample us to death!"

I spread my shawl wider, and invited the horns and trample, but the good old cows only chewed their "cud" a little slower, and looked a little wiser.

The other Bethiah came near stepping on a snake, although she did not see it till Charley's sister called attention to it.

It was evidently frightened at our unwonted appearance, and darted toward a neighboring wall.

"Poor little snake," I said (it was of the harmless kind); "I'll not disturb thee. Go thy way unmolested. Thy family has been most foully slandered. Go, liv thy days; the world is wide enough for both thee and me." I thought of Adam and Eve and Paradise. I do not think the snake appreciated my kindness, but he slid away very rapidly.

Retracing our steps, treading through clumps of "life everlasting," beds of mullein, pungent pennyroyal, and, now and then, stopping to gather bits of pretty mosses, we reached the mansion of our friends, where we rested a few minutes, and then, bidding our friends good-bye, started for the station. Charley's horse was harnessed, and he wanted to take us to the cars, but we thought it would be pleasant to walk.

And it was. The narrow country road was dusty, for there had been no rains lately, but beautiful flowers and ferns grew on either side, while apple-tree branches, laden with mellowing fruit, reached far out and shaded the way. Rich clusters of red barberries made bright the gray stones of the wall near which they grew, and great masses of purple elder berries waved in the afternoon sun, and sheltered the pink hardhack and fringed gentian that grew within its shade.

"Oh, the grapes!—see the grapes!" said the elder Bethiah, and we might hav gathered bushels of them, there were so many and so plenty; but we only picked a few to eat.

There were acres and acres of corn ready for the harvest, and wide fields of cabbages, onions, turnips, and potatoes.

"No danger of a famin here," said the other Bethiah.

"Right you are!" shouted an old-fashioned reddish brown chanticleer as he mounted a stone post to salute us as we passed.

On our right was an old burial lot in an open field.

"We must visit that spot, surely!" said the younger Bethiah—the one who was afraid of cows. "Come along."

We lowered a bar of the fence, and were soon walking above the dead. But alas! although a stone marked every grave, time had nearly obliterated all traces of the identity of those who slept so peacefully beneath the tall grasses that waved above them. "Barton" was the surname of the family, as near as we could make out, and mourning friends had left their loved ones there in the last century, for, by picking the moss from the tablets, we found some of the dates to be 1787. Other dates were totally faded away, and the tablets worn as smooth as glass.

We grew solemn and reflectiv.

So we change, fade, and go away; and, by and by, nobody will be able to tell who we are, where we lived, or where our dust lies buried. Such is life.

We started on as the first red leaf of autumn floated down at our feet, reminding us that close at hand are the "melancholy days, the saddest of the year."

We gathered a bouquet of purple daisies, golden rod, and, when we came to the river again, we went down close to the water's edge and picked a lot of marsh rosemary. It will keep handsomely in vases all winter. Oh how, beautiful was the water, the bogs, the farms, the lofty trees, the flowers; the blue sky overhead—it was all lovely.

The younger Bethiah clambered over the grape-entwined fence, and added a bunch of elecampane flowers to her bouquet.

Pretty soon the train came rattling along, stopped half a minute for us to get on board, and, in a short time, the conductor called, "Boneville, Boneville!" (he meant Bowenville) and we were in the midst of the busy, hustling, bustling crowd, surrounded by hackmen poking their bony fingers in our eyes, winking, blinking, and nodding their heads at us in a way quite startling if we had not been accustomed to their wild antics.

We had a very enjoyable day, quiet, peaceful, happy, and, whenever we feel the need of another like it, we shall put on our things and go to Cole's Station.

Our Puzzle Box.

DOUBLE PUZZLE AND DOUBLE PROBLEM.

1. Fifty-one before me.
Most curious of words!
It is a viscous substance
Used for catching birds;
The oxide of calcium
Obtained by burning stone;
But then we see in botany
The linden-tree is shown;
Or yet a kind of lemon,
But very sour and small,
Which grows in all warm climates
Where fruit can grow at all.
But this I think is strangest—
It is a leash or thong
By which the reckless canine
Is held or led along.

2. With one and fifty in me,
The letters only change;
But if so long be doggie's thong
How large must be his range—

3. First if the end be fastened
Of this extensiv thong?

4. And next if two miles with it
His master move along?

LAWRENCE, MASS., Sept. 10, 1884.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I arrived home safe about eight o'clock in the evening. When we got in Boston we took the horse-car across Boston and got in the cars and came to Lawrence, and I was glad we soon got home; and my mother and my sisters were glad to see me, and my playmates too. Please giv my love to grandmother and grandfather when you see them. I hope to see you again soon, so good-bye. With love from LOUDENVILL, N. Y., Sept. 11, 1884.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: Your "Corner" in THE TRUTH SEEKER is always read by me, and to my little girl, who is five years old to-day. I appreciate your work for the children, and hav often desired to contribute to the "corner."

The poem, "Only a Dog," is beautiful and set me thinking of some of my dogs, and of the days when with brothers and sisters, this great world seemed only a lovely place to play in, and our dogs and cats had souls as intelligent as our own.

If it is agreeable to you I would like to write up some of my dogs, for the children. And at some other time, some of the times "when you and Uncle Hey and Uncle Willie and Aunt Ruthie lived on an island," as my little Virgie says, when she wants to hear about some of those wonderful experiences.

Yours sincerely,
WINNEFORD V. ASPINWALL.

[We welcome you to our Corner and shall be pleased to hear all about your former pets, and the "good times" in your experience. Our only requirement for the Corner is that contributions shall be brief, bright, interesting, and instructiv; that is, they shall drop some good advice, or timely word to help those on their way in life to whom all the world is new.—ED. C. C.]

The Horrible Tale of a Hypochondriac.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Observing that you hav opened a department in opposition to the "chamber of horrors" of the Eden Musee (see page 574, illustration and poem), I hereby offer a contribution in competition with the poem of Mr. Preston. The competition is, as I understand it, not for the purpose of deciding who shall be elected president of the "Liars' Club," but only to prove who can tell the most horrible tale. In this it is my aspiration to take the lead, and, if there be one, the cake. It is proper that I should preface my prize poem with a caution to Miss Gibson, and those who, like her, are subject to "indescribable shivers" and "shudders" and "frightful sensations" when reading Mr. Preston's effusion and seeing its accompanying illustration. I caution all such to skip the poem, and I only refrain from offering an illustration because it might unexpectedly fall under the eyes of such sensitiv persons, and cause them a mental shock as disastrous as the one I am to portray; in fact, I am solicitous for the tender sensibilities of such persons, and I do not desire to thrust upon them, as Mr. Preston so cruelly does, anything that would induce "frightful sensations." I do not believe in inflicting unnecessary cruelty, even on human beings, and therefore offer in advance a kindly warning that the poem is dangerously horrible. Yet I may present it to the stout-hearted, the pachydermatous men of the world who can hear the recital of a horrible tale and apply its moral to the discussion of vivisection. To such persons it seems to me that Mr. Preston's coarse illustration of the vivisector's death-bed must appear as a laughable caricature which might hav been executed for Punch or Puck. It certainly will giv rise to conflicting emotions in any one with an eye for art. Evidently in art as in literature there is but a step from the sublime to the ridiculous, and in this instance the step has been taken. In this realm of art I feel that I can offer no competition; but in the poetical line—well, just try me, and award the prize to the contributor of the most horrible tale.

A HYPOCHONDRIAC.

Ah! your tale is one of horror!
A couch of death in pain,
Remorse for misdeeds often wrought,
A "conscience-stricken brain;"
But listen to my tale of woe,
Of ruesome, living death,
A shattered, suffering human soul,
A sigh with every breath;
Remorse increasing, mind bereft,
Forever on the rack,
Borne down by one unyielding load—
A hypochondriac.
He sits alone, he mopes and moans,
With lowering, anxious mien,
While glassy, wide-ope', staring eyes
See sights to us unseen.
All day he stares, at night he dreams,
On this strange vision born
Of imagination in a brain
Severely racked and torn.
And you ask, "What is it that holds
His gaze so long and fast;
What phantom lost to other eyes
With him is never past?"
Thou seest, my friend, the remnant of
A man of good intent,
Of tender sympathies and heart,
Of actions all well-meant;
But lacking equipoise of brain,
In fact, consistency,
Was guided not by intellect,
But only sympathy;
And so for many years the cause
Of helpless brutes he plead,
'Gainst cruelty, brutality,
For kindness in their stead.
Enthusiastic, he achieved,
In many ways great good;
Ambition pointed out more worlds
To conquer—if he could.
An anti-vivisector, this Bold hero then became;
Assaulted science in its den
In hope of added fame.
A man of one idea, 'tis said,
Is seldom found to be
Wholly consistent in that one,
And so ('tis said) that he
Made every meal on slaughtered meat,
Not thinking of its source;
For appetite, digestion, strength,
It was his favorit course.
And so he fortified for work
With many a pound of steak,
Fought well his fight, waxed zealous, but
Ne'er thought of the mistake
Of crucifying scientists
On vivisection bent,
Because his little learning failed
To see their wise intent;
Denouncing them as criminals,
With "innate thirst for blood,"
Who studied it for facts, while he
Thirsts for it as a food.
Thus blind to sense, by zeal impelled,
He plunged into the fray,
Till suddenly, as with St. Paul,
A light fell on his way,
Illumed his sight, awaked his brain,
And, shocked, he stood aghast.
The pendulum had swung too far;
Consistency at last
Obtained ascendancy in him;
By some unknown decree,
"The terminal conversion of The opposits," may be.
He saw a sheet let down to earth,
Much as St. John had seen,
Burdened with beasts of ev'ry kind
Fit for man's food, called "clean."
But these were in a slaughtered state,
Some trembling still from shock
Of sudden death, from butcher's axe,
With head upon the block;
And lambs did bleat with fading breath,
As life's red blood flowed free
From ghastly wounds in gaping necks,
A sick'ning sight to see.
Enormous hogs and little pigs
Were stuck with gory blade,
And mild-eyed calves bled slowly that
The veal he whiter made.
O'er all this reeking, quivering mass
Of murdered living things
There fluttered flocks of headless birds,
A maze of flapping wings;
Some dying game, by expert shot
Of sportsman's ready gun,
But mostly by the headsman's ax—
Foul blows, dealt one by one.
From living frogs, ten score or more,
The slender legs were torn,
To fry in crumbs for epicures;
For this were bull-frogs born.
These are but glimpses of the scenes
This vision showed to him,
The horrors piled on horrors till
With tears his eyes were dim;
And then the meaning of it all
Came to his frightened soul—
The number of these butchered beasts
Was equal to the whole
Of those that suffered death that he
His hunger might requite (Vicarious atonement, this,
For his meat appetite).
The truth flashed through him, as new thought
Oft startles human brain,
That for his sake more blood was spilled,
More agonizing pain
Inflicted on poor helpless brutes,
Than could be paralleled
By vivisectors whom he had
To public scorn upheld.
This truth, so mighty, did prevail
Against his troubled mind
Till reason flickered, went out like
A candle in the wind.
The vision lingers ever as
A ghost that will not down,
Still holds his mind as in a vice—
A heavy cross, a crown
Of thorns. It is his one idea,
A monomania;
He is the sorry victim of Dread hypochondria.
Oh, pity a man with mind bereft,
Forever on the rack,
Borne down by one unyielding load,
A hypochondriac!

TESTIMONIAL.

DR. FOOTE, JR., Dear Sir: How nice of you to let me be the first to see the proof of your new poem ["The Hypochondriac"], and how lovely it is, to be sure! I just dote on horrible things, and I think that is just too unutterably horrid for anything. It made the cold shivers run down my back, and hot ones chase after them. I read it over and over till I could appreciate it fully, and I do think it is just splendid. Send me half a dozen copies for my friends. MISS ANN THROPE.

Wildwood Flowers.

The flowers that were brought from the wildwood,
That hung in their beautiful bells,
Pale lilac, and pink in profusion,
They told me of shadowy dells—
"Oh, the bloom of the flowers I remember,
And the smiles I shall nevermore see;"
For the hands of my beautiful lover
Transplanted the flowers for me.

The breath of the spring was like incense
By the beautiful flowers in bloom.
He gave the last touch to the garden,
And he found that yet there was room
In the round ribbon bed of beauties,
And he planted the delicate flowers,
And we smiled as they, charming and lovely,
Kept nodding throughout the night hours.

And when he was absent, these flowers
Were cherished far more than their mates,
Though his hands had fashioned the garden,
'Twas he that had brought me these plants,
And they spoke of the distant blue wildwood,
Of the charms that were hidden within,
And they spoke to my heart by their beauty—
Oh, the one that is gone, I love him!

But the garden and blossoms are gone,
I know not who robbed their sweet bloom,
I left that dear spot in cold winter,
Its brightness enshrouded in gloom.
I thought not of flowers or their beauty,
For I went with the one dear to me,
His dark eyes to me were far better
Than bells of the flowers could be.

And he to the land of the spirits
Has journeyed in years that are gone,
While I in mortality linger;
To-day I an sitting alone.
Perhaps these flowers are round him,
That past, ere he vanished from sight,
For they bloom in the land of the spirits,
More ethereal, beautiful, bright.

St. George, Aug. 18, 1884. EMILY B. SPENCER.

Death of a Venerable Truth Seeker.

DIED.—Dr. Charles S. Sterling, of Liverpool, New York. For sixty years an avowed Freethinker and Infidel; forty years a successful physician. Died Sept. 10, 1884, aged 80, beloved and respected by all classes, despite his outspoken Infidelity. During a painful sickness of ten years, he found Liberalism an all-sufficient source of peace and consolation.

The funeral service of Dr. Chas. S. Sterling was held yesterday, Sept. 12, 1884, at 2:30 P.M., at his home in Liverpool. The large house would not contain a tithing of the people, and the extensiv grounds, in which had been placed chairs and settees, barely afforded accommodation for the very large number of people assembled to do honor to one of Liverpool's oldest settlers and most highly respected citizens. The Masonic lodge of the village attended in a body.

FUNERAL ORATION BY EX-REV. CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

Placing a large family Bible on the table on the porch, at which sat the Syracuse newspaper reporters, who seemed somewhat startled, Mr. Reynolds whispered: "It won't hurt you any if you don't look into it." Then turning to the audience he said: In the presence of death, how beliefs and dogmas wither and decay! Character alone survives. When our loved ones die, in our weak humanity we moan and sob; tears blind our eyes. It seems as though the sun of our life were darkened forever; the stars of peace blotted from the firmament of our future. But the stars shine brightest when surrounded by the blackest thunder clouds. Adverse winds may blow, and the storms of misfortune rage, but soon hope will twine the sweetest roses round our sorrow-bowed, aching heads. There is always one tiny pin-hole for the glory of hope to shine through.

Our loved ones die. We weep and moan; but much of our sorrow is for self, not for those at peace, calmly sleeping, sweetly resting; their labor o'er; their work accomplished. Need we weep? Our loved brother lived a long, useful life; his work well and faithfully done. He is at rest; sleeps in peace. Yet to-day our hearts are sad; we feel deeply our bereavement. His dear companionship, wise counsel, true sympathy, ready help, and loving ministrations are henceforth lost to us.

Once hope revives, we realize death is but a simple condition of nature; neither to be feared, desired, nor dreaded. Life and death are essential conditions, but for errors of education we should not so dread and fear it. For our dead, in any case, all is well with them. What though death ends all, as Materialists believe, the dead still liv in the good they hav done; their memories ever green in the hearts of dear loved ones. In the language of Eliza Cook,

"'Tis a long, 'tis a last, 'tis a beautiful rest,
When all sorrow is passed from the brow and the breast;
And the lone spirit truly and wisely may crave
The sleep that is dreamless—the sleep of the grave."

If, on the other hand, the brighter philosphy is true, death is but the entrance to a new, better, more beautiful existence.

"Let our fainting hearts take courage,
When with grief and sorrow bowed;
Remember there is always Glorious light beyond the cloud."

"In no sense can we wholly die; for no noble act, no generous impulse of the heart, can ever perish.

A maiden strolling alone through the cemetery at noon, in the bright sunshine, enjoys the calm peace; delights in the solitude. Place the same girl in the same spot at midnight—she would be paralyzed with fear or shriek with terror. Why? Darkness is but the withdrawal of light. It is all the error of education. Is not that teaching false, injurious, evil, that has instilled the fear of darkness, terror of the dead, and created belief in ghosts, witches, and hobgoblins? I hav seen a child afraid to sit up alone at night with a dead mother. Fear should be banished by the light of science and the exercise of reason.

Some say the mere thought of remaining in the grave, of being utterly unconscious, for all eternity, is worse than to liv and endure the torments of hell fire. Is this really true, or is it only the results of wrong education? In sickness you long for sleep. When sound asleep you are as unconscious as the dead. In old age, you long for rest, even that of the grave, to release from pain and weariness. Very little of thought will remove so very much of fear.

We are assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to a true, brave, heart, a cultivated brain, a devotee alike of personal and mental liberty. He dared think for himself and giv utterance to his convictions. He worshiped at the shrine of truth. His God was nature; his church, all humanity; his creed, do justice, love mercy, endeavor to make your fellow-creatures happy. And his life proved the sincerity of his convictions, and during ten long years of painful sickness afforded him perfect consolation.

In the cause of humanity, in the defense of right, liberty, and truth, our deceased friend had the courage and persistence of a Napoleon, while for those who sorrowed or suffered he had a heart as kind and sympathetic as that of the gentlest woman.

He was born in 1804, at Wilton, Conn., was educated at Berkshire and Woodstock colleges, Mass.; graduated at the chemical school at Woodstock, Penn., 1831; settled in Liverpool, N. Y., and commenced practice as a physician in 1832. For forty years he practiced his profession in this village, ceasing to practice in 1871. He was a man of ripe thought, deep study, of noblest impulses. During his long years of sickness he found solace, patience, and comfort, not in the church, but in communing with nature, and the surroundings which culture affords. He rejoiced in the glorious truths of the gospel of humanity, and scorned the empty professions of faith, the bigotry, the fanaticism, and idle ceremonies of the churches.

Dr. Sterling lived and died an outspoken earnest, consistent Freethinker and Infidel. Can you point to any Christian in your community who lived a better, purer, or more useful life?

Dr. Sterling was an Infidel. Oh, dreadful name! Stop! think for a moment what an Infidel really is. Are you a Protestant? Luther was an Infidel. He dared to think for himself, and refused to believe or sanction the dogmas of the Catholic church.

Infidel is a term of contempt and reproach applied to any who venture to step aside from the popular current of belief.

Nearly every one of the great names to-day, in science, literature, and art, are avowed Liberals. No person of admitted culture, in the church or out of it, believes all in the Bible. You say it was a dreadul thing for Dr. Sterling not to believe in the resurrection of Christ. Did you ever stop to think that, if the Bible is true, if Christ spoke truth, not one of his disciples believed in Christ's resurrection? "Now when Jesus was risen early the first day of the week he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils. And she went and told them that had been with him as they mourned and wept. And they, when they had heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her, believed not. After that he appeared in another form unto two of them as they walked, and went into the country. And they went and told it unto the residue; neither believed they them. Afterward he appeared unto the eleven as they sat at meat, and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen" (Mark xvi, 9–14). Was it any worse for Dr. Sterling to disbelieve the impossible than for those who had been with Jesus, heard his teaching, witnessed his miracles? Why denounce honest truth seekers who dispassionately weigh the evidence, reject the error and evil, and gladly accept and cherish all that is true and good?

Dr. Sterling believed that the practice of love, mercy, and benevolence, here and now, would best qualify us for ministrations of love in any other sphere. In the language of his much admired and lamented friend, D. M. Bennett, the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER, "Those lead the happiest, most peaceful lives who seek most to benefit those around them. Our highest duty lies not above the clouds over our heads, nor in depth of earth beneath our feet; neither can we do aught to benefit or affect any being supposed to exist in either locality; our duty and field of action is here, among the sons and daughters of men. In no case can we so well prepare for another life as by doing all in our power to make those around us happy."

Dr. Sterling realized we must combat ignorance and superstition, not with dungeon, torture, and the stake, not by ostracism, misrepresentation, and abuse, but by imparting knowledge and instruction; hence he was ever zealous in behalf of education. He taught it was our duty to endeavor to lead the erring from vice to the practice of virtue, by loving admonition and good example. He was an eloquent, consistent champion of common sense. He rejected all that nature taught him was untrue; his constant acts of mercy, his true and noble manhood, endeared him even to his Christian friends, who to-day alone need words of comfort on account of their errors of belief.

They say Dr. Sterling is banished from the delights of heaven; can never meet his dear loved ones and dwell with them forever in the land of perfect love. My Christian friends, I hav often spoken at funerals, assuring the mourners of meeting dear loved ones in heaven. But search the Bible from Genesis to Revelation, and nowhere does it tell of any place where one is restored to loved ones; no text tells us they will love you there as here. Not a single text in all the Bible says that. But it does positivly assert the contrary. Read Mark xii, 18, 25. The fifteenth verse reads: "For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels which are in heaven."

According to this, those who attain heaven shall be as the the angels who never knew human love. Would heaven be a place of joy, or even endurable, if your friends hav no longer any especial love or affection for you? Do you regret Dr. Sterling could not believe or long for such a heaven? Accustomed to ministering to all those suffering within his reach, how could he be hopeful or desirous of such a heaven as is described in Luke xvi, 19–25. Do you denounce him that he could not believe this story of the rich man in hell pleading in vain for one drop of water? Our lamented brother's religion consisted in, "Put yourself in his place," or "do to others as you would they should do to you," a golden rule taught by Christna, Confucius, Pittacus, Socrates, and Sextus centuries before the birth of Christ, but a rule, it seems, that will be utterly ignored by God, Christ, and all the angels and saints of heaven. The law of love is not original or first given in the Bible. Pagan and heathen philosophers both taught and practiced it centuries before the birth of Christ.

But if the Bible is true, if Christ's own declarations are reliable, then, dear Christian friends, accept the words of comfort. Jesus himself declares the Liberal, the Freethinker, the Infidel, who, like Dr. Sterling, did justly, loved mercy, and endeavored to promote the happiness of his fellow-creatures, shall hav especial welcome to heaven (Matt. xxv, 31–40). Strange, but true, Christ says not one word of What did you believe? but, What did you do? Did you feed the hungry, giv drink to the thirsty, help the needy, clothe the naked, minister to the sick? Yes? Then, says Christ, "Come, ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundatioon of the world."

From his coffin the dead man speaks to us: "Weep not for me. Care for the suffering, the lonely, and the heartbroken. Mutually realize your duty to study those questions which most nearly concern yourselvs, your race, this present world. Make secondary metaphysical disputations in regard to an ideal world, in which perhaps in some possible condition you may liv, and devote your best intelligence to practical questions pertaining to this present world in which you do now liv. Giv liberally of your means to diffuse the light of science and positiv knowledge, and thus help dispel the dark mists of error, ignorance, and superstition. Realize your duty is here and now, to do all in your power to make all around you joyous and happy; soothe the sorrows of the afflicted, help the needy, and afford means of employment for the body and cultivation of the mind. Liv lives of love, instead of making professions of faith. Practice justice and mercy in lieu of forms and ceremonies, constantly endeavoring to promote the happiness and welfare of those around you, instead of idly praying to a God to do it for you. So shall you liv in an atmosphere of love, and at last meet death without a fear."

At the conclusion of the oration a song was sung, after which the remains were conveyed to the cemetery and buried with Masonic honors.

In the evening the hall in the village was crowded to hear the ex-Rev. Reynolds on "What Liberalism Teaches." The lecturer was introduced by Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, one of the eloquent and fearless champions of freedom throughout all the abolition movement. She offered the lecturer a woman's best wishes, in lieu of an invocation to an imaginary God for his blessing. And from the freedom with which the lecturer spoke, the deep interest and attention of the crowded audience, it certainly proved much more efficacious.

The funeral and lecture hav occasioned great excitement, and will doubtless result in much discussion and truth seeking. There are many able genuin Liberals in Liverpool. We earnestly hope they may very speedily be organized into an efficient local Liberal League.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New estament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. 1. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT.

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Gems of Thought.

LOVE begets love, kindness begets kindness, sympathy begets sympathy, and good deeds, even though small and simple in their character, draw forth good deeds from all who witness them and are brought under their influence.—D. M. Bennett.

SCIENCE and criticism hav raised the veil of the Mosaic cosmogony and revealed to us the physical origin of man. We see that, instead of being created out of the dust of the earth by divine fiat, he has in all probability been evolved out of it by a process of development through a series of intermediate forms. The discovery is, of course, unspeakably momentous. Among other things it seems to open to us a new view of morality, and one which, if it is verified by further investigation, can hardly fail to produce a great change in philosophy. Supposing that man has ascended from a lower animal form, there appears to be ground at least for surmising that vice, instead of being a diabolical inspiration, or a mysterious element of human nature, is the remnant of the lower animal, not yet eliminated; while virtue is the effort, individual and collectiv, by which that remnant is being gradually worked off. —Goldwin Smith.

ALL presumption of death's being the destruction of living beings must go upon supposition that they are compounded and so discerptible. But since consciousness is a single and indivisible power, it should seem that the subject in which it resides must be so too. For were the motion of any particle of matter absolutely one and indivisible, so as that it should imply a contradiction to suppose part of this motion to exist and part not to exist, i. e., part of this matter to move and part to be at rest, then its power of motion would be indivisible; and so also would the subject in which the power inheres, namely, the particle of matter; for if this could be divided into two one part might be moved and the other at rest which is contrary to the supposition.—Butler's Analogy.

BY some we are told that the soul is immaterial and that, by reason of its immateriality, it cannot die. How can human beings, professing to hav cultivated their understandings, be content to repeat, and rest in, such wretched inanities as these? at best but the convulsiv flounderings of an intellect out of its depth, deluding itself into the belief that it has grasped an idea, when it has only got hold of a word. That the immaterial must of necessity be immortal seems to us an unmeaning assertion on a matter of which we know absolutely nothing. Of the nature of the soul, science has taught us indeed little—far too little to allow us to decide and dogmatize; but honesty must admit that the little it has taught us all points to an opposit conclusion. Alas! for the spirit's immortal trust, if it rested on such scholastic technicalities as these.—W. R. Greg.

MORE destroyed than thus,
We should be quite abolished and expire.
What fear we then? What doubt we to incense
His utmost ire? which, to the hight enraged,
Will either quite consume us, and reduce
To nothing, this essential; happier far
Than, miserable, to hav eternal being;
Or, if our substance be indeed divine,
And cannot cease to be, we are at worst
On this side nothing. . . .
Which, if not victory, is yet revenge!
—Milton.

THE boat sailing up the Nile expands its white and pointed wings; the sailors chant a plaintiv song; the waters bubble around us as we glide past the tombs and temples of the bygone days. The men are dead and the gods are dead. Naught but their memories remain. Where now is Osiris, who came down upon earth out of love for man, who was killed by the malice of the Evil One, who rose again from the grave and became the judge of the dead? Where now is Isis the mother, with the child Horus in her lap? They are dead; they are gone to the land of the shades. To-morrow, Jehovah [or Yaveh, or "whatever title suits you"], you and your son will be with them.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

SON of the morning, rise! approach you here!
Come—but molest not yon defenseless urn;
Look on this spot—a nation's sepulcher!
Abode of gods, whose shrines no longer burn,
Even gods must yield—religions take their turn.
'Twas Jove's—'tis Mohammed's—and other creeds
Will rise with other years, till man shall learn
Vainly his incense soars, his victim bleeds;
Poor child of doubt and death, whose hope is built on reeds. —Byron's Athens.

HAPPINESS is not what we are to look for. Our place is to be true to the best which we know, to seek that and do that; and if, by "virtue its own reward," be meant that the good man cares only to continue good, desiring nothing more, it is a true and noble saying. But if virtue be valued because it is politic, because in pursuit of it will be found most enjoyment and fewest sufferings, then it is not noble any more, and it is turning truth into a lie.—Emerson.

I RATHER think that the whole man is of some uniform composition; and that the property of perception, as well as those other powers that are termed mental, is the result (whether necessary or not) of such an organized structure as that of the brain; consequently, that the whole man becomes extinct at death, and that we hav no hope of surviving the grave, but what [heaven save the mark!] is derived from the scheme of revelation.—Priestley.

THAT the leaders of the anti-theological movement in the present day are immoral, nobody but the most besotted fanatic would insinuate; no candid antagonist would deny that some of them are, in every respect, the very best of men. The fearless love of truth is usually accompanied by other high qualities; and nothing could be more unlikely than that natures disposed to virtue, trained under good influences, peculiarly sensitiv to opinion and guarded by intellectual tastes, would lapse into vice as soon as the traditional sanction was removed.—Goldwin Smith's Lectures and Essays.

A PETITION FOR STATE SECULARIZATION.

To the Honorable Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress:

A republican form of government being based on liberty, equality, and fraternity, as both means and end, involves the separation of Church and State, whose union is the worst form of class-legislation and the most infallible sign of arbitrary power. A house divided against itself cannot stand. The institutions of this Commonwealth should be made homogeneous throughout. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of truth in whatever direction. Any infringement by government of this absolute equality of its citizens is the parent of manifold evil, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, this government was founded to "establish."

And yet, though the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," there does exist a union of Church and State, which gives to Christianity moral and material aid, and so proscribes other religions and forms of belief and unbelief, while taxing these also for the support of that special religion.

The ways in which this old alliance between Church and State still survives among us are:

1. Recognition of God and Christianity in State Constitutions.
2. Exemption of Church property from taxation.
3. Appropriations of public money for sectarian purposes.
4. Religious exercises, as the reading of the Bible, etc., in the public schools.
5. Laws enforcing the observance of the Sabbath on the authority of the Bible.
6. Religious test-oaths in courts of justice and on instalment into office.
7. Chaplaincies in the Legislature, the Army, and the Navy.
8. Fast and Thanksgiving Proclamations, which contain theological ideas that may or may not be acceptable to the citizen.
9. The vague and indeterminate sense in which the words civil and sac red are used when applied to the marriage contract; and the appeal to God or the Holy Scriptures by some of the states, as the final authority on marriage.
10. Making morality subject to church dogma, by describing it as Christian, instead of natural, morality.
11. The license rather than liberty given to religion by the first amendment to the United States Constitution, by forbidding Congress to make any law "prohibiting the free exercise thereof," which means, really, "the free exercise" of whatever anyone chooses to call "religion."

The necessity for this separation of Church and State is more apparent now than ever before, because of the still greater diversity of religious beliefs, the many forms of dissent from the religion which receives State patronage, and the growing signs of sectarian strife and ambition in the arena of politics. And emphasis needs to be given to the fact that the union of Church and State is a great hindrance to the employment of right methods in dealing with many questions of reform now demanding attention. And most essential is it at all times, and especially in the present, in order to secure for the law its due respect and observance, that the people's representatives should exhibit the strictest fidelity to their trusts by following the law in its letter and spirit.

Your petitioners, therefore, pray that immediate action be taken by the law-making power to bring into harmony the theory and practice of our government in making the following principle a part of the fundamental law of the land by amendment to the United States Constitution:

The total separation of Church and State, by prohibiting Congress or any State, County, Municipality, or Township from enacting any law that infringes the rights of conscience, or favors any practices in the name of religion, or of aught else, that interfere with private right or the public welfare.

Odds and Ends.

(1) AN humble boy, with shining pail, went gladly singing down the dale, to where the cow with the brindle tail on clover her palate did regale. An humble bee did gaily sail far over the soft and shadowy vale, to where the boy with the shining pail was milking the cow with a brindle tail. (2) The bee sat down on the cow's left ear; her heels flew up through the atmosphere—and through the leaves of the chestnut bough the boy is cheerily soaring now.

AN eccentric minister of the Methodist Episcopal church, in Ohio, was once preaching in a very high pulpit. He was sailing along in his discourse, all eyes upon him, when suddenly he disappeared behind the barricade, causing the necks of the congregation to be stretched in pursuit of him. He soon came in sight again, and explained his absence by saying: "I just dropped my false teeth, and was looking for them. Thank God, when we get to heaven we will not need false teeth."

LATE excavations at Pompeii hav unveiled still another Venus, and the market is now pretty well supplied with the unblushing goddess. This particular one was in the attitude of crouching, as if looking for a hairpin, or mending a rip in her apron, and the sculptor was evidently occupied with his subject when Vesuvius tipped over the ash barrel on the city. His body was in the work-shop near by, and a cingulum was still grasped in his hand. The account don't say whether it was loaded or not, but probably not, as the heat must hav caused it to go off. A pabulum was on a bench close by, badly coagulated by the scoria.

"PEARL," dear, you hav got us. If you had inquired the price of string beans, or the probable winner of the Derby, we might hav given you the desired information. If you had requested us to inform you of the price of bustles, or the way to liv on sixty cents a week, we might hav groped around in our clothes and gladdened your heart with an answer; but when you ask us if the color in a ninety-five cent balmoral is liable to run, we are compelled to hang our heads and giv it up. We will tell you one thing, though. Something inside of a red petticoat is liable to run if a gentleman cow ever takes a cursory glance at it. Don't forget this.

A MINISTER of the gospel who once journeyed on horseback through Virginia in the antebellum days, tells this story: Overtaking an old negro man on the road, and feeling in the mood for a chat with the old man, he slowed his horse to keep pace with him, when the following dialog ensued: "Do you liv about here?" "Yes, massa, I belongs to Colonel H——. He lib 'bout two miles from yer." "It is a beautiful country. Are the people about here religious?" "Yes, massa, dey is powerful sight of 'ligions 'bout yer. Dere is Baptises, Mefodesses, Presbyteriums, and some Quakers." "Well, what religion did you choose!" "Oh, laws, massa, I ain't no 'ligion at all—I's jest ole 'Pis'opel."

OLD Abner was a money lender, and the stingiest man in his county. Ab. charged not only the legal rate of interest, but a good deal more when he had a chance for it. One evening Abner attended a revival meeting less than a thousand miles from Jamestown, where the appeals of the preacher and the confessions of various members of the flock so worked upon his feelings that he concluded he must get up and giv his testimony. "Brothers and sisters," old Abner commenced, rubbing his big, bony hands together in a hesitating sort of way, "I hardly know wha-a-a-t t-to say thi-i-is evening." A profound silence succeeded the sentence, when some one from the rear part of the house yelled out in thunder tones: "Say ten per cent, Abner!" Old Abner sank back into his seat for once completely crushed.

"MY boy," said the Sunday-school superintendent to a small urchin, "what is your name?" "Dunno nothin' 'bout it," he answered. "Oh, yes, you do! You know your catechism, I am sure," said the superintendent, encouragingly. "Now, what's your name, M. or N.?" "Guess it's M." "Oh, no, it can't be M." "Then I kinder think it's N." "No; it is neither M. nor N." "Well, then, 't ain't neither of 'em!" "You are right, so far," the patient superintendent replied. "Now complete your good beginning by telling me what your name really is!" "Hain't got no name!" "Dear, dear! How extremely ungrammatical. I wonder if it is Logan?" thought the superintendent; and he added aloud, "What do your little playmates call you?" "Buttsy! Gimme one 'o them pictur cards?" The superintendent sadly shook his head. "Yer won't hey? Then I'm durn 'f I don't go right home 'n bust open my mite-chest 'n spend every red cent what's in it fer miggles 'n chewin'-terbacker!" The next Sunday morning there was one little upright figure missing from the ranks; one tender uplifted voice wanting in the joyous hymn; one less carpet-tack upturned reposing on the teacher's chair.

THE apple-colic days are come, The saddest of the lot, When small boys come a prancing home, Each tied up in a knot. Mama him spreads across her lap, Despite his bitter tears, And warms with apple-sprout or straps, The wax that's in his ears. Ah, bitter day! ah, bitter thought! With fruit and strap to grapple; He bitter learns he hadn't ought To bit a bitter apple. Pernicious fruit! earth's earliest curse! Of that forbidden tree, Which first brought death—and some things worse—And all our mis-e-ree! If Eve, whose wicked heart had sure. No rudiment of truth in it, Had kept heaven's first injunction pure, And never stuck her tooth in it, She ne'er had shunned the passer-by, Nor in the fig-leaves hovered, To hide her nakedness, nor I, Thus had mine all uncovered! Oh, plague of god and goddess! Apple of Discord, now we know What meaning in thy rod is! We touch—we taste—at once it turns To ashes on the lip; Thy limb is cut and quickly burns its blisters on—ker zip! O bitter fruit, forbear, forbear! I feel thee in my—bosom! There's naught but danger lurketh there, From ground sprout up to blossom. We touch—we taste—the pleasure's gone; The apron-pain begins—across the cruel knee we're drawn, And oh—gee-whillikins!

Notes and Clippings.

ROBERT BUCHANAN, the novelist, thinks that America possesses in Walt Whitman the most original poet in the world, the noblest soldier in Sherman, the profoundest philosophic physiologist in Draper, and the greatest humorist in Mark Twain.

IT is said by the New York Star that a general exodus of gentiles from Utah is contemplated unless Congress takes some immediate steps for their relief. The courts are in the hands of the Mormons, and even the legislature and all the machinery of the government are under their control.

THE law about the admission of the Chinese is so rigidly enforced on the Pacific coast, says the Sun, that a Chinaman resident in San Francisco found, on going across the line into British America, that he could not get back without making the journey to China and return, in order to obtain a certificate that he was a merchant, and not a laborer.

THE story, of rather doubtful accuracy, is told by the Rev. Dr. Prime that in Albany, the subject for signing petitions being under remark, a man bet that he could get the signatures of ten highly respected residents to a paper asking Gov. Dix to hang one of the leading clergymen. He won without difficulty, as not one of the signers insisted on reading the document.

THE Rev. Dr. Gladden thinks it must be possible to shape the organization of our industries in such a way that it shall be the daily habit of the workman to think of the interest of the employer, and of the employer to think of the interest of the workman. The solution of the problem, he says, is quite within the power of the Christian employer. Now let some Christian employer put this scheme in operation under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Gladden.

FROM the Atlanta Constitution: She had just joined the church, and was reading a missionary paper after meeting hours. "John," said she, looking up anxiously, "I hav just given a quarter for home mission purposes. I hardly know the difference between home and foreign missions. Please tell me which one I'd better patronize." "That depends on your inclinations, my dear." "What do they do?" "Do? Why, they say that the home missionaries liv upon the people." "Yes; and the foreign ones?" "Here the process is reversed, and the people liv on the missionaries, if they are fat enough."

NEITHER an Ecumenical Conference of Methodism nor a Pan-Presbyterian Council, says a religious paper, "need aspire to a cable notice; but if they would only get into a wrangle, and hav a few theologians knocked down, they would rise to the dignity which would entitle their doings to be cabled across the ocean." It is to be presumed, then, that the people of Europe hav heard of the recent church meeting in Paterson, N. J., where "members jumped around and on the seats and called each other liars and hypocrits," and where "a few theologians" were only prevented from being "knocked down" by the intervention of the police.

THE Boston Herald has these remarks: A clerical friend, who says that his "calling and his convictions" forbid him to vote for Cleveland, while his standard of public morality equally prevents him from supporting Blaine, asks us, "What shall I do?" There is but one alternativ. You must either vote for St. John or "take to the woods." But before you decide to throw your vote away, or to lose it, we advise that you prayerfully consider the practical question as to what this country wants of a president for the next four years, and what his powers and duties will be. And your meditations may be helped by remembering that when the Lord was looking for a king for his chosen people, he found David, "a man after his own heart." If he had been looking for a preacher, he doubtless would hav picked out a different kind of man.

A RECENT scene in the jury room of a Western town, according to the Newman Herald, after the jurors had completed the week's work, was, we dare say, unparalleled in this country. Sending for Judge Harris and calling in the bailiff, they held an experience meeting. Every member of the Grand Jury was a professed Christian, only one of whom was not a member of some church. Each one had a word to speak for Jesus, and the oldest member of the body led in fervent prayer. This is one of that sort of juries who bring in a verdict of "hereditary visitation of God" when a man follows the example of his father and breaks his neck while drunk.

ONCE, in a small Connecticut village, remarks the Flushing Journal, a number of habitues of the tavern were surprised to see Deacon J—— enter the barroom where they were sitting. The deacon was a churchman and a prohibitionist. He observed the inquiring looks of his fellow-townsmen, and, to do him justice, looked embarrassed—he blushed and the evidence of embarrassment mantled his entire countenance, particularly his nose. "John," said he to the bartender, "you may giv me a glass of water, and just put a spoonful of sugar in it." Observing that the interest in his actions was lessening, the worthy deacon, growing bolder, remarked: "John, just fill that up with whisky and make a kind of beer of it." That is the kind of a prohibitionist he was.

LABOUCHERE, of London Truth, says that in St. Paul's, London, whither he went to hear Canon Liddon preach, one choirman went fast asleep immediately, and about the middle of the sermon another had gone off. On the other side was a choirman fast asleep. The boys were in the greatest disorder, one lying almost across his companion, his neck hanging over him, in a dead sleep. His friend would not arouse him, but kept awake till he awoke and then went to sleep himself. The boys opposit were more lively, but not devout. One was making Punch and Judy with his surplice, another sucked candy, another had a scent-squirt, while a fourth was engaged in manufacturing little paper things, and trying to get them to stand up on his bench, to the great delight of the rest.

THE latest evangelists are two men and a girl, all negroes. They speak the dialect of the southern plantation too richly to hav long been at the North, and their garments are about as flappy and grotesque as any ever worn on the stage by imitation Africans. The men carry and play on fiddles, while the girl taps and shakes a tambourine, and all sing camp-meeting airs. They range themselvs at the edge of the sidewalk, and with voices and instruments quickly call together crowd. Then their exhorter delivers a brief but very animated harang, and a second hymn is sung, with interpolated hallelujahs and amens. The services last no more than ten minutes, and are followed by a collection, the girl passing her tambourine for coins. Religion, so to speak, makes queer bedfellows.

WE copy the following from the Spectator: "The British Association at Montreal was greatly moved on Tuesday by a telegram from Sydney, couched in these words: 'Caldwell finds monotremes viviparous, mesoblastic ovum.' That does not seem to outsiders to be an epoch-making message; but it is explained by the scientific to signify that Mr. Caldwell, a physiologist of adequate knowledge, has discovered that the lowest known mammal, the duck-billed platypus, lays eggs like a bird, though it subsequently suckles its young, and that the structure of the egg is analagous to that of reptils. Consequently, a high probability arises that all mammals, including man, descend from reptils, instead of from amphibia, as has recently been imagined; and the Darwinian physiologists are shunted on to a new line, and must study the pedigree of reptils as the possible channels through which progressiv life descended with a quite new interest. The discovery is of value, though it helps little toward the ultimate question—the origin of life on the planet. The existence of progressiv energy in the original germ is not the less wonderful because it was developed first through reptils, instead of amphibia. How did it come there at all?"

OF the controversy over the Rev. Dr. Woodrow's address on Evolution, the South Atlantic Presbyterian (Charlotte, N. C.) says: "We will briefly state that Dr. Woodrow's position is that we are not to seek for harmonies between science and the Bible, but the absence of contradiction. The subject matter of the Bible and science are so entirely different that there is no room for harmony; and if an apparent contradiction emerges, it is to be removed by our seeking the error that caused it, which is generally the error of our making one of these revelations of God's thoughts to transcend its subject matter, and of our taking fancied conclusions of our own from one of these departments of knowledge to the other, without any warrant in reason or revelation. This position is established by forcible arguments and illustrations. It is impregnable. In establishing it he saves Christian apologists the mortification of their successiv retreats from a position of hostility to this, that, and the other discoveries of science made from the time of Calvin to the present day."

THE late Secretary Folger, while on the bench of the Court of Appeals, expressed a wish that the divorce laws of every state of the Union should conform to those of the commonwealth of New York, which he regarded as excellent, but that was impossible. Prior to any conformation, the divorce enactments of this state will hav to be made more liberal. They are out of line with the people of the nineteenth century. Look at France. That republic has decreed the most liberal divorce law ever placed on a statute book. The causes are numerous, comprising adultery, abandonment, cruelty of action and language, obloquy when thrown upon a married partner, penal servitude, imprisonment for theft, expulsion from the army and navy for dishonorable conduct, cheating, disbarration from the legal profession, habitual drunkenness, continued abuse of the members of either partner's family, which protects mothers-in-law, and injury by moral outrage, calumny, and insult; in fine, such causes as make life unhappy. France disregarded all ecclesiastical opposition in looking to the well-being of her people, and marked her chivalrous devotion to the rights of women. It would be well if some of our American legislators and clergymen would find in the example of France that increasing humanity which should characterize this age.—Mercury.

THE desire for the championship of any profession in which a person may engage is a commendable one, and seems to be universal. Of course everyone has heard of Sullivan, the champion pugilist; Hanlan, the champion oarsman; Talmage, the champion prayer-and-dance artist; Joe Cook, the champion liar, and F. B. Livezey, the champion crank. The death of the Rev. J. H. Brooks (colored), of Washington, has brought to light the fact not generally known, that he was the champion baptizer. For many years it was the boast of admirers of one Rev. Jasper that he could immerse more candidates for baptism in a given length of time than any Baptist preacher in the country. On one occasion, however, some two years ago, Brother Brooks, after a successful revival at his church, immersed fifty-six people in one hour and sixteen minutes, beating the Rev. Jasper's best record. The feat becoming known to the Jasper people, they lost their temper, and some of them charged that all had not been fair. One story was that some of Brother Brooks's male candidates had practiced in the water before the day, in order to help Brother Brooks beat the Rev. Jasper's time; while another story was that Brother Brooks did not observe the proper formula in every case; that it was only to the first candidate that he said, "I baptize you in the," etc., and to the others only added as each came up, "Same to you," and gave them the plunge, thereby saving much time. It is to the credit of the Rev. Jasper, however, that he never countenanced these charges, but always conceded to Brother Brooks the best record as the immerser of fifty-six candidates in one hour and sixteen minutes.

PRAYERS were offered in the churches at Petersburg, Va., last Sunday, for rain, which is badly needed in that region, on account of the damaging effect the protracted drouth has had on the crops. If a local shower should be observed in that vicinity between now and Christmas, everyone will know what influences brought it about.

AT a meeting of Liberals held at Brussels Sept. 28th for the purpose of arranging a platform to oppose the Education law, M. Goblet, in an address, suggested that when the Liberals should gain power they should use the immense wealth of the religious bodies to promote popular education, and that the Liberal motto be, "Separation of church and state." M. Goblet was loudly cheered.

THE Rev. R. H. Morris, pastor of the Colored Methodist church at New Brighton, O., was in Youngstown one day last week in search of three missing members of his congregation. One of these was a young man, and the others were young ladies of the ages of 15 and 20. The trio had disappeared together. The young man was a coachman, and having heard of the numerous elopements among his profession, he desired to beat the record, and ran away with the two girls.

THE first instance of the cremation of a priest in Italy occurred the other day in Milan. The Rev. Don Giovanni Sartorio had left instructions by his will that his body should be burnt, and had disposed that in case of non-compliance with his wishes the heirs should forfeit the inheritance. As soon as this became known the eleven priests who had been retained to perform the funeral services returned their fees, and the priest's remains were committed to the flames unaccompanied by any Christian rite.

CAPT. LAVINIA CLEGGETT, Lieut. Mattie Adams, and Privates Michael McKernan, Alexander Smith, Ebenezer Willis, and Michael Kollyer, of the Brooklyn branch of the Salvation Army, were tried last week before Justice Walsh for holding services in the City Hall square without a permit. Justice Walsh rendered a decision on the 29th, finding them guilty of being public nuisances. They were driven to Raymond-street jail in the Black Maria, carrying satchels and bundles of clothing in their hands, in anticipation of a long imprisonment.

Salvation.

A LECTURE DELIVERED BY C. B. REYNOLDS BEFORE THE LATE FREETHINKERS' CONVENTION.

We realize the deep reverence Christians entertain for the Bible, and would not wantonly excite their wrath or prejudice. If the Christians' faith is founded on truth, they hav every reason to rejoice, and none to fear, for the more that which is truth is dissected, examined, and investigated, the more clear, bright, and beautiful it appears. We make war only on error, the usurpations of the church, and those doctrins that are adverse to progress and the best interests of humanity. Experience proves those qualifications most worthy of admiration in Christians are never the consequences of Bible teaching or the fruits of Christianity.

Rev. Henry Ward Beecher in a recent sermon declared: "If the works of the devil hav anywhere had an illustrious exposition, it has been in the history of the externalities of the Christian church. It is the history of quarrels without number, of hatings, suspicions, backslidings, and fiendish malignity; and all in the name of Jesus."

Christians claim that God created Adam and Eve, and pronounced them very good, although they did not know the difference between good and evil. God placed them in a garden where knowledge grew on trees, and forbade their eating of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, lest they should become like gods, and know good from evil. Satan inspired them with a desire for wisdom. While unable to discern between good and evil, they ate of the fruit, attained knowledge, and by that one act damned all their posterity, millions of millions, to the horrible, eternal tortures of hell fire.

After four thousand years God put in effect the promised scheme of salvation. This consisted in having his son, a God co-equal with himself, die by crucifixion, to satisfy his wrath against mankind, and open up a way by which all might be saved. Christians all agree that by and through this Christ is the sole hope of salvation. They tell us Jesus died, poured out his precious blood to save our souls from hell. But if we are to believe the New Testament, Christ never shed his blood on the cross, or anywhere else. Crucifixion was in no sense a bloody death. Smith's Bible Dictionary (a standard orthodox authority) says:

"He was watched according to custom by a party of four soldiers with their centurion, whose express office was to prevent the stealing of the body. This was necessary from the lingering character of the death, which sometimes did not supervene even for three days, and was at last the result of gradual benumbing and starvation."

John alone of the evangelists makes mention of any blood at the crucifixion:

"But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs; but one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came there out blood and water" (John xix, 33, 34).

How could a dead man shed his blood? Yet according to the New Testament no blood was shed by Jesus until he was dead.

THE SIN OF UNBELIEF.

Is it any more wicked for us to doubt the incredible than it was for the disciples? They were with him, heard his teachings, saw his miracles, and yet not one of them believed Jesus ever would rise from the dead. (Read Mark xvi, 9–14).

It is a remarkable fact that Christ never promised salvation to any but Jews. Sending out his disciples, he expressly commanded them not to go near the gentiles, "but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. x, 5, 6). He declared, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv, 24).

If the testimony of Christ is true, God never intended any but Jews should be saved. Christ took every care to prevent any but Jews being saved:

"And he said unto them, Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God, but unto them that are without, all these things are done in parables. That seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins be forgiven them" (Mark iv, 11).

According to the New Testament, not until eight years after Christ, finding the Jews would not accept salvation by Jesus, did the apostles turn to the gentiles. And we read how astonished and indignant were all the Christians, that gentiles should be allowed any part or share in Christ or salvation. (Read the account in the tenth chapter of Acts.)

ARE IDIOTS ALL SAVED?

Shall we dwell with them forever in heaven? If so, how very lucky are those born idiotic! If not, where is the justice, love, and mercy of God bringing into existence beings damned to hell tortures for all eternity, who never could, by any possibility, help themselvs or comply with the conditions. For the gentle, pitying savior declared: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi, 16). This is clear, positiv, unmistakable, not who livs right, but who believes right shall be saved. Christians insist that we cannot be saved without faith, but this faith must be accompanied by genuin repentance. If truly repentant, God cannot but forgiv, in the face of the teachings of Christ: "For if ye forgiv men their trespasses, your heavenly father will forgiv you" (Matt. vi, 14). When truly repentant we shall be forgiven. When forgiven, what need of a savior?

No Christian pretends that Christ can save people in their sins, unrepentant, however great their faith. Convicted of crime, doomed to jail, you are pardoned by the governor. Now, being free, how absurd for the governor's son to say to you: "I hav paid the penalty of your crime long before you were born. I alone can save you!" Still Christians will insist Christ alone can save our immortal souls.

WHAT IS AN IMMORTAL SOUL?

Priests and parsons declare "it is indivisible, indestructible, without form or parts, cannot be seen, felt, smelt, or tasted." This is simply a definition of nothing. How does Christ save our souls? At death the immortal soul takes its flight beyond the realms of time and space, and goes to God who gave it. Beyond time! Beyond space! That is nowhere!

So, then, salvation by Christ, your immortal soul going to glory when you die, really means "nothing goes nowhere." Christians assert, "God is everywhere." Then why, at death, need the soul take its flight? Is not God as much at the place of death as he is beyond the clouds? But they answer us, Christ restores us to the loving arms of our dead in heaven. Where is the text in the Bible that says so? On the contrary, Christ positivly declares love for those so near and dear to us in this life will not exist in heaven (read Mark xii, 18–25). Those who attain heaven (which can only be done by rising from the dead at the last day) will then be as the angels, who never knew aught of human love.

Once in heaven, and we must love a lot of strange angels—Guiteau, Jesse James, and other sanctified murderers and villians—just as dearly as we do our own kith and kin. Priests and parsons tell us if we are good Christians, Jesus will restore us to our loved dead, and we shall dwell with them in perfect love through all eternity. At funerals they assure mothers that Jesus will restore to their loving arms their darling children. They tell us husbands and wives shall be reunited in heaven, to dwell in perfect love forever. Their assertions are utterly false. Let them produce chapter and verse of the Bible that justify their declarations. They cannot do so. Let them produce the texts, or

> "Bo those juggling fiends no more believed
> That palter to us in a double sense;
> That keep the word of promis to our ear,
> To break it to our hope."

But Jesus is the only savior; he paid the penalty of our sins. The Bible says, "The soul that sinneth it shall die" (Ezek. xviii, 4). If Christ paid the penalty, Christ's soul died. The Bible says his soul did die (Isa. liii, 10–12). If this is true, he could not hav been God. A dead god is an absurdity. If Christ's body only died, then our bodies only are saved—our souls are lost. The penalty of sin was the death of the soul—the penalty has never been paid.

If Christ's soul did die (he says it did, Rev. i, 18), he could not hav been a god. Being a man, born of woman, according to the New Testament, he himself needed a savior.

Let us examin this vicarious atonement idea. Suppose you hav two boys, the one four, the other six years old; the younger is disobedient, and when time comes for them to go to bed, you refuse to kiss him good-night, tell him he is a bad, wicked child, and you do not love wicked little boys. You kiss the eldest. The youngest looks pleadingly, offers his little quivering, pouting lips to kiss, while tears fill his baby eyes. You say: "O my son, you hav disobeyed me! I will not forgiv you. I hav no kisses for bad boys." They go up to bed. Soon cries and sobs are heard, and then the patter of little feet upon the stairs, and the eldest comes to you, tears streaming from his baby eyes. "What is the matter, darling? What ails my good little boy? Papa kissed you good-night." "I ain't crying cos of my own self, I ain't. I jest crying for baby brother, he so sorry, so sorry, he was naughty. He jest cry heself to deff, he will. O papa, do go kiss him good-night. Please do, papa." "But he was a wicked boy. He disobeyed me." "O papa, he is so sorry! Him such a little fellow; got no mamma to help him be good. Mamma's dead. Gone 'way up in heaven wid de angels, I s'pose. She'd be sorry and kiss him—I know she would." "He has been a bad child, and must be punished." "O papa, you just whip me 'stead of him. I won't mind much, I won't—only do go and kiss little brother 'fore he jest cry heself to deff."

Would there be reason, sense, justice, in whipping that innocent child?

Christian, could you do it? No! Are you then so much better than your God?

If God could only be appeased by the blood of his own son, why did he wait four thousand years? Why not hav sent him to die in the garden of Eden, for Adam and Eve, soon as they sinned, then hav started a new and better race? Did it need four thousand years to study out such a wonderful plan of salvation? Or did it take Christ that long to "screw his courage to the sticking-place," before he dared come to earth and make the unwilling sacrifice?

Christians tell us Jesus gave his precious blood—laid down his life—died a willing sacrifice for us.

They and the New Testament do not agree. They contradict the Bible they so blame us for not believing. Jesus did not die a willing sacrifice:

"O my father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me" (Matt. xxvi, 39).

"And being in an agony he prayed more earnestly: and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground" (Luke xxii, 44).

"And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eli! Eli! lama sabachthani? That is to say, My God! My God! why hast thou forsaken me?" (Matt. xxvii, 46).

Any willingness to die, any freely laying down life to save others, about that? If so, what words could he hav used if he had been seized with abject fear of death, and called in vain on God to save or help him?

But the rich man and Lazarus? Well, in the case of the two little boys, suppose, instead of punishing the eldest as condition of forgiving the youngest, the little one protested against your punishing the innocent for his wrong-doing, you, in wrath that he should dare to use his baby reason against your mature wisdom, carry him down cellar, shut him up in the dark, cold, and damp, and refuse to let him out, day after day, week after week.

How your wife, the mother of the little sufferer, would look down from heaven, and thrum her harp with double energy in her ecstatic joy to see you act so like your God! How your other child must love and reverence you for your display of power, love, and mercy! How your brethren and sisters of the church, when the weekly prayer-meeting is held in your parlor, must delight to hear the poor baby's dying sobs and moans! How great, how grand, how godlike you appear, smiling, laughing, as you listen to your own little child's cries for mercy! Like your God, you "rejoice in his calamity and mock at its sufferings" (Prov. i, 26).

The saved mother in heaven can look down into hell and witness the sufferings of her darling children, and then wave her palm leaf, thrum her harp, clap her wings, and sing with redoubled joy, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty!"

And this is Christian salvation!

The Bible says heaven and all the angelic host will at last be burnt up. Christians talk and sing about the joys of salvation, going to heaven to dwell forever with the heavenly host and their own dear loved ones. This is a terrible mistake. Old and New Testaments alike declare that heaven and all the angelic host shall at last be burnt up, dissolved.

"And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll" (Isa. xxxiv, 4).
"The heavens shall pass away with a great noise."
"All these things shall be dissolved."
"The heavens being on fire shall be dissolved."
(Read 2 Peter iii, 10, 12.)

Christian salvation is mythical, visionary, absurd; a delusion and a snare. No vicarious atonement can save us from the penalty of violated law. We need genuin salvation for ourselvs and our loved ones, here and now. Law is God, and if we would be saved the dread penalty of its violation, we must provide means that all may be educated into knowledge of its requirements.

What can Liberalism do for humanity, what offer in exchange for hope and faith in heaven? We answer: Promote the study of science, of physiology, and hygiene; make evident the necessity for everyone to devote as much thought and care to the improvement and elevation of our race as we do to the improvement of the breed of our horses, dogs, and hogs; secure facilities for all to obtain thorough knowledge of nature's laws, so as to save ourselvs and our loved ones from the penalties of ignorance.

Liberalism is doing as well as doubting; repudiating errors of life as well as errors of faith. To eradicate superstition, to weed out error, bigotry, and fanaticism, avails little. If the soil is left barren, the noxious weeds will soon crop out again. It is not alone essential that the weeds be uprooted, but that in their place the seeds of truth shall be planted, watered, cultivated, until the luxuriant vine of love, with its leaves of mercy and its fruit of truth, shall leave no place for the noxious weeds of error, hate, superstition, and vice to propagate.

This is the mission of the National Liberal League, and it needs no words to prove that every honest heart should alike by money and influence sustain it. It is one thing to be able intellectually to comprehend the truth; it is quite another thing to hav the truth take hold of the inner life, to recognize and obey its claims, to struggle out of the ruts of error, and patiently, perseveringly climb the steep hill of rectitude, and with love, tenderness, and a spirit of self-sacrifice, giv of time and means to assist and encourage others to ascend with us.

Let us practice Liberalism, as well as openly profess it, remembering Liberalism is a means to an end, and that end is salvation—salvation from error, bigotry, fanaticism, and ignorance, insuring a more useful, better, nobler, and consequently happier life.

The New Republic.

Every institution, like the individuals who compose it, is subject to the law of evolution, as the institution, whether religious, political, or social, is the expression of the highest thought of its founders.

The originators of any institution are in advance of the general people, else they would not strike out into new paths, advance new theories, or found new systems of thought. In this our country the founders of our government were greatly in advance of the masses of the people, both in the conception of a true government and of what constituted religious liberty, and even now, after more than a century of growth and experience, we are trying to actualize what we hav advocated theoretically all these years, and which was incorporated in our federal Constitution. Lack of development in the people hindered a true interpretation and application of these principles in the affairs of government.

We hav interpreted our Constitution as we hav the Bible, according to our various stages of development, our educational bias. Both Bible and Constitution were in the past made to sanction slavery. Both now, in the light of this age, are made by their exponents to favor liberty, so far as chattel slavery is concerned. There are other forms of slavery, however, we hav not yet outgrown, the greatest of which is religious slavery, as from this parent all other forms of slavery are born.

The church demands obedience of all men. It prescribes their beliefs, it organizes their worship, it determins their merit, it stands at the end of the way with the radiant key of heaven and the flaming key of hell, making the whole world crouch at its golden promises and lurid threatenings.

Although our government was founded upon a purely secular idea, and our Constitution plainly declares against the compulsory support of any religion, yet to-day we are virtually taxed to protect church property because such property is untaxed. We are compelled to pay taxes to support chaplains in every department of government. We are made to bow to the popular religious ideas of the day by the popular and legal oath. We are taxed because of appropriations made by our government to sectarian schools. We hav laws to compel us to observe certain church forms in the Sabbatarian laws. We hav laws enacted discriminating against certain unorthodox kinds of literature under the guise of anti-vice societies, enacted for the sole purpose of interfering with Freethought. And to day the church is trying, as never before, by means of prohibitory legislation and God-in-the-Constitution movements, to obtain a paternal power over the people. All these laws and measures must be replaced by the secular idea of the founders of our government.

In the new republic woman will be recognized as an important factor. In every department of nature we find two forces, the centripetal and centrifugal forces. When these are balanced, harmony is the result, but remove either and chaos follows. Our government ignores this grand law. All class legislation, whether of birth, blood, race, or sex, is destructiv of national life and prosperity, as the history of all the nations of the past has proven. Of all class legislation, that of sex is most odious, entering, as it does, the domestic circle, desecrating the family altar, elevating the son above the mother that bore him, and everywhere subjugating moral power to brute force. We hav never had a republic. We first had a white man's government, now we hav a rich man's government. If our nation long remains, even with its present seeming of republicanism, we must make it what it professes to be—a people's government.

We hav no free press with all our boasts. The monopolies own the press of the country, and control its expressions on all subjects as it does the telegraph lines by which news is obtained.

The land must be returned to the people from whom it has been unjustly filched, and all revenues for the support of the government raised by a rental of lands which should be held in trust by the government for the use of the people instead of taking the fruits of industry. Thus the rights of labor would be protected. All the wealth of our world is the result of the labor of the world, and yet, although enough is produced to fully satisfy all the wants of the whole people, the great mass of the people are in want, while the few are surfeited with overmuch. Competition must giv place to co-operation, and each individual hav the fruits of his own toil. All means of transportation and intercommunication, railroads, telegraphs, etc., must be controled by the government in the interest of the people, for their benefit, as is the postal system, thus making them the people's servants instead of their cruel masters, as they now are, wringing from them their hard-earned products and controling even their votes. Our banking system must be abolished, and the government issue the money direct to the people instead of as now issuing bonds upon which to base our banks' issues and paying the bankers interest on what they owe; and the privilege of collecting interest from the people on the same also, thus getting interest on their possessions and their debts, at the same time giving no security to the depositor.

In our new republic we shall hav no penal institutions, but reformatories to cure our morally sick; and with our greater knowledge of the laws of heredity we will cease generating criminals, until finally health, happiness, and peace will be the inheritance of earth's children.

JULIET H. SEVERANCE.

Reasoning With God.

"Surely I would speak to the Almighty, and I desire to reason with God. But ye are forgers of lies, ye are all physicians of no value" (Job xiii, 4).

These words of Job to his friends might fairly be addressed by the present generation to the clerical humbugs who put themselvs up as God's interpreters. For centuries men sat at the feet of their spiritual pastors and masters, swallowing the mess of rubbish promulgated from the pulpits. They were told that the Bible was infallible truth, and they believed it without examining its claims. They read with one eye the verses to which their attention was directed, and which corresponded with the ideas they had imbibed in their infancy. They closed the other eye that they might not see the verse on the opposit page which taught exactly the reverse. But a few daring spirits who had the courage to use their own intellects, and to giv utterance to their own opinions, hav brought about a new era. Many an honest man now reasons with God and givs the lie to his ministers.

We hav all been told that it is our duty to serve God with prayer and praise; that we must every day remind him of his infinit wisdom, and ask him to change his plans according to our finite intelligences; that we must never forget to tell him how good and how mighty he is, because he often forgets his own attributes. His memory of his goodness was a little treacherous when he said, "I will bring evil upon them which they shall not escape" (Jer. xi, 11), and he was quite oblivious of his omnipotence when he admitted that "he could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley because they had chariots of iron" (Judges i, 19).

The minds of Christian children are made receptacles for all the rubbish their religious teachers choose to shoot into them. At first the infant reason inquires why and how such things should be. They are told that God gave them understanding, as he planted the tree of knowledge, on purpose that it should never be utilized. So the window which might hav admitted a breath of common sense to their minds is closed, and the dust which might hav been scattered accumulates, until it requires some pretty hard scrubbing from the brush of experience to remove it. Job had been undergoing that cleansing process for some time. He had spent a good deal of his life in prayer and praise. He "rose up early in the morning and offered burnt sacrifices" (Job i, 5). He had asked God for blessings, and in return that benevolent deity had given the devil power to take from him all he possessed. He had continually thanked him for benefits received until he had nothing left to thank him for. Nothing remained to him but "boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown." That was a sore subject for praise. Still he endured it all without complaint until his three friends, Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zopha the Naamathite, came to comfort him. The consolation they administered appears to hav failed in producing the intended effect. First they lifted up their eyes, then they lifted up their voices and wept. Job was not comforted a bit. Next they "rent every one his mantle, and sprinkled dust upon their heads towards heaven" (Job ii, 12). Still the boils were just as troublesome. Then "they sat down with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights, and none spake a word unto him" (verse 13). This was worse than the boils, for "after this Job opened his mouth and cursed his day" (iii, 1).

The condition of many at the present day bears a strong resemblance to that of Job. They are beginning to discover the uselessness of religion. Their hopes of riches stored up for them above the sky, "where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal" (Matt. vi, 19), are growing fainter and fainter. The festering sores of vice and poverty are eating into the flesh of the community, and God heals them not. The truth is making itself known. It rests with man himself to remedy the evils of suffering humanity. The divine physician is a myth, and his earthly ministers blind leaders of the blind.

The men of this generation do not read the Bible through the same spectacles that their grandfathers used. They are beginning at last to "reason with God." They ask for what purpose the tree of life, the tree of knowledge, and the serpent were placed in Eden. They perceive that if Adam, continuing innocent, had not been subject to death, the tree of life would hav been useless, and that, falling from innocence, God only feared the effects of the fruit he had himself created, for he said: "Lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life and eat, and liv forever. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden" (Gen. iii, 22, 23). They understand that if the tree of knowledge brought sin and death into the world, it was a mad or wicked act to place it within reach of beings who knew not good from evil. They know that if the serpent brought unutterable woe into the world, he was an evil thing, and that it must be false to say, "God saw everything that he had made, and behold it was very good" (i, 31). They ask the reason for actions so unreasonable. God is silent, and when his ministers attempt to speak in his behalf, their weak attempts to reconcile the irreconcilable only prove them to be "forgers of lies" and "physicians of no value."

There are those who close their Bibles and try to forget the monstrous tales they hav read of a cruel and bloodthirsty deity. They picture to themselvs a god after their own human hearts. In proportion as their own natures are gentle, loving, and just, they try to fancy a divinity possessed of similar good qualities. They speak to the sick and hungry poor of a bountiful providence and merciful father. They try to comfort the distressed, as Job's friends tried to comfort him. Their intentions are good, but they are in error. To the suffering the god of nature is but a slightly improved edition of the God of scripture. They reason with him, and famin, pestilence, and misery are witnesses in their behalf when they say to his advocates, "Ye are 'forgers of lies,' and 'physicians of no value.'"

It is the age of reasoning with the gods. We can see the brightness rising, the dawn of the coming day. It is a day that must come—that is already coming. It is getting lighter and lighter still, as men win liberty of thought and speech. The sun of truth is rising. It is dispelling the dark clouds of ignorance and superstition. Trust in God is vanishing. Trust in ourselvs is gaining strength. Men cease crying for help where there is no help. They are learning to help themselvs and to help each other. They find work better than prayer, and that there is more wisdom in making hay while the sun shines than in asking the Lord for fair weather. To-day they may be like Job in his distress, poor and sick. To-morrow they will resemble him in his later state. Enjoying the goods of this world in the place of vainly hoping for a better, they will find their latter end more blessed than the beginning.

The Demands of Liberalism.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in state legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

(The two following demands, proposed by Col. Ingersoll, hav also been adopted:)

1. National protection for national citizens, in their equal civil and religious rights, irrespectiv of race or sex, to be secured under present laws and proper legislation, and finally to be guaranteed by amendment to the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.
2. Universal education the basis of universal suffrage in this secular republic, to be secured under present laws and proper legislation, and finally to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every state to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

Editorial Notes.

THE circus may or may not be an important factor in modern civilization. One would think not from the following account in the official organ of the Methodist church:

"One of our country towns, not a thousand miles from this editorial sanctum, recently enjoyed the visit of a circus. Unusual attractions were promised, and the town was all agog. Many Christian professors went with the multitude to do evil. A section of the seats gave way and let several hundred people down to the ground rather unceremoniously. The show was of an inferior order, and gave a great deal of dissatisfaction. Some of the circus folks got into a disgraceful row in one of the tents. On leaving town one of the actors, jumping from a wagon which had a drunken driver, injured his leg seriously, so as to require surgical attendance. A poor girl, not over strong mentally, was so excited by the circus that she ran away from home, and was in great peril in New York for a time. And this demoralizing show took off more money than all the Christians of the town will contribute for missions for several years."

But let those who turn with a sigh from the foregoing giv the appended extract from the New York World a careful perusal, and be comforted:

"A meeting of the members of the Willis Street Baptist church in Paterson, N. J., was held on a recent evening in the church to take action in regard to the charges made against the pastor, the Rev. George Guirey, by Mrs. Bradbury of slander and hanging a Bologna sausage to the door-knob of the front door of her residence. The meeting was a most disorderly one, the members being divided into two sections. Both factions became intensely excited, and the noise they made in the church could be heard a block away. The members jumped around and on the seats, and called each other liars and hypocrits. Great excitement prevailed, and the police had to be sent for to prevent a fight. During the excitement a member fainted and fell to the floor, creating almost a panic. He was carried out and laid on the grass in front of the church. Several reporters were secreted in the church, and on being discovered a howl went up from the angry crowd. The scribes were ignominiously ejected without ceremony. The reporters then climbed on wood-sheds in the rear of the church, but were again discovered, and the windows were closed to keep the racket from being heard without. The street in front of the church was crowded with people, while the church doors were guarded by the police."

Whether this "show" was of an "inferior order and gave great dissatisfaction," the account does not state, but it would be interesting to know how much money the Paterson church takes off annually from the missionary fund.

LAST week we chronicled a charge by the Rev. Talmage to the effect that Freethought led to suicide. But even while Talmage was preparing the sermon in which this accusation appears, a religious editor was conjuring up a rhapsody on the glories of the next world as compared with this "vale of tears." This rhapsody, printed in one of the foremost and most widely circulated religious papers, ends thus:

"Heavenly intercourse is renewed under heavenly auspices. Friends meet again. Husband and wife—parent and child—brother and sister—the shepherd and his flock—all renew their former fellowships 'faultless before the throne!' O blessed light! O celestial country!

"Who, who, would liv alway, away from his God;
Away from yon heaven, that blissful abode,
Where the rivers of pleasure flow on the bright plains,
And the noontide of glory eternally reigns?'"

It is easy to imagin an emotional Christian, bereft of comfort in this world, and transported by misleading rhetoric concerning the next, hastening his or her advent thither by the readiest means at hand. But for a Freethinker, with the motto, "One world at a time," to commit suicide would be as if, having but one dollar in money, he should forthwith cast it into the sea. But, after all, Christian or Atheist, it is better for a person to launch himself into the unknown by suicide than to follow the example so many eminent Christians hav set, and send some one else there. The following dispatch was printed in the daily papers not long ago:

"CHICAGO, Aug. 12, 1884.—At Lake View, a suburb of this city, this afternoon, the Rev. H. M. Collison, pastor of the Fullerton Avenue Presbyterian church, shot his wife and then himself. Both are dead."

In this case, when the Rev. Mr. Collison found that his mind was irresistibly bent on both murder and suicide, he would hav acted wisely if he had given suicide the precedence and shot himself first.

THE Home Missionary Society of the Methodist church is exhorted by the Rev. Daniel Wise, D. D., to make great efforts for the conversion of Roman Catholics to Methodism. The first persons to be labored with, he holds, are the women, because "the affection of its women for Romanism stricken, it is fatally wounded; the arrow pierces the heel of Achilles." The Rev. Mr. Wise says:

"One desirable thing this Home Missionary Society can most unquestionably do is to collect and diffuse facts which show the debasing nature of the superstitions which enslave Catholic women. Inquiry would bring these superstitions to the light. Their exposure would really appal the Protestant public. To illustrate their character the writer will mention but one, of which he knows the witnesses: A Catholic servant girl, of more than ordinary brightness, was found by a fellow-servant late one evening sitting insensible in the kitchen with her beads round her neck and a burning taper in her hand, which rested on the folds of her dress. The candle was so far burnt that a few minutes more would hav sufficed to set the dress on fire—and to cause a tragedy which might hav included not the girl only, but the whole family also. The explanation of this strange, almost tragic, scene was that the girl, seized with palpitation of the heart, thought she was going to die. Hence, she took this candle, which had been blessed by the priest, lighted it, began counting her beads, and in that act became insensible. In the blindness of her superstition she imagined that the burning of the candle, in virtue of the priest's blessing, would giv her a peaceful entrance into eternity. Oh, gross superstition! Yet it is but typical of many more which enslave the women of Romanism. Were our ladies to gather up such facts, and print them, their publication would cause a tide of sympathy for the innocent victims of Roman superstition as would beget in the church such zeal for their rescue as could not be ineffectual."

The fervor with which the Rev. Mr. Wise denounces Roman superstition illustrates what has often been observed before—namely, that Protestants can bring much more effectiv arguments to bear against the Catholic religion than they are able to advance in support of their own.

BISHOP WARREN, of the Methodist church, can hardly be called a scientist, though he is dabbling in physics to some extent. This is the way he accounts for the attractiv power of the sun:

"But all this power of a sun so vast that its effects are so great 92,000,000 miles away had to be taken from some source and posited in the sun. It could only be taken out of the Spirit, the origin of all power, and out of Almightiness, since only that could be a treasury of strength sufficient to endure the draft without bankruptcy."

The "Spirit" and "Almightiness" to which the bishop attributes inexhaustible force is first introduced to the public in the Old Testament. Here is a brief reference to him:

"And behold, the Lord stood upon a wall made by a plumbline, with a plumbline in his hand" (Amos vii, 7).

And here is another:

"In the same day shall the Lord shave with a razor that is hired, namely, by them beyond the river, by the king of Assyria, the head, and the hair of the feet" (Isaiah vii, 20).

Between the ornamental industries of standing on a wall and shaving his feet, this being has found time to endow the sun with sufficient power to control the solar system! In the words of the president of the National Liberal League, "it won't do." Truly, the Rev. Dr. Buckley spoke wisely when he said that the place for scientific discussion was not in the pulpit.

THE Rev. James Blackledge, writing from Japan upon the condition of Christianity in that part of the moral vinyard, says: "Among the common people there is still a great deal of idol worship, though the more educated classes hav left Egypt and are in the desert. I am glad to say that some hav entered, and many are near, the Promised Land. The great subject of discussion is religion; the people are examining the relativ value of Shintoism, Buddhism, and Christianity. We are by no means in doubt which will finally triumph. Christianity must displace all the old forms in time. The hottest part of the battle will be with Infidelity, but this latest foe must also finally succumb." By the remark that the "more educated classes hav left Egypt and are in the desert," the Rev. Mr. Blackledge probably means to be understood that the educated classes of Japan are where the educated classes of other countries will be found, namely, in a state, not only of o ubt, but of unbelief, as to the truth of the Christian religion. If Christianity is to displace the old forms in Japan, it must do so quickly. The doctrins of Liberalism are coming up the steep of time abreast of the advance of civilization, and the superstitions of the Christian religion will follow those of Shintoism and Buddhism. The hotter the battle, the more glorious the victory. We may add that in our opinion the prophecy that this "latest foe" will "succumb" will never be fulfilled. So far as its own history is involved, Liberalism is unacquainted with the meaning of that word.

LAST week Roman Catholics celebrated, by a triduum, the nineteenth centenary, as they tell us, of the birth of the "immaculate mother of God." How they identify the date is a matter of no special moment to non-Catholics. But it is sad to see indications of the increase of mariolatry among our fellow-Christians of the Catholic faith. One of the Catholic papers begins an editorial with this ascription:

"Praise and honor be to Her Name forever!"

We hav the most profound respect for the mother of our savior, but we dare not giv to her what belongs only to the trinity. It is true that Catholics claim to distinguish between the worship or service (hyperdulia) paid to the virgin, and that given to God (latria); but the distinction is one for the doctors, and not for the masses. The effect cannot be harmless. Can one serve God and Mary?—Independent.

Such a grave, almost sorrowful, consideration of a gross superstition by a paper in some things standing deservedly high for its intellectual keenness is enough to arouse feelings of pity for the mental condition of the editors. It is like splitting a hair which does not exist; or a painstaking, careful kick at nothing. How surprised the writer will be to some day find out that the service of Mary and worship of Jehovah are equally barren of results! Such rubbish prompts another inquiry—Can a man be pious and not be a fool?

SIX years ago a foul and mysterious murder was committed in Braxton county, near Savagetown, W. Va. A stone-mason named Shoemaker was shot twice through the head, and his throat afterward cut. No clue to the murderers was ever obtained until a few days ago a local preacher, living near there, was fatally injured by a falling tree. When told he must die, he sent for the prosecuting attorney and a minister, and confessed that he and another man, a prominent merchant, had committed the crime. The names are withheld by the authorities for the present, but a warrant has been issued. All of which is respectfully referred to the Rev. Mr. Talmage, with the suggestion that he use it as a text for a sermon instead of lying about Infidelity.

IN making comments upon the proceedings of the National Liberal League, the editor of the Index makes a point that only forty-eight delegates presented credentials, and leaves the reader to infer that the Congress was very small. This is not so. The credentials were submitted almost the first thing Monday morning, and a great many delegates arrived later, but as neither the outgoing nor incoming secretary thought to keep a list, we were unable to get the names. The call for the Congress, also, was so broad that many not delegates were present, and lent their influence to the work of organization, but did not vote so they could be counted. Mr. Curtis, who made the report for the Index, estimates the attendance at about three hundred.

IN another column Mr. Watts has written out a portion of his reply to Mr. Chainey. Lack of time to prepare it prevented a longer excerpt. Next week, however, he promises another letter, in which he will giv his remarks more in extenso. We can readily understand from the work Mr. Watts is doing that his hands are full, and we are pleased to learn that he is drawing crowded audiences in Canada. His efforts to unite the whole of the Canadian Freethinkers with those of the United States are most important, and they bid fair to be successful. Mr. Watts will shortly publish an "Address to American Freethinkers," and also issue a propagandist tract on "The Affirmations of Secularism."

WE cannot print all the replies to Ingersoll the country papers hav fulminated during his recent western tour. They would fill THE TRUTH SEEKER, big as it is, and besides are mighty unprofitable reading. Such dense ignorance as these editors evince is painful, but we hav not space to minister to all their minds diseased.

GEORGE CHAINEY has been engaged for the Sundays of October at Cleveland, Ohio. He will also make week-night engagements at places within a hundred miles of that city. His address is Forest City Hotel, Cleveland, Ohio. In November he returns to Boston to recommence his weekly lectures.

Canadian Notes.

It is many years since such excitement was known in Canada as that which now exists in Ontario throughout religious and Freethought circles. In the pulpits, on the platform, and in the daily papers theological questions are propounded and debated. The Secular side is most ably championed by Messrs. Evans and Risser, the president and secretary of the Toronto Secular Society, letters from whom hav appeared in the Toronto World during the past week. The churches are evidently alarmed at the bold and aggressiv steps now being taken by the Liberals of Ontario, and are somewhat perplexed as to the course they should take to "stem the tide of Infidelity", which is at the present time flowing with such power in their midst. Preaching against this revival of skeptical thought only stimulates that which the ministers wish to allay, and although in the person of the Rev. Dr. Sexton they hav one of the foremost and most efficient debaters of the age, they fear to allow him to enter the arena of controversy with Mr. Charles Watts, lest the conflict should increase the power of the enemy. This dread of discussion upon the part of the Toronto Christians is causing a great deal of surprise, and inspiring much inquiry among the hitherto indifferent class. It is very properly said that principles and teachings that are too weak to be defended on the platform in calm debate scarcely deserve to be preached so persistently from the pulpit. The consequence is that many thoughtful persons are driven to the Secular side to learn what they fail to acquire in the churches, namely, a knowledge of both sides of the theological questions of the day.

For the past few weeks Dr. Sexton has divided his time between Toronto and Hamilton, preaching and lecturing upon Atheism, Prayer, and Christ and his influence upon the world. Judging from the favorable reports of his performances, he appears to be a very unique advocate of the popular faith. He has a religion of his own, a history of his own, and "facts" which he obtains from a source known only to himself. Some persons hav ventured an opinion that this may be one reason why his friends discourage debate, thinking that if he were brought face to face with an opponent it would be readily seen that his religion had but little in common with the orthodox faith, and that his "facts" in no way corresponded with the records of history or the experience of our own times. It is very suggestiv that in lecturing upon the three subjects mentioned above, the reverend doctor avoids all reference to the scriptures. He objects to hold a brief for Bible Theism. The New Testament theory of prayer has no defender in him, and the Christ of Revelation he never touches. Instead of this he givs his version of skeptical theories, which few skeptics hav ever heard of, and then proceeds to knock down his "man of straw." This tickles the ears of his audiences, and passes current with them as an excellent defense of Christianity, whereas in truth it has no necessary connection with what is generally regarded as the genuin Christian faith.

The reverend doctor is always fond of attempting to impress his hearers with the idea that Christianity has always exerted a civilizing influence. This, said he, is the verdict of all history. Where's the proof of this reckless allegation? On the contrary, after this religion had existed for a thousand years, when it was at its noon in Europe, the state of society was horrible beyond imagination. Those who were then regarded as learned were chiefly occupied with miraculous legends, disputes about mysteries and dogmas, of which none knew or could know anything. The church, as it grew more powerful, grew more corrupt. Popes bribed and intrigued for election; they fought and cursed each other; monasteries and nunneries, which were at first were the dungeons of starved and mutilated lives, grew proverbial for all kinds of voluptuousness; Christian Rome was the common sink for the worst vices of all Europe. The peasantry and laborers were mere serfs, crushed in hopeless misery beneath feudal exactions and despotism. Their food was the food of hogs, their cabins mere stys. As no laws of nature were acknowledged, no sanitary measures were thought of, though, from the general filth and want, dreadful plagues and famins were frequent. The church got a rich revenue from shrine-cures, and relic-cures, and miraculous cures of all sorts. As for superstition, it was omnipotent; the air was supposed to swarm with devils and angels; witchcraft was thought to be so common that "witches" and "wizards" were always being put to death; relics commanded a fetich-worship as degrading as exists among the lowest tribes of Africa. Faith being supreme, science, philosophy, and education were all discouraged. For fifteen hundred years Christendom did not produce a single astronomer. Even the pure mathematics, which need no experiment or apparatus, were utterly neglected. As Mr. Ruskin observes, "I never met a Christian whose heart was thoroughly set upon the world to come, and so far as human judgment could pronounce perfect and right before God, who cared about art at all." Such, briefly, was the real condition of society under Christian rule, which the doctor, to be accurate, ought to state to those who entrust him with their thinking.

The Christians hav by no means had it all to themselvs. Mr. Charles Watts has continued his replies to the doctor to crowded audiences, which increase in numbers weekly. The enthusiasm displayed at these meetings is a good index of the opinions entertained. The Toronto World, of Sept. 22d, says:

"Christianity—Its Claims Examined," was the subject of a lecture delivered in Albert Hall last evening by Charles Watts. There was a crowded audience in attendance. Mr. Watts speaks in a clear, loud tone, in a very positiv and emphatic manner, and with readiness, fluency, and consecutivness of thought."

September 23d and 24th, Mr. Watts lectured in Hamilton, and on the following evening he formed a local society. The Hamilton Spectator, of Thursday, Sept. 25th, has the following:

"A meeting was held in Larkin Hall last night for the purpose of organizing a Secular society, as a branch of the Freethought association of Canada. Mr. Charles Watts presided. A considerable number of names, of both ladies and gentlemen, were submitted for membership. Mr. Littlehales was elected president, Mr. Coulter vice-president, and Mr. Maddocks secretary. Another meeting will be held on Thursday evening, Oct. 2d, to complete the organization of the society."

In addition to lectures in Toronto Sunday evenings, Mr. Watts is engaged to speak at Simcoe, Welland, Lindsay, Montreal, and intermediate places, where he intends to establish local societies, preparatory to the general amalgation of the Freethinkers of the dominion with those of the states.

We are glad to hear that this suggested alliance meets with the warm approval of our Canadian friends, who are delighted with the prospectiv reunion. The Hamilton Secular Society has passed the following resolution, proposed by Mr. Thomas Littlehales, and seconded by Mr. George Maddocks:

"We, the members of the Hamilton Secular Society, learn with pleasure that it is contemplated to change the name of the National Liberal League of the United States to that of 'The American Secular Union.' Such a change we earnestly recommend, as it will enable the Freethinkers throughout Canada to join their brethren of the states, and thus form one great and united association for the promulgation of Liberal principles."

The arrangements for the Toronto Freethought Convention to be held next December, are progressing. Last Sunday a meeting was held in Toronto of the district officers, when Mr. Watts explained his plan of unification, which met with a cordial support.

A LEAGUE of Catholics is being formed in England "to protect the vital principle of doctrinal Christianity in popular education;" that is, to neutralize secular education as far as possible by religious dogmas. The Duke of Norfolk and the Marquis of Bute are among the promoters of the league. It would be difficult, comments the Freethinker, to find two more abject specimens of superstition even in the House of Lords. The Duke of Norfolk believes in the healing powers of St. Winifred's well, and, with more reason, sent his wife to Lourdes as a cure for sterility. The Marquis of Bute takes out of Cardiff alone, in rents and dock dues, over a million per annum, giving absolutely nothing in return; and devotes his monstrous fortune to the purpose of the priests. In intellect he is spoken of in society journals as contemptible.

The League.

How to Organize a Local League.

The National Liberal League is formed by the union of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues. To organize a Local Auxiliary League, any person (man or woman) may place the following Call at the head of a sheet of paper and solicit signatures:

CALL.

WE, the undersigned citizens of [here introduce name of town or city], agree to organize an Auxiliary Liberal League, to work in connection with the National Liberal League, and to pay the sum set opposit our names for that purpose.

Names.	Residences.	Amounts.

As soon as ten persons hav subscribed to this Call, and five dollars hav been paid in, make out an application for a Charter, inclosing the application, together with a money order or postal note for five dollars (or the amount may be inclosed in a registered letter) to the secretary of the National Liberal League. The fee for a Charter is ten dollars, and the Board of Directors hav voted to allow the organizer of the Auxiliary Liberal League to retain five dollars as compensation for his or her services in effecting the organization.

Any Liberal society can by a vote qualify itself an Auxiliary Liberal League, and take out a charter.

On receipt of the five dollars and application signed by the President and Secretary (or the temporary Secretary) of the new League (and as many others as may choose), the Secretary will forward to the applicant a Charter signed by the proper officers of the National Liberal League. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM,
Secretary of the National Liberal League.

QUARTERLY REPORT.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME, MILWAUKEE CO., WIS., Sept. 15, A. S. 284.

To the Secretary of the National Liberal League:

We, the officers of the Veteran Liberal League, respectfully submit our second quarterly report:

To the number in the Veteran Liberal League, as previously reported (94), there hav been added eight more members, and one has withdrawn, making our present strength that of a full volunteer company, 101, all present or accounted for. The intellectual and moral status of our membership, it is no vanity to observe, is not only equal but even superior to that of our comrades unaffiliated with our organization. There are, unfortunately, on these grounds some very hard and dissipated characters, the worse and larger part of whom belong to, or trail after, one or the other of the two churches which presume to quarter on the United States, in spite of the alleged purely secular character of the government.

Meetings hav been held as follows:

June 3d.—Lecture, by Col. Roberts, of Texas; music and brief addresses, by Mr. Stevens, of Chicago, Mr. Ormsby, and Mrs. Dr. Juliet Severance, of Milwaukee.

July 7th.—A reading from THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, by the venerable veteran and twice reverend president, Jason Kellog, prefacing a sermon, "The Measure of a Man," by John P. Guild, of Milwaukee; piano music.

July 21st.—This was a red letter day. Mr. H. P. Stark, of New York city, told us the truth as it is in human experience, and he was big enough, and bold enough, and honest enough to say to all prelate buffoons demanding faith in their folly, "You lie!" He also gave us the best music on the violin that has ever been echoed in our theater.

July 28th.—Our old hearts were cheered by a sweet song, sweetly sung by a sweet singer from Chicago, Miss Emily Spencer. The hope of a common sense sort of a hereafter was happily set forth by the eloquent Texan, Col. Roberts, in an extempore dissertation on "The Philosophy of Spiritualism," Dr. H. S. Brown supplementing it with his view of the sweet by and by; and Mr. Ormsby arose to remark upon equal rights in property, as in politics, being essential to the attainment of utmost ability in all persons.

August 4th.—President Kellogg addressed us, followed by H. S. Brown, M. D., of Milwaukee, author of "The Bible of the Religion of Science," etc.

August 11th—The Veteran Liberal League met, pursuant to adjournment, in the Ward Memorial Hall, and found it being fitted up as a sleeping barrack, and our friends, ladies and gentlemen, who had kindly come up from the city to visit and speak to us, were much astonished that this regularly chartered and orderly bearing society of old soldiers should be thus unceremoniously dumped out of doors, the powers that be not having manners enough to giv a moment's notice of the change of occupancy. If this unwarrantable contemptuousness was meant to break up the League, it is on account of the prejudice that does not ken, or of the cussedness which does not care, that there is any good that does not cry, "Lord, Lord!" as we were from the first refused the use of the chapel on the plea that we were not a "religious" order.

August 17th.—A sunny day. By permission of the friendly owner of Black's Grove, a mile away, the League held a meeting, not as in a temple of God, but the halls of nature. The editor of Volksblatt, Mr. Schilling, vocalized the woods with an oration on "Humbugs."

August 24th and 31st.—The League continued to meet in the grove; favored with talk by Roberts, Brown, Guild, and others. During September we hav been unable to meet outside the Home grounds on account of roughs from the city who made our gatherings their opportunity. Beside, our silence speaks our grievance louder than do our words, as a standing notice of the League meetings in the hall assigned therefor is kept posted on the bulletin boards.

Although there are about seven hundred men here, out of over a thousand in all, who cannot affiliate with the churches, on account of preferring logic to fable, still we are refused the use of our chapel one evening or afternoon in each week, while it is standing idle five evenings a week, and is entered but seldom daytimes except Sunday. This, need we say, we think very unjust, and wholly ungracious, on the part of the governor, with whom the case rests; and when the so-called Investigating committee was here, we so stated to their honors, but they pleaded no power to interfere in the matter. We, therefore, pray for the influence of the National Liberal League, and of all fair-minded men, upon the consciences of all Congressmen to instate us in our rights, as guaranteed by the Constitution of the American Union, which guarantee and Constitution it is the purpose of the Liberal League to uphold in its impartiality and preserve in its integrity.

These minutes of our proceedings, and request for redress of grievances, we expressly desire to hav you publish.

REV. JASON KELLOG, President.
JOHN P. GUILD, Acting Secretary.

LEAGUE NO 77.

FILLMORE CITY, Aug. 28, 284.

To the Secretary of the National Liberal League:

Our League, No. 77, is not dead, though it has few members. Our library with its reading-room as established last winter is still here, and perhaps when winter comes we will be able to infuse new life into the old bones and go on our way rejoicing.

The idea that the two chief officers shall giv their whole time to the organization is a good one, and should hav been adopted from the first. But they cannot liv on air alone. Will the branch Leagues support them? The president and secretary of this League say they will tax themselvs for that purpose, and try to induce others to do the same,

I hav always contended that education was the savior of mankind—education based on scientific facts; knowledge that the people begin to refuse to be led by demagogs, that each individual, society, or community claim a hand in, is ominous of good. It is my star of hope of a government "of the people, for the people, and by the people."

We believe in every overture consistent with honor in order to produce harmony. In regard to the Comstock laws, if referred to, our League has always been for repeal. I hav heard no other word yet, but, of course the majority rules.

J. KELLY, Sec. GEO. C. VEILE, Pres.

THE MILWAUKEE LEAGUE.

MILWAUKEE, Sept. 26, 1884.

To the Secretary of the National Liberal League:

After a summer vacation of two months, the Milwaukee League resumed its regular Sunday evening sessions. Our League is meeting with good success, and we are satisfied that the coming winter's campaign in the "fight for right" will be crowned with the most gratifying results. The Hall was well filled last Sunday evening, on which occasion Mr. Robert Schilling lectured on "The duty of Liberals in the coming election," giving plausible reasons why Liberals should vote the People's ticket.

Next Sunday evening the League is to be favored with an address by Dr. Juliet H. Severance on "The New Republic." The doctor is one of our most popular speakers, and never fails to draw a crowd. P. A. STUART.

LEAGUE NO. 20.

The Manhattan Liberal Club met in the German Masonic Hall, No. 220 East Fifteenth street, Friday evening the 16th. Vice-President T. B. Wakeman announced that the lecturer of the evening, Mr. John B. Gibbs, was unable to be present but that Mr. Gibb's paper on "Prohibition in Politics" would be read by Dr. Lambert. The subject was ably handled, the writer calling attention to the very important part prohibition was playing in the present campaign, and the hold it had already gained, and the work it was yet destined to accomplish.

From the Banner of Light.

The Eighth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, which adjourned on the 9th inst., after its two day's session, was well attended, and its proceedings were of an interesting and satisfactory character. Whatever differences of opinion may hav previously been held in regard to the best platform to be adopted by the League, we expect that the one now presented by the Congress will be indorsed by all the Liberals of the United States, and that henceforth they can unite and work together harmoniously.

We can see nothing in the way to prevent this desirable object, and to bring about eventually a united and working Liberal Party in all the states, whose primary or chief measure shall be the secularization of the government, or the entire separation of state and church. In this all-important reform the Liberals everywhere can unite and work in concert for the promotion of a common purpose.

From the Ironclad Age.

At the Eighth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, the Nine Demands of Liberalism were put forth as a platform. Upon this platform all good men can stand. There is room enough, and the atmosphere is pure.

THE QUAKER CITY LEAGUE.

The following notice of the Philadelphia League is from the Press of that city: "Steady Philadelphia church-goers will be surprised to learn that a flourishing society of Freethinkers hav held weekly meetings for the last two or three years in Fleischman's bakery building, on Broad street. The members of this society, who take no interest in politics, are nearly all English, French, or German workingmen. The topics chosen for discussion are sometimes quite startling and original. The subject selected for debate not long ago was, 'Has Christianity or intemperance entailed the greatest misery on the human race?' After an animated debate it was decided by the president that Christianity had. A number of women, some of them middle-aged and a few quite young girls, with youthful male escorts, attend these meetings, and seem to take a lively interest in the proceedings. Works of an anti-religious and skeptical nature, such as those of Rousseau, Diderot, and Tom Paine, are peddled at nominal prices by an old Frenchman, who, speaking our language in moderate perfection, always refers to 'the masses' as 'demasses.' Isaiah H. Wears, the highly intelligent negro, is a prominent member of the society, and is regarded as their best debater, though his style is more conversational than oratorical."

GATH, who is called the biggest liar among all the newspaper correspondents, writing to the Omaha Republican, discusses the attitude of Blaine toward the churches, and concludes that he will get considerable Catholic support because his mother was of that faith. He also thinks the Plumed Knight will get the Protestant vote because he is now a Presbyterian. Then Gath turns philosopher, and oracularly observes:

"A certain leaning together between the two great branches of the Christian church has been plain to me ever since last June. It is the most ominous thing in the campaign. It shows us that while at a superficial view there may be an abatement of religious zeal in the United States, in reality the most abiding springs of support to a public man are in the religious organizations of the country."

Mr. George Alfred Townsend can wager all the Republican paid him for his letter that Mr. Blaine and all the other candidates will work those abiding springs of support for all they are worth.

Dr. J. L. York at the Yellowstone National Park.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: You will doubtless think that my letters are like angels' visits, few and far between, but I will hope to atone in the future.

You will find inclosed nine dollars for The Truth Seeker, to be sent as directed in private letter; and I can only wish it were more. But I hav done the best I could for you with the elements in hand.

My stay in Montana has been somewhat prolonged from the fact that I hav given the second course of lectures at the three principal points: Butte City, Helena, and Bozeman, with a fair degree of success, organizing a Liberal Union at each place.

At Butte City, O. B. Whitford, a live thinker, is president; and with the faithful help of my warm friends, Fred Cook and J. C. Singer, I will hope to hear good things from Butte.

At Helena, C. M. Jeffries, a stalwart Liberal, stands at the head as a promis of good work in the future. Our thanks are due at Helena to A. Kleinschmidt, A. C. Votaw, J. P. Flick, and others for a helping hand.

At Bozeman, W. W. Alderson, editor of the Bozeman Courier, and formerly a Methodist preacher, is president of the League, and with such a noble young disciple of Paine as Will C. Oakley for secretary, I can hope for the prosperity of Freethought in Bozeman.

I hav made some friends here which giv me pleasure to call their names and faces to mind, and among them Judge Maguire, a bright intellect and wonderfully endowed with the right use of the English language, a fine reasoner and speaker, and true as steel to our cause, and I hope he will favor The Truth Seeker with a letter now and then. Our many thanks are due to the kind friends at Bozeman, and especially to S. W. Cook and estimable wife, for the comforts of home and good cheer during our work in their city, and I must say that if Bozeman Liberal Union has two other men among its seventy members, such as S. W. Cook, it will not die out in this generation. And although my trip in Montana has been a long, hard trip, I hav no regrets, as I trust I hav helped to open up the way for others to follow.

My lectures here in Montana are the first of the kind, but hope that other Liberal speakers will be induced to travel west by the North Pacific line and giv the Montana people a call. Our friend, Col. Ingersoll, swept through Montana like a cyclone, leaving the poor little preachers to shoot off their popguns after he had gone. And it is almost enough to make a dog laugh to see the poor sky-pilots trying to gather up the pieces after the storm has passed. But then they hav had their day, and, to the friends of mental freedom, it has been a long, dark day, and the doom of the Christian superstition begins to shine out like the handwriting on the wall, and the fires of Freethought only need to be fanned a little to set the world in a blaze. And away here in the wilds of Montana, without speakers, or much reading, the evolution of Freethought moves on with rapid strides.

The Truth Seeker has one reader living near Salesville who is deserving of mention in this letter. I could not learn his name; but his eye will fall upon the mention I hav made below.

While lecturing at Bozeman, I was invited to speak at or near Salesville, some twelve miles out from Bozeman. Our friends, Thomas Burk and Dr. Stover, had the matter in charge, but from some mistake in the notice the people were left to infer that the meeting would be held at once at three different places, hence our flock was quite divided. Myself and some friends from town were on hand at Salesville, but found that a mistake had been made, and after waiting until nearly dark, started back to town.

When out about half a mile from Salesville, we were hailed by a man on the road who inquired if Dr. York was in the carriage. On being answered in the affirmativ, he said: "I hav been hunting the meeting. I am a reader of The Truth Seeker and hav kept track of the doctor for a number of years, and I want to giv him this five dollars to help him along." We took the five dollars, and thanking our friend, whom we had not seen for the darkness, went on our way rejoicing, wishing that The Truth Seeker had more such readers in Montana.

But how brief are our joys! Here the scene slightly changes; our driver loses the road and drives helter-skelter over the prairie in search of a road to town, every moment in danger of falling into a ditch or running into a barbed-wire fence. What a romantic situation, to be sure!

And, to add to my comfort, we had a lady friend and her little daughter in the company, both somewhat nervous; and, in fact, I was just a little nervous too; but our father in heaven and the driver together brought us safe home.

Montana is a wild, wide sweep of mountains and valleys, well adapted to stock-raising and rich in mineral wealth, but not a good farming country, as the frost in summer often destroys the entire crop; and the changes of temperature are too sudden and marked to be a healthy country in which to make one's home. And yet there is not, probably, an area of greater value to the student or of more interest to the tourist in all the wide world than our Yellowstone National Park, situated in the midst of the erratic Rocky Mountains; and within the shadow of the confused and rugged peaks by which it is engirdled are born the feeble rills which grow into the grandest rivers of the United States.

Here may be seen the grim, towering walls which separate the waters flowing eastward to the Atlantic, from those pushing their way through deep mountain gorges, to rest at last in the placid Pacific. But the fact that here rise the springs of the Missouri, Columbia, and Colorado is lost sight of in view of the far more striking features of this magic land of natural wonders. And nowhere else in the world are to be seen so near to the surface, and on so broad and varied a scale, the undoubted evidence of subterranean fires, and to note the lingering death-throes of volcanic forces which hav convulsed our Mother Earth to its very center in the ages long since past. And if any are in doubt how it was that the prehistoric people conceived of hell, let them come here and take a look and smell. Here are fire and hot water in great plenty, and mountains of brimstone, quite enough to make the Christian hell ashamed of itself. And I do not wonder that the Indians hav always held this tract of country in awe and horror as the land of lost spirits and devils.

Our visit to the National Park occupied within the park six days, not of idle picnic, but hard work of body and mind, to climb the steeps, avoid the dangers, and take in the wonders and beauties which lie scattered in rich profusion along the entire route from the Mammoth Hot Springs to the grand Canyon of the Yellowstone River.

The park, containing an area of fifty-five by sixty-five miles, is a region of remarkable wonders, majestic grandeur, sublime hights, and terrible blood-curdling depths, as well as the most beautiful and delightful things beyond the power of human description, and must be seen to be appreciated. Here nature puts forth all her powers, and her moods seem ever changing from profound gravity and terror to the lively and gay. Here tremendous geysers, as true to the time or period of eruption as the clock, shoot up their mighty fountains of hot water and steam, causing the earth to tremble by their violence; yawning hells of brimstone fury, lashed and tossed by the terrible heat below, filling the air with fearful odors; countless hot springs, indescribable in their strange beauty, of great depth, and translucent as the air itself. Some of them are turquoise blue, green, yellow, and red, while the waters of others flash in the sunlight with all the colors of the prism; and to gaze down into these depths must be like the gates of heaven ajar, adorned with delicate honeycomb patterns of fretted frost-work, while the coatings of the sides and rims of these basins take on every delicate and vivid tint of color known to fine art.

These remarkable terrace-building springs are at the threshold of the park near the Mammoth Hotel, and only six miles from the railroad. And did not the park contain any other and greater wonders than these terrace, rock-building springs, it were worth a trip from Europe to see these alone. And here may be seen students, scientists, and lovers of nature from all parts of the civilized globe, drawn here to see the strange phenomena of mineral water thrust up from the depths at boiling heat, holding in solution calcareous matter coating everything it touches, and building terraces, basins, pillars, temples, and pulpit-like structures of marble whiteness in every form of beauty. Besides lifting higher each year, the entire rocky formation is already a mountain in hight, and will continue to rise until the volcanic action ceases.

The obsidian or volcanic glass cliffs, two hundred feet in hight, with a carriage-road of nearly pure glass along its base, is another marvel to the tourist. Boiling paint pots of nearly all shades of color incessantly steam, stew, and sputter like immense cauldrons of boiling mush, with the dull, thud-like plop, plop of the mush kettle. And close at hand is the Emerald Pool, brimful of clear, pure water of bluish green.

A little further on is the geyser Minute-man, who spurts once a minute to the hight of thirty feet, while close by stands the Monarch, who givs an exhibition in regal splendor once in twenty-four hours, a stream of immense volume, divided in three divisions, to the hight of one hundred and fifty feet, and continuing in action about twenty minutes.

There are many fine displays of hot-water fireworks on a grand scale, but none more deservedly popular with the tourist than Old Faithful, who, with wonderful regularity, every hour sends up an immense volume of clear, hot water and steam to the hight of 160 to 200 feet, and continues in action from five to ten minutes. There are many geysers more powerful than this, but none so popular and, like Bob Ingersoll, so sure of an audience at his show, as Old Faithful. That word faithful tells the story, and the audience are always on hand.

The Beehive sends up a column about 250 feet, and used to spout twice each day, but now, once in nine days; and we were informed by an official in charge that on the occasion of President Hayes's visit to the park, the famous Beehive turned loose his artillery five times in one day. And it is quite likely if James G. Blaine, or even Ben Butler, were to visit the place, it might be induced to put on a new program for the occasion in the interests of the dear people.

These wonders of the park are scattered along over seventy-five miles of travel, not including the Hoodo wonders, which lie farther on, and the points of interest visited by travelers, limited in time to six or eight days, include the Lower, Middle, and Upper Basin Yellowstone Lake, and the Falls and Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone.

Beginning with the Mammoth Springs formation at the Gate, the interest increases at every point, and culminates at the Falls and Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone, and all preceding wonders seem to shrivel up in the majesty, sublimity, and splendor of this mighty gorge, draped as it is in rainbow-tinted colors, as though all the rainbows had fallen from the skies, and had caught on the rugged, corrugated sides of this mighty abyss to lend enchantment to the scene. No skill of artist can devise a greater diversity of color in every shade and tint than nature has laid on the sides of this Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone, and nothing but the sunset heavens can approximate in splendor this display of beauty. And never in my life hav I felt such a sense of the awful as when standing on the brink of this yawning chasm, one is so oppressed with the vastness that almost tempts him to leap from the dizzy hights, and feels relief when once again at a safe distance.

Of course, the Falls are not the grandest in the world, and hav not the breadth, volume, and dash of old Niagara, nor the enormous depth of some of the falls of the Yosemite, and yet they hav a majesty and beauty all their own, which fascinate and lure like the fabled syren of the sea; and all travelers join in saying that the awful, sublime, and beautiful are strangely commingled in this, by far the grandest spectacle in our National Park. Our thanks are due to Mr. Henderson and family—who, by the way, are all Freethinkers, and take The Truth Seeker—for kindness in pointing out to us the many wonders of the Mammoth Springs, and other valuable information in relation to the park, of which he is one of the superintendents.

I can only hope that our National Park may meet such consideration as it justly deserves at the hands of our government in the improvement of the roads and protection from the hands of the lawless; and that this wild reserve, with its pine-clad hills, beautiful lakes and stretches of valley and forest, with the great variety of wild game which roam within its limits, may be handed down to future generations as something to be proud of as containing some of the great wonders of the world.

At the present writing I am in Portland, having lectured at Spokane and other towns on the Northern Pacific road.

The chief complaint everywhere in the north is hard times. The boom has broken, and left its helpless victims high and dry on the rocks of bankruptcy. Some of the towns are double the size that the surrounding country will sustain. So much for a heartless railroad boom which has filled the north with helpless tramps.

From Portland I go south overland, speaking at Forest Grove, Corvallis, Albany, Ashland, and other points on the way to San Jose, California.

With many good wishes for you, Eugene, and the readers of The Truth Seeker, I am, as ever,

Yours for truth, Dr. J. L. York.

Mr. Walker, Mr. Hill.

"No man who accepts the fundamental principles of Freethought, knowing what it is that he accepts, can be a Prohibitionist."—E. C. Walker.

Friend Walker's assertion in a recent Truth Seeker quoted above, is certainly entertaining reading, even in this dog-day weather, and strongly reminds me of the narrow-mindedness of some of my religious friends, who also think that certain persons hav no right to vote differently from themselvs on the liquor question.

I had hoped that this "virtue" was wholly a religious one, for, unless I am greatly mistaken, Freethought consists not in all acting alike, but in universal mental liberty concerning rum, religion, or anything else; and, as a matter of course, different thoughts will and must produce different actions.

The "personal liberty" part of any anti-prohibitionist's argument, seems to me to need only very little talk, just long enough to show them that every mother's son and daughter of their clan is is favor of stopping "personal liberty" in regard to something or other, say barn-burning for instance.

Every blessed one of them would favor preventing me from setting my barn on fire, provided such action placed their precious persons or property in danger; but, when I wish to restrain them from setting their brains on fire, because such action places my person or property in danger, they cry out terribly about their "personal liberty" being infringed.

If danger to others is a good reason for them to act on, why is it not the same for me?

Please think it over, Brother Walker, and see how exceedingly inconsistent you are.

And if one thing deemed to be against the public welfare can be rightfully prohibited, it follows that all things so deemed can be treated likewise.

Is "personal liberty" more invaded in one case than in another, and does not the drunken stabbing of three innocent people on the public street—as recently occurred in this city—giv a just claim for protection against the liquor nuisance? If not, what would, friend Walker? GEORGE. N. HILL.

Boston, Mass.

Charles Watts's Reply to George Chainey.

In last week's TRUTH SEEKER it was stated that probably I would write my lecture which I delivered at Cassadaga in reply to Mr. George Chainey's two addresses delivered at the same place, professedly in explanation and defense of his conversion to Spiritualism. It would afford me much pleasure to do so, had I sufficient time, but at present my lecturing and other engagements in Canada leave me but little leisure for more than my ordinary correspondence, which I find, like most things in America, has to be conducted on a large scale.

Listening to Mr. Chainey's two addresses at the Convention, it occurred to me that they were marred with the three drawbacks of glaring inaccuracy, reckless imputation, and an utter lack of reasoning. In my review of what he urged pertaining to his conversion to Spiritualism, I said nothing against Mr. Chainey personally, neither did I in any way question his right to change his views. For him, as a gentleman, I hav the highest respect. Our past associations hav been of a most pleasing nature, which will long be remembered by me with feelings of unqualified satisfaction. In parting with him now as a public associate, I can only regret that in an unguarded moment he was induced to make unjustifiable attacks upon principles which evidently he never thoroughly understood, and upon persons deserving the greatest respect and the highest confidence. It is not, therefore, Mr. Chainey's conversion that is objected to so much as the very injudicious manner in which he publicly proclaimed that conversion. Among the Spiritualists of America there are many good and noble men and women, who are doing useful work for Liberalism in their persistent efforts to overthrow the power, and to lessen the evils of orthodoxy; and the fact that some Liberals cannot see what is termed the "truths of Spiritualism" should in no way interfere with Liberals and Spiritualists working together to achieve some practical result in the life we now hav. Uniformity of opinions upon speculativ subjects is an impossibility, and consequently we should respect the right and sincerity of those who differ from us.

Had Mr. Chainey contented himself with merely stating what appeared to him to be the truths of his new faith, and why he accepted it, without attempting to depreciate those who, for years, had rendered him valuable and generous support, he would hav retained the respect of all who once hailed him as a friend and co-worker. But, instead of doing this, he indulged in childish narrations and reckless accusations, which afforded additional proof to the many already apparent, that he relies more through life upon the promptings of uncontroled emotion than upon the practical dictates of reason and judgment. Mr. Chainey is truly a child of impulse. Indeed, he does not hesitate to avow that, in his opinion, fiction is a greater factor in the education of the world than fact, and that the stage is a more powerful instructor than the platform. A man who entertains these delusions livs principally "in the clouds," and is largely disqualified for fighting the great battle of life successfully. Mighty and useful as the charming influences of fiction and the drama hav been upon the human mind and the character of our race, they can never surpass the force of facts and the reality of actual every-day existence in the practical regulation of individual and societarian conduct, and he who imagins that they can will find sooner or later that he is "building castles in the air, which will cost a vast deal to keep up."

There are two kinds of converts—those who hav been won through the heart and those who hav been secured through the head. In other words, some are converted through an appeal to their emotions, while others yield only to the voice of reason. Mr. Chainey belongs very much to the emotional class of converts, as a perusal of the records of his several conversions will show. His new departures hav been the result of sudden impetuosity, not of calm reflection. Reason and judgment appear to hav played but minor parts in the changing of his views. With him logic is regarded as a cruelty, the intellect as being of secondary importance, and all controversy as decidedly dangerous and to be avoided. Frankly, and in all kindness, be it written, that, in my opinion, herein lies the mistake of Mr. Chainey's public career, and the principal cause of his repeated failures in the various movements with which he has been associated. We hav listened to the wail of his blighted ambition at Boston, to a confession of his inability to retain the readers of his journal, to an admission that he was incapable of securing adequate audiences at his lectures, and an acknowledgment of his lack of power to inspire lasting enthusiasm within those to whom he appealed. What is the real explanation of all this? Surely it is unfair to blame either Liberals or Liberalism for such defectiv results, remembering the audiences that assemble at the lectures of Col. Ingersoll and others. Would it not be more reasonable to search for the explanation in the man rather than in the cause in which the man was engaged? And yet friend Chainey has great ability, a most vivid imagination, a vast poetical capacity, a marvelous power for word painting, a command of the choicest flowers of rhetoric that language can furnish, together with high moral culture, a generous disposition, and a loving heart. Still, with all these advantages, he assures us that success did not crown his efforts in the Liberal ranks. Is not the secret of this misfortune to be found in the fact that Mr. Chainey lacked faith in the power of intellect and the force of argument, contenting himself with the use of words representing no ideas, and explaining no solid principle? I hav told him this frequently in the past, and I repeated it in his presence at the Convention. He is satisfied with presenting the picture without seeing the wall is there to hang it upon. We all admire the foliage that adorns the tree, and are charmed with the flowers that deck the garden, but who will contend that the foliage and flowers are more enduring and valuable than the tree and the garden? The two are in each case at their highest value when combined. So it is with the foliage of language and the flowers of rhetoric. For them to be acceptable and useful to the Liberal party, the former must be allied with the tree of knowledge, and the latter must bud in the garden of intellect, both indicating that they are blossoms of disciplined reason and trained mentality. Had Mr. Chainey wisely blended the two, reason and emotion, his public advocacy would hav been less barren, and probably he would hav been spared the many disappointments which hav darkened the morning of his life. He sorrowfully admits that he "grew faint" in Liberal work. This is by no means surprising, for he lacked the sustaining power of solid mental food and argumentativ sustenance, which are so necessary to support those who enter upon the up-hill fight of Liberal propaganda.

CHARLES WATTS.

Notes and Notings.

DEAR FRIENDS: No spirits yet, but I hav made one trial with a private medium, and learned the modus operandi of table tipping; got a sentence or two, but no test; am promised a seance this afternoon with another, and will report. I am calling around upon notables with Mr. Masquerier. Yesterday we went over into New York, and, for the first time, I crossed over the famous Brooklyn Bridge in the cars. It seemed almost like flying, to be going so easily over the water and up so high above houses, boats, and busy people below. We made a call upon H. M. Parkhurst, and he and Mr. Masquerier talked over their respectiv alphabets, each of them having gotten up a new and improved one, Mr. Masquerier insisting his was far superior to all others, and Mr. Parkhurst being well pleased to hav something that was not quite so good so long as it was likely to be put to practical utility.

We called upon Dr. F. Hollick, author of the "Marriage Guide," which I had read with interest and profit over a quarter of a century ago, and had owned and lost by lending, bought another copy and lent and lost it. I was very agreeably impressed with Mr. Hollick. He was a fine looking man, and genial, kind, and conversational. He has investigated Spiritualism some, but says he wants to take one of the spirits (?) by the hand and hold fast, and then if it melts away while he is holding it, he will think it worth while to study it up. He kindly presented me with his "Marriage Guide," and "Nerves and the Nervous;" and though I had once read the former, I re-read it, and found that in the light of the acquired information of a quarter of a century since, I understood much that I failed to appreciate in the previous reading.

What a great benefactor a good honest and intelligent physician is to the race! What a light to the ignorant, what a consoler to the afflicted and suffering! While we condemn the great mass of lawyers, doctors, and preachers, as a curse to the race, we must own that there are rare specimens in each calling which fill the role of savior and benefactor.

To-day, September 20th, I had my first seance with a regularly accredited public medium, recommended to me by one of the editors of a spiritual paper, Mrs. M. E. Williams, 232 W. 46th street, New York, a materializing medium. Mr. Masquerier, Mrs. Kimball, and myself had a two hours' seance. About a dozen others were there. The room was dimly lighted by one lamp; shrouded in red paper and turned low down, so at first we could see nothing but shadows. The cabinet was curtained with cloth. We sat in chairs a few feet from it.

Mrs. Williams made a short appeal to the audience to try and put themselvs in a receptiv condition, and in harmony with the developments. Then the organist played "Nearer, my God, to Thee." The curtains slowly parted, and a ghostly form, all in white, appeared, waved its hands, bowed, and blessed the audience. At intervals numerous other forms appeared, sometimes two at once. They called up the audience one by one, and gave them messages, most of them being recognized, and cried and laughed over. We were allowed to ask questions, and when Dr. Newton was announced, I received permission to address to him a query; as he had doctored my dead sister, I thought I'd inquire about her. I first asked if the spirit knew who I was, but this being a test question, I was sharply informed that it was a very wrong condition in which to approach the spirits, so thenceforth I remained silent. Mr. Masquerier, being well-known and noted, received many messages, and was called up and introduced to his dead wife, who touched his head, eyes, and arm. He is nearly blind, so only saw a white mist, and could catch nothing but indistinct mutterings of the message. So he said nothing, and quietly returned to his seat. Many others saw and recognized dead friends, telling us they plainly discerned the features, and got messages none but the dead could hav given. I shall hereafter speak more of this, and I withhold my opinions for the present, only narrating things as they appeared. Mr. Masquerier received a message giving him great encouragement for his good work in regard to land reform and farmsteads. ELMINA.

The Horror of Horrors.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: If I were a vivisector, I should want to go and hang myself after seeing the cut in THE TRUTH SEEKER, representing the vivisector's death-bed, and reading the poem beneath. It is one of Elliott Preston's most powerful productions, and deserves to be circulated broadcast.

A shudder runs through my frame as I look upon the startling picture, and I ask myself the question, as I hav often asked before—can it be possible that human beings can, in the name of science, thus torture, needlessly, our poor dumb friends? And I am filled with indignation that man is not moved at once to prevent these tortures, these horrible cruelties, by enactment of stringent law. Our helpless dumb creatures should, and must be, protected from the vivisector's knife. Elliott Preston champions a noble cause, and his efforts in this direction should be seconded by every humane heart throughout the world. SUSAN H. WIXON.

I am asked by that friend of humanity and animalinity to "describe just how you were affected at the moment when you opened THE TRUTH SEEKER and your eye fell on the terrible illustration of 'The Vivisector's Deathbed.'" It would be impossible! The brief extract from a private letter to Mr. Preston published in connection with this "terrible illustration," justifies me in adding the emotions were similiar, only not as intense, as when I saw the illustration and read the poem the first time in manuscript. Horror of horrors! how hardened, then, must be the heart that could inflict the torture and stand unmoved and witness it! ELLA E GIBSON.

To the Liberals of the United States.

To the Subscribers of "Man."

In the last number of Man, published August 30th, it was stated that the continuance of the publication would depend upon the then approaching Freethinkers' Convention and League Congress. Accordingly the claims of Man were publicly and privately placed before the Liberals there assembled. Some aid to continue the publication was offered; and, perhaps, with continued persistence, means enough might hav been pledged to push the journal through another year. But along with this proffered help, there was a general Liberal counseling to merge Man with some other paper and thus make one thriftier blade of journalism where two struggling ones grew before. Also after the election of the new officers they expressed a decided wish if Man could not be continued above board, and without loss, that it should be merged with THE TRUTH SEEKER, so as to help build up one strong, efficient, and controling organ of Liberal opinion in New York city. This too, it was said, would be in the interest of the reconciliation and reorganization which was the spirit of the hour. It would secure one united League, and one influential Liberal newspaper to publish the grad tidings to all the world.

Still further, the editors of Man, having thrown off the official half of their working harness, did not feel such urgent need of holding on to the editorial half. They felt inspired with less to say. Not their occupation, but their mission, seemed in a measure gone; and, with their personal, professional, and business engagements urgently demanding attention, they were the less reluctant to yield to the general wish and open negotiations for burying Man in order that he might liv again and become immortal in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

So here, dear reader of both papers, you behold Man and THE TRUTH SEEKER united in one. The editors of Man, when they hav anything to say, are invited to express themselvs through THE TRUTH SEEKER, as before; there were two papers—a privilege of which they will be happy to avail themselvs as events arise, and as inspirations come. By the arrangement the Liberal Publishing Co. will remain in our hands as before; only the paper, Man, is transferred, and THE TRUTH SEEKER will be sent to the subscribers of Man to fill out the subscriptions due. We hope the new acquaintance made will be a happy one, and that, on the expiration of the subscription on account of Man, they will continue with THE TRUTH SEEKER on their own and its account. We are sure they will find it a most instructiv and interesting Liberal paper which it will be difficult for them to liv without.

"Man."

As will be seen by the letter of Messrs. Wakeman and Leland, we hav undertaken to fill Man's contract with his subscribers, a task which he has proved unable to complete.

We are very sorry that Mr. Wakeman and Mr. Leland hav been obliged to bury their Freethought journalistic infant, and we shall, we hope, conduct the services over his remains in a becoming manner. Man was doing a valuable work as a pioneer; he was, as it were, a little wedge that found a crevice in the armor of the church where, perhaps, bigger and blunter lances could not penetrate. And were Messrs. Wakeman's and Leland's pens broken at the same time Man's existence terminates, Freethought would indeed suffer a great loss. But we hav assurance from them that they will contribute to THE TRUTH SEEKER as often as their business will allow leisure for thought and its expression. We hope to hav something from them every week.

The terms upon which THE TRUTH SEEKER will be sent in place of Man are upon the basis of cost. The price of Man was $1 per annum, one-third that of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We shall, therefore, send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one-third as long a period—four months to those who hav paid a year in advance for Man, and shorter periods in proportion. Quite a number of friends, we find in looking over Man's list, were subscribers to both Man and THE TRUTH SEEKER. That no injustice may be done them, and that they may lose nothing by the failure of the N. Y. Liberal Publishing Co. to continue the publication of Man, we shall forward to them any book they may select of our own publication to the amount of their unexpired subscription to Man. A letter to Mr. Somerby will secure prompt adjustment of all such claims.

In Man's death the League has lost an organ, but has probably gained more potent weapons, for we shall devote a share of our space weekly to the work of organization. And no doubt all the other Liberal journals will gladly do the same, thus insuring to the League a wider circulation of its propaganda efforts, and a no less zealous support of the officers. We invite, therefore, all the secretaries or correspondents of the League to send to us weekly reports of their doings and such shall appear promptly. Mr. Putnam, the new secretary, will find THE TRUTH SEEKER ready to help in all ways in his arduous work.

A word to Man's readers to whom THE TRUTH SEEKER is now for the first time a regular visitor. It shall be our aim to make this paper indispensable to your mental enjoyment. We hav a large corps of remarkably able and brilliant correspondents. THE TRUTH SEEKER givs you every week as much reading matter as is printed in a fifty-cent book. The editor endeavors to be a true Liberal, sincerely believing that all sides should hav a hearing upon all subjects pertaining to the welfare of the human race. So far as space permits, this belief is put into practice every week. To those who subscribed for Man that they might keep informed of the doings of the National Liberal League, we can say that such special news shall be even more fully given in THE TRUTH SEEKER than ever in Man. The reorganization effected at Cassadaga, if sustained by the Liberals of the country, will lead to more important action than has hitherto been taken, and our League department will therefore be interesting. And THE TRUTH SEEKER has one department that no Liberal family in the country can afford to be without—that is, our "Children's Corner." Miss Susan H. Wixon, who conducts this corner, is as good a writer for children as these United States can furnish, and is winning loving encomiums from all her thousands of little friends. Every Liberal will be thankful to make her acquaintance. The editorial policy of the paper is identical with the Nine Demands of Liberalism, but we go further, and advocate the upbuilding of a rational philosophy that shall lead to better lives on the part of the people, and that shall yield to its adherents all the social and emotional enjoyments of the churches, without any mixture of superstition, or the use of rites and ceremonies degrading to manhood and womanhood. This philosophy must be a growth, an evolution from lower forms, and this growth THE TRUTH SEEKER hopefully fosters. But our immediate object is to insure a secular republic, recognizing no religion, and influenced by none. In accomplishing this we want your help, and hope that when the contract made on behalf of Man is fulfilled, you will like THE TRUTH SEEKER too well to part company with it.

A Remarkable Sermon.

The Rev. James Kay Applebee is the pastor of the "Twenty-eighth Congregational Society," and occupies the pulpit of Parker Memorial, Boston, Massachusetts. Mr. Applebee is not a genius, but he is a well-advanced specimen of the average unorthodox minister. One of his pulpit innovations is that, instead of praying, he aspires. And his aspiration is not to "God," but to the "Infinit Spirit of the Universe." This is Spencer's patent Unknowable (substituting Spirit for Energy), and Mr. Applebee ought to pay royalty on the idea, or add the rest of the definition, and giv due credit. But this is not what we set out to call attention to.

September 14th, just after the National Liberal League Congress had been held, Mr. Applebee delivered a sermon on "The Ethics of Religious Liberalism." This sermon is one of the strangest mixtures we ever read. It is a compound of Rationalism and superstition; of splendid statement of Freethought principles and a total misapprehension of them and misstatement of their application; a brilliant defense of thought, and an utter abandonment of reason; a glorification of truth, and an exemplification of how easy it is for an occupant of a pulpit to ignore it; of a seeming honest desire to do justice to Freethinkers, and a most prejudiced and dishonest attack upon them and the League. Add to this the uncalled-for abuse of individuals who were pioneers in the path he is treading, who hav made it possible for him to outrun Abner Kneeland's heresy and still keep out of prison, and we hav a most remarkable sermon by a most ungrateful man. It is the more shame to him that he was once a subscriber to the Investigator, and a reader of Mr. Seaver's Chesterfieldian subversions of Christianity.

Mr. Applebee appears to be unreservedly in favor of the Nine Demands. "Religious Liberalism, pure and simple," he takes to be embodied in them. Dogmatically assuming this point, he then inquires, "What should be the ethical action of religious Liberals, as such?" Now, in the first place, the Nine Demands are not the whole of religious Liberalism. They are not, indeed, religious in any way. They comprise, and Mr. Applebee will please note the discrimination, the most essential portion of political Liberalism, and are the first changes necessary in the laws of this nation in order that religious Liberalism may hav opportunity to develop without its teachers being imprisoned for heresy to old creeds. But answering his own query, he says (and in order that we may not do him the injustice he has done the League, we quote his whole paragraph):

> "Perhaps, for the individual man, almost the whole of ethics may be considered as comprehended in the terse maxim, 'Mind your own business.' A very astute writer on morals, Miss Edith Simcox, has said that a society would be anarchic 'in which every one spent his time in seeking the advantage of somebody else.' What is true of individuals is equally true of organizations of individuals. As it is a supreme ethical law for the individual that he should mind his own business, so it is also a supreme ethical law for companies of individuals, organized together for the achievement of some particular purpose, that they should, as members of the organization, also mind their own business—that is, that they should confine their efforts to the achievement of the purpose for the sake of which the organization had been called into being. If the National Liberal League had observed this wholesome ethical law—if it had not suffered itself to be turned aside from its original purpose, which was the establishment in this great American commonwealth of 'equal rights in religion' among all citizens—it would hav been a triumphant thing in this land to-day, instead of being, as it now is, the dreariest of all dreary failures—a thing covered with deserved obloquy and deserved shame."

We do not charge, as some might, that in this our pulpiteer is purposely dishonest, but will charitably assume that he is only ignorant of his subject. Others, of wider information, hav fallen into the gross error of assuming that the split in the League was due to a majority of the delegates at Syracuse wandering off after strange gods and side issues. This assumption is totally false. The majority at Syracuse were true to their duty, and the seceders were the recalcitrants. One of the constitutional objects of the League is to protect persecuted Freethinkers. Mr. Applebee is entirely mistaken in assuming that the "line of objects marked out in its constitution refers exclusivly to the bringing about of a total separation between church and state." At the time of the Syracuse Congress Mr. Bennett was being most cruelly harassed by the church. One of the ways of defending him was by repealing, or materially modifying, the laws under which he was arrested. This course was deemed wise by such eminent men as James Parton, O. B. Frothingham, Elizur Wright, and others. The majority of the delegates at Syracuse concurred in this, and though the resolution was not passed at that Congress, repeal or material modification officers were elected, which was tantamount to the same thing, and was the occasion of the division. We hav urged, as strongly as Mr. Applebee can, that the League shall adopt the motto, "Mind your own business." But it is precisely because the League was minding its business—a business, too, laid down for it by the chief seceder—that the separation was effected. Either that, or Mr. Bennett was not a Freethinker and was not being persecuted by the church, either one of which propositions he will be a rash man who disputes. To such a one we should quote the words of the editor of the opposition organ that "whatever may be said of them [Mr. Bennett and others] personally," . . . they "were victims of religious bigotry and unfair legal interpretation." The "deserved obloquy and deserved shame" with which the League "is covered" are all in Mr. Applebee's mind. The League has nothing to be ashamed of and no apologies to make.

In another paragraph of Mr. Applebee's sermon, however, we find something to commend. It is this:

"An organization to succeed in its object must hav a clearly defined object in view, and must resist as traitorous every attempt that may be made to entangle it with other and foreign objects. Otherwise it will, and that only apparently, gain in width what it loses in concentrated power. It will gain diffusivness at the expense of its usefulness. Seeking to please everybody, it will please nobody, and bring failure upon itself into the bargain. Garrison would never hav been victorious—he would never hav created that overwhelming force of public opinion which made the abolition of slavery possible—if he had not been so resolute in keeping his anti-slavery movement strictly to itself, steadily refusing to mix it up with other objects, however good and proper, in themselvs, those other objects might be."

We believe that every distinctiv reform should hav its own organization, as much more will be accomplished, and much sooner, than by one body undertaking to do all and everything. But this is the only ray of common sense that illumins the first two columns of the sermon. He fairly revels in the discussion of obscenity, for he returns to it again and again:

"The obscene literature question was the rock on which the Liberal League was destined to split. As things hav turned out, it would hav been better for the cause of religious equality in America if the splitting had taken place at Philadelphia in 1876 rather than hav been deferred to a later date. Every subsequent act of the League only tended to sink the cause of religious Liberalism into infamy and disgrace. Two men, you know, Heywood and Bennett, were imprisoned for sending through the mails an utterly dull and foolish production called 'Cupid's Yokes.' Eminent judges pronounced the production 'obscene;' and a judicial court ruled that it could not legally be sent through the mails. This was a question which did not affect the League at all; but the members of the anti-religious faction of the League, who had now succeeded in capturing it, chose to consider the miserable little production not obscene, and professing to see danger to the principle of religious freedom in the ruling of the courts, they demanded the unconditional repeal of all laws which prohibited the sending of obscene matter through the mails, and so insisted that the post-office of the United States should be free for any filthy rascal to use for any filthy purpose he pleased. This is the morality of religious Liberalism according to the Liberal League. Because some men hav been wrongly convicted of larceny there shall be no more laws against larceny! At the convention in Chicago one delegate boasted that he 'had five daughters, and was perfectly willing that they should receive anything that might be sent to them through the mails.' Perhaps so. But then other fathers, whose morals may not be quite so easy-going, hav a clear right to hav their homes protected from the invasion of polluting filth."

Mr. Applebee can hardly bring himself to call the pamphlet for mailing which Mr. Bennett was imprisoned an obscene book, so he quotes the opinion of "eminent judges." In this he is mistaken. No judge who can deservedly be called eminent ever so pronounced the work. On the contrary, men like Col. Ingersoll, Attorney-General Devens, James Parton, O. B. Frothingham, Elizur Wright, and hosts of others bore testimony the other way. Francis E. Abbot, whom Mr. Applebee "supposes must go through the process of dying before other men find out his worth," said at the time, "To confound this book with that vile class of literature which alone ought to be suppressed is a monstrous injustice, and we protest against it with irrepressible indignation." And when Mr. Applebee asserts that "this was a question which did not affect the League at all," we can again quote the opinion of the most bitter foe of the repeal policy. His words were:

"When men are punished for promulgating their mere opinions as a crime, and when this oppression is a direct interference of the church with the state, who shall say that it is an issue foreign to the objects of the Liberal League?"

The closing portion of Mr. Applebee's paragraph above quoted is rant stolen from the religious press. It gains no weight from being remouthed from the Parker Memorial pulpit, and we never considered it, in the original, to be worth noticing. It is so infamously false in its implications, and so distortedly stated, that to the minds of all men whose good opinion is worth having it is self-refuting.

It is pleasant to turn from this dishonest rhodomontade to the philosophical remarks reproduced in this issue on page 636. A perusal of those glowing sentences, followed by a close reading of the subjoined extract, will, we are sure, be evidence sufficient to bear us out in characterizing this sermon as one of the most remarkable compounds of common-sense and prejudice—to use no stronger word—that has emanated from a theologian in modern times:

"Some people seem to imagin that while the utmost freedom of discussion should be allowed on doubtful or non-essential points, yet on points which are essential and not doubtful freedom of discussion ought not to be permitted. The Evangelical Alliance has formulated this idea in the motto: 'In essentials, unity; in non-essentials, liberty; in all things, charity.' On reading up the history of the National Liberal League I find that the League was idiotic enough, at the instigation of the same anti-religious genius who is responsible for introducing the great apple of discord, Comstock and his law, into its counsels, to gravely adopt a sort of parody on the Evangelical Alliance motto. At the first Congress of the League Mr. Andrews submitted the resolution 'that we adopt as the true scientific basis of organization the following motto or epitomized statement: In things demonstrated and certain, unity; in whatsoever can be doubted, free diversity; in all things, charity.' What supreme nonsense! What is a demonstrated certainty to one man is not so to another; and how can a demonstrated certainty be a ground of unity for those two men? Nobody has ever yet been able to separate doubtful points from those which are not doubtful or demonstrated, and certain things from things which are not demoustrated and not certain. What is doubtful to me may be a firm certainty to my neighbor. Shall he be allowed to restrain me in the utterance of my doubts because he happens to be without doubt at all? Humanity has made its noblest advances when it has exchanged its certainties for uncertainties. Humanity has committed its greatest mistakes and its fearfulest crimes when it has attempted to crush out a new thought which has arisen in the world, because that new thought has let in an element of doubt upon things which it had cherished as demonstrated and certain."

It is surprising how a man who seems to see so clearly the right principles of a true science of society should blunder in so simple a bit of reasoning as is Mr. Andrews's terse motto. We can only account for it by supposing he has borrowed either one or the other portion of his discourse, and forgotten to giv credit.

The Evangelical Alliance demanded unity in essentials—a very different thing from unity on things certain. And Mr. Applebee knows that while Mr. Andrews never asserted the things certain shall be just what he regarded as certain, the Evangelical Alliance dogmatically claims to define the essentials, and asserts that on what it chooses to so term there shall be no discussion. The reverend gentleman did not even quote Mr. Andrews aright; the accurate statement of the motto is, "In things proven, unity; in whatsoever can be doubted, free diversity; in things not trenching upon others' right, liberty; in all things, charity." To the first clause of this our minister retorts, "What supreme nonsense! What is a demonstrated certainty [we use the perverted version] to one man is not so to another." Well, well! Is not the multiplication table a demonstrated certainty to "another," or is it only a partial and one-sided thing? Is it not a demonstrated certainty that men are born and die? There are thousands of other certainties as well demonstrated as these, but if these two, or even one of them, were all, Mr. Andrews's motto asks unity in no more. And if these were not a demonstrated certainty in the universe, the motto would call for no unity until a certainty is demonstrated. A man to whom a thing is not demonstrated is not asked to unite upon it till it is demonstrated, or proven; but taking, for instance, the multiplication table as a basis, as many men as can see the certainty of that can unite on it—and on no more if no more is to them a certainty. Those who cannot accept the multiplication table as a demonstrated certainty need not unite. If Mr. Applebee's neighbor cannot explain this table so Mr. Applebee can understand it, he, Mr. Applebee, will do well to stand aloof from him, the neighbor.

"Nobody has ever yet been able to separate doubtful points from those which are not doubtful!" We cannot envy the condition of that man who travels from one end of life to the other without knowing a single thing. Such a complete embrace of Berkeleyism is rarely seen or felt as Mr. Applebee's. The world is to him a phamtom held before his eyes by his Infinit Spirit, for his confusion, and every object is a subject for doubt. No point is settled; he knows nothing, not even his own ignorance. He only thinks he exists. He is to be pitied.

But upon what foundation does he base his question whether his neighbor shall be permitted to restrain him in the utterance of his doubts, because that neighbor has no doubts upon the subject? What clause in the motto can he cite to sustain him? If his query is a dishonest attempt to impute to Mr. Andrews and the League purposes and desires which never entered the thought of either, nor were ever expressed by even the shadow of implication, then Mr. Applebee owes the man and the organization an apology. Is he gentleman enough to make it?

Humanity, he further says, has made its noblest advances when it has exchanged its certainties for uncertainties. This reminds us very much of Mr. Chainey's assertion that fiction has a higher mission than fact; in other words, that a lie is a better educator than truth. Well, two eminent gentlemen agree, and we must therefore conclude that when humanity exchanged its certainty of a flat earth for the *un*certainty of a round one, it made a great advance. But let us reverse the proposition—everything has two sides, it is said. When humanity changed its uncertainty of a flat earth for a certainty of a round one, it made a great retrogressiv movement. That is Mr. Applebee's logic.

But we hav followed Mr. Applebee as far as space permits. If we shall hav pointed out to him any inconsistencies which he may hav the candor to revoke, our labor will not hav been in vain. He is too good a man to allow to be utterly lost without an effort made to redeem him, and as Brother Seaver refuses to pull him out of the mire, we hold him our fraternal hand. We think, however, that Brother Seaver ought to seriously labor with his whilom subscriber.

Orderly Anarchy.

From Benjamin R. Tucker's Liberty.

TO THE EDITOR OF LIBERTY, Sir: I hav just read E. H. Benton's letter on currency, and your reply thereto. It seems to me that you are both in a "corner." Taking Anarchism as a standpoint for a "new departure" in thought and action, what is your mortgage worth? What can it secure? Take away the machinery of the state, and mortgages will not possess as much value as so much blank paper. The latter may be useful to write on; whilst the former could only be utilized for pulp. When we do away with or outgrow the "state," we must leave all its methods behind. We must not attempt to put the new wine of the revolution into the old skins (bottles) of the played-out state. J. W. COOPER.

Tennessee Pass, Col., Aug. 15, 1884.

[There is no point to Mr. Cooper's criticism unless he is a Communist as well as an Anarchist (if indeed one can be both). For none but Communists favor the disappearance of all titles to justly earned wealth. A mortgage is a conditional title. To say that under Anarchy it will be worth nothing is to say that Anarchy means utter insecurity and wholesale theft. A not uncommon charge from its opponents, but a strange confession to come from one of its friends! When Anarchy prevails, all just titles will be valid and efficacious for one of two reasons—either people will hav improved in their morals sufficiently to respect them voluntarily, or else such persons as are indisposed to respect them will be forced to do so. "Th: old state over again!" my undiscriminating friend will cry. Not at all, my friend! Simply a voluntary association for defense of person and property to which no one need belong who does not choose, and which no one not belonging will be expected to support. By no means an old bottle. On the contrary, an entirely new one, and just the thing, as long as needed, to hold the revolutionary wine.—Editor Liberty.]

Will Mr. Tucker please explain further? Will his anarchical society constrain the people outside his "voluntary association for defense of person and property?" If yes, in what does the difference consist between anarchical society and our present government? If no, where is the protection? Or shall persons belonging to the association only hav dealings with fellow-members; and, if a person in the association is constrained, how is his act voluntary? And will he continue to pay for being constrained? It strikes us that this constraining is precisely what our friend Tucker is now so eloquently kicking against.

In Stephen Pearl Andrews's sociological scheme—the pantarchy—nothing but moral force is used. It looks as though Mr. Tucker would hav to adopt that or let our present societarial government alone.

Anyway, some more "constructiv" Anarchy from Mr. Tucker will be studied with interest. He should expound the positiv side of his philosophy for the benefit of the heathen.

Letters from Friends.

CANYON CITY, Aug. 23, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I want to giv you a few little incidents that hav occurred in my life within a few years. It may be they will help some others to think.

Having heard a Presbyterian minister say that truth never suffered by criticism, I said to him, "I believe all orthodox churches hold that Christ possessed two whole, perfect, and distinct natures, very God and very man, yet one Christ; and that that Christ died for man, and the churches worship him that died for them?" He said, "Yes." Then said I, "I understand idolatry to consist in the worship of anything but God." He said, "Yes." The first question, then, is, Did that very God die? He thought a moment, and then said, "No." Then said I, "Christ didn't die; nothing but a very man did die, and him we worship, and preach that his blood cleansed from all sin. How much does worship of a very man lack of idolatry? and then the idea that the blood of one even very man could save all the rest! and yet each one dies for himself at last. Now, what is the gospel you preach but the gospel of a very man?" He turned, picked up his hat, and said he must go down town, and left me.

At another time I was out by my gate, and there came along a reverend doctor, and after shaking hands I said to him, "Doctor, you know we believe that our souls are an immaterial and immortal substance?" He said, "Yes." Said I, "Is the soul the result of direct creation, or of derivation." He answered, "As much the result of creation as anything Almighty God ever made." I replied that it was either created when Adam was, or since. He said, "Probably since." I replied, "Then probably it was created about the time your body was formed." He said, "Yes." "If so," said I, "did it fall in Adam?" He dropped his head a moment, and then started up and said, "Well, I'm going to a patient down here; I must go along."

In a day or two I called on our professor, principal of the seminary, and some fifty years old, a graduate and minister. I told him of the conversation I had had with the doctor, but he, tinctured a little with Unitarianism, spurned the idea of falling in Adam, but yet asserted he had a soul, and said to me, "Why, don't you know how quick your soul can go to England?" I said, "Professor, when my soul goes to England does it leave my body?" He slowly answered, "Well, I suppose not." "Then," said I, "it must be like india rubber—it stretches all the way." He was a big man, and had a big face. He opened his mouth and laughed, but the color mounted to his temples. Next day I fell in with the presiding elder and a circuit steward, and was telling them of the professor's and doctor's ideas of the creation of the soul. The elder said, "Professor Pinkney never studied theology. He is a scholar, but don't understand religion. It is not orthodox that each soul was created." "Well," said I, "elder, what is the orthodox view?" He replied, "Souls are begotten." I answered, "Then there must be a division of that immaterial substance which constitutes the soul, descending from father or mother, or both, and what do you think becomes of it in the thousands of instances where no material conception takes place." The elder paused, the steward saw his difficulty, and asked him a question on something else, and I said no more.

A few months after, being from home, I staid all night with a Dunkard preacher, who introduced the subject of what he called the no-soul church not far off, meaning the Second Adventists. Said I, "I suppose you believe you hav a soul?" He said, "Yes." I inquired, "Where did you get it?" He said it came from God. "Where did he get it?" "Well," said he, "in my opinion, the soul is a part of God." "Then, of course," said I, "it follows, first, that God is divisible into a good many parts; secondly, if a soul can sin, a part of God can sin; thirdly, if God ever damns a soul, he damns a part of himself; and, fourthly, you and I are Gods. What do you say to that?" He cast his eyes to the carpet a minute, and then said, "I'll think of that," and said no more about the no-soulists.

Some time ago a Campbellite minister came to our town to hold a protracted meeting. After preaching a week, he came to see me. I took him into my sitting-room, and he introduced himself by telling who he was and what was his business. He had graduated at a certain college in Kentucky, and then at a law school, and had practiced law for six or seven years; but had given it all up for the gospel. I hadn't said a word till now. Then I said: "Mr. Thornbury, I hav never been much acquainted with your sort of folks. I suppose you are orthodox as to the immortality of the soul, and the fall of Adam and consequent corruption of the race. "Oh, yes," he replied. "Mr. Thornbury, where did you get your soul?" He answered, "I believe God created a great mass of spirit substance, and when a child is born, with its first breath it inhales a portion of that substance as its soul." "All right," said I; "then it follows that all that great mass of spirit substance was in Adam when he fell, or the child born to-day never fell in Adam." He showed himself a little nonplussed, but as I wasn't done, I proceeded, "Mr. Thornbury, as you are a lawyer, I would like to ask you another question. In our Constitution is a clause forbidding a bill of attainder; what do you understand by bill of attainder?" He replied: "It was an old English law that disgraced the family of a criminal and subjected them to consequences." "But why," said I, "was that put into our Constitution?" "Because of the manifest injustice of such a bill." "All right; then another question, if you please. Was the offense of Adam against moral law simply, or against physical law?" He said it was violation of moral law. "And because of that the whole race is injured?" He said yes. "And what is that, then, but a bill of attainder, which you say is manifestly unjust?" He drew his watch out of his pocket and said he had agreed to go to dinner at the next house and asked to be excused.

One day I went out into the street and fell in company with the Methodist preacher, once an M.D., and presiding elder. I said, "Doctor, either your soul is everywhere in the universe, or only somewhere." He said it was only somewhere; it was local. "Then," said I, "it has extension, and that extension is divisible. Extension and divisibility are properties of matter, and we recognize matter only by its properties. If, therefore, the properties of matter and spirit are alike, how do you know one from the other?" "Oh," said he, "you can't reason about spirit as you do about matter." "But," said I, "doctor, you authorized me to. You said your soul was only somewhere." But he started off and the other preacher called to him to come back and settle that question. But no; off he went.

After awhile I was at a boarding-house and sat down to dinner near a Baptist D.D., and during dinner said to him, "Doctor, is baptism essential to salvation?" He said, "I suppose you know what the Bible says, 'he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved.'" "Yes, I know that," said I, "but I am asking for your opinion. Is baptism essential to salvation?" He seemed reluctant, but said no. "Then," said I, "to what is it essential?" He replied, "To keeping the commands of God." Said I, "Is not keeping the commands of God essential to salvation?" By this time he was done his dinner and passed into another room.

Traveling from home some fifty miles, I had occasion to stop at a farmhouse for dinner and feed my horse. Having been sitting all the forenoon, I apologized for walking about a little and looking at some books and papers on a bureau, by which I saw they were Baptists. In the course of a little conversation, something was said about free "niggers," and I made the observation that I thought niggers had as good a right to themselvs as anybody in the world. At that the old woman looked at me and said, "Would you eat at the table with a nigger?' Said I, "Madam, a few days before I left home, a Baptist minister called at my house on business, and went away toward night, and knowing the circumstances, I told him if he found no better place to stay over, he might come back and stay with me. He accordingly came back, ate supper at our table, slept in a good bed (was dressed well himself), took breakfast with us, and we never caught the itch, nor any other distemper, and yet he was almost jet black." "Well," she said, "I wouldn't." I said, "Madam, are you a Christian?" "I hope so," she said. "Do you believe negroes are folks included in the covenant of grace and redeemed by Christ?" She said yes. "Then," said I, "they may be Christians, and to be a Christian Christ must dwell in the heart, mustn't he?" She said yes. "Well, then, you see," said I, "the difference between you and Christ; he will dwell in the heart of those with whom you would not so much as eat." A. B. PIKARD.

VICTORIA, B. C., Sept. 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Col. R. G. Ingersoll visited this city about two weeks ago and delivered his lecture on "Orthodoxy." As soon as his lecture was advertised he was subjected to a perfect avalanche of abuse and misrepresentation through the columns of the press; good Christians and church-members rushed frantically around in their detestable endeavor to prevent Ingersoll's agent securing a hall, and thus preventing, to all intents and purposes, good, law-abiding citizens listening to a man who dares to express an opinion differing with those of superstition and ignorance, concocted by shrewd and cunning men centuries ago, and handed down from age to age like the traditions and legands of barbarians and savages. In this they were partially successful, inasmuch as they prevented a hall of any great capacity being secured. A somewhat small hall, however, was secured.

A few minutes before the time set for the delivery of the lecture, and when the hall was about half full, the police appeared on the scene and refused to allow any more to enter, on the plea that there wasn't sufficient exit from the hall in case of fire or accident. A complaint to that effect had, at the last minute, been laid with the authorities by two model Christians. For about half an hour indignation and confusion reigned supreme both inside and outside the hall. But again orthodoxy was doomed to defeat. Six stalwart Liberals procured axes, and in a few moments knocked out almost an entire end of the building, thus creating the alleged necessary exit and gaining an overwhelming victory for free thought and speech. The hall was packed, the lecture proceeded; and it is needless to add that the audience was enthusiastic, and that every argument of the lecturer carried conviction with it. If Ingersoll had remained here one week, I don't think there would hav been one hundred intelligent people in the whole city who could hav believed in the religion of our churches.

Ever since his departure the church choirs hav been singing praises to the Lord that this monster of Infidelity was not permitted to remain longer.

I hav heard it asserted on several occasions since Ingersoll's lecture here that he was challenged about a year ago, in the city of Chicago, to meet a Jesuit priest on a public platform and discuss religion, and that he declined or sneaked out of it. I don't for a moment believe such a statement; in fact, never heard of the circumstance before, but you would oblige myself and many other Liberals in this city if you would publish the true circumstances of this alleged "back-down" on the part of Ingersoll, so that we will be able to refute with authority such statements in future. In search of knowledge, I respectfully remain, Yours truly, FRED. SHAKESPEARE.

[Mr. Ingersoll has been challenged many times by insignificant priests who hoped to gain notoriety through Ingersoll's great fame. The colonel has refused to be used in that way, but has a standing challenge out to the churches of the United States (and he would probably be willing to include British Columbia) to put forth their representativ man, agreeing to fall with him; and he would see that they had the opportunity of tumbling. We hav no knowledge of the particular priest to whom Mr. Shakespeare refers, but he doubtless can be duplicated in any city of the Union. There is great itching on the part of many obscure Jesuits to win public recognition by debating with Mr. Ingersoll. They are even willing to be literally skinned alive that the salve of fame may be applied to their wounds.—ED. T. S.]

POMONA, CAL., Sept. 15, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Again the followers of the "meek and lowly" of Pomona hav shown their hands as regards their unfitness for the affairs of this world. Briefly, the facts are: a saloon-keeper was arrested for keeping a disorderly house, by information of a citizen of the purgativ profession, he securing the services of a "Lamb of the Lord" for an attorney whose head towers some distance under the clouds, but whose intellect soars far above them in matters superstitious and presumptuous holiness. Said gospel-sharp is a handsome young fellow, and would ornament a harp or ram's horn in the realms of the New Jerusalem with more grace and appropriateness than a court of justice in California. But this young gospel dude imagins that his gigantic intellect is too lofty for the ordinary way of dealing with matters of this world in a worldly way, and, possibly imbued with the idea that he would be called upon in the sweet by and by to plead to the indictment of "What are you here for?" would be able to swear that he had done his master's work well by peremptorily "firing" the writer hereof from off the jury in the above-stated case, presumably on the ground that he is an Infidel.

Yes, Mr. P. Ant, attorney, I am glad that you "fired" me on the grounds of not being one of you. It portrays beyond anything I might or could write the bigotry and narrowness of your clouded and befogged mind. It speaks volumes. It shows to the thinking people that you are possessed of more superstition than sense, more love for the phantoms than regard for law. You would succeed better as a dealer in wings, harps, and the general paraphernalia of ghosts, on the corner of St. Gabriel st., New Jerusalem, than dealing in law and real estate in Pomona. Speak to your loved pastor, all ye holy bamboozlers, for a pair of wings. Prepare for your exit to the realms of your usefulness. You are angels now, and in the line of promotion. You will not be missed here. Your loss will not be felt, and you may be able to amuse the birds of paradise.

Now, Mr. Editor, these fellows ought to read "The Bible Analyzed," by that great thinker, John R. Kelso. If they would, their holy eyes would suddenly flop open so wide that ever after they could read by the light of the new moon. It would remove the kinks out of their putty heads clean and clear forever. The light of the nineteenth century would be a revelation indeed. It is a grand book, and ought to be on the shelf of every Liberal in the land.

On last Sunday a "come-up-and-be-dipped" spook-house was dedicated in this place to the phantoms of the skies. It cost about $3,000 in coin, and a terrible amount of begging, to appease the wrath of the gods and satisfy the avarice of the parson.

As an illustration of the lasting effects of the reading of Freethought publications in the minds of the young, I met Mr. Thos. K. Thompson, now living at the Chino Ranch, who informs me that he is seventy-three years old, a firm, Materialistic reasoner; that he began reading the Boston Investigator in 1824. Since that time he says that he has no use or reverence for the gods of the skies. He is a finely preserved specimen of a man who complies with the laws of nature and observes their order.

I trust Brother Chainey will be able to capture some of those mild spirits that hav recently been so familiar with him. Brother Chainey is emotional; he can't help it.

There are some sixty Freethinkers in Pomona, including four or five Spiritualists. We do not hav any organization, but each and all are fighting the creeds of superstition single-handed. H. L. SHAUG.

BREMOND, TEXAS, Aug. 31, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Your favor of the 21st inst. and package of tracts are received. With some of the tracts I am delighted. "Honest Questions," etc., "Gods of Superstition," etc., "Discussion on Prayer," are worth to me more than ten times the cost of all. I hav examined your catalog and marked my selections, and month by month, as the pay car arrives, I will set aside a portion of my pay to purchase myself a library of Liberal literature. By the bye, is there a place in your city where second-hand Bibles can be sold? I hav a big stock on hand, and would like to realize their market value. Freethought and Liberalism are much more prevalent here than I thought some time back; but it is not educated, there is a lack of guiding principle, a want of training and a trainer. I hav loaned my tracts to several, and they ask for more of the same kind. I hav tried to get some to join me and send you a big order, but no good. Many of the people here think Freethought means Freelove, and that no one who is a non-believer in God and the scripture can be either honest in principle or purpose or pure in morals. Like myself, they need instruction and an instructor. I feel at times like starting a night or Sunday school myself. I know my insufficiency, but I think I could do this: read them Paine's "Age of Reason" as a text-book, Bennett's tracts to explain, and Ingersoll's lectures to amuse, and then get some simple works on geology and astronomy and gradually work up an interest in the subject, that would benefit them some, and myself ever so much. I am a carpenter in a bridge gang, and hav with me a dozen men, whom I can in some measure influence. Now, cannot you, who are so far advanced, aid me in this matter? Can you not direct me in a course of teaching or practice that will giv me new ideas of how to help others? Unlike Christian missionaries, I want no material assistance. I can bear my own expenses in the matter. I want ideas, and suggestions of how to help myself and others. When I was a professed Christian I taught in Sunday-schools. I studied, to be able to teach, and I found out that I was on the wrong track. I owe as much to humanity to-day as I did when a Christian, and I must learn myself, and try and teach others. I want to be able to convince everyone whom I am thrown with that my belief is sincere, and founded on principle, and that I am able to giv a clear and cogent reason for my belief. Can you gather from my rambling letter an idea of what I need, and can you help me?. I am deeply in earnest. I am getting old (fifty-four), and I want to try and undo all I can of what I hav heretofore been at so much trouble to do, clouding the minds of others in superstition.

I will send you my subscription to your paper and my order for books in a few days, as soon as the pay-car comes up.

With many thanks to the mind and memory of D. M. Bennett, for the pleasure and profit I hav derived from the few of his tracts I hav read, and an earnest hope—not prayer—for the success to the paper he founded, I am, with great respect,

Jos. E. FICKLIN.

CINCINNATI, O., Sept. 23, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: As you are allowing some discussion on the political question, I wish to say a few words.

I was asked the question a few days ago who I was going to vote for. I wish to answer the question through your columns, and giv my reasons for so doing. I would say, B. F. Butler. I am asked why. I would say because he is the most Liberal man of the three. In his letter of acceptance he does not cater to the church, he does not lug God into the Constitution, he does not accept the myths and phantoms of the church, he is in favor of all property being taxed, the church included. No man did better service in the war. He was the right man in the right place. He is an independent man, doing and saying what he believed to be right, regardless of anyone. No man's vote stands better in Congress. He was always on the right side, always in favor of the workingman, and always opposed to monopolies and the giving away of public lands. He is all right on the tariff question. There is not a man in the country that understands the affairs of the country, the wants and needs, better than he does. There is not a more intellectual man, or a man with better brain, in the country than B. F. Butler. He has outgrown and left both the Republican and Democratic parties because they were too corrupt for him. He sat down on the pride of Massachusetts by showing up its corruptions. They went back on him for it; I respect him for it. He never hesitates to do right regardless of consequences. That is the kind of man we want.

Blaine is a very intellectual man, and a great politician, but he will do anything for money or political gain (in my judgment). He enriched himself by voting away public lands.

Cleveland's moral character condemns him. If every Liberal and workingman will vote for Butler he will be elected, and we will hav a good, honest man at the head of the government, and one that cannot be nosed around by any person or party.

C. D. WALLACE.

ITHACA, N. Y., Sept. 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It is proposed by John R. Kelso that a few should giv their definitions of marriage, when he would giv his in answer to his question, What is it? It being a question of so much interest to me, having lived in happy union with woman since the age of twenty—about fifty-five years—to express my ideas of what it is and its consequence, I will say that as I believe in no personal or spiritual gods other than concentrativ love, expressed in woman, I must look to nature to express an opinion. I think that I hav reason to believe that the natural instinct is expressed in either sex from childhood up, added to which is reason; that marriage is a fundamental principle in nature; neither is it the ceremony by the priest that makes the two one, but it is natural selection; and when knowledge givs the parties the capacity of natural selection, they are like two drops of water running together, that cannot be separated. But few comparativly hav arrived to that knowledge as yet; hence the marriage ceremony under the circumstances is a wise enactment, though many are unequally yoked together, and are not happy, which is the cause of much misery, but is a less evil than the commission of adultery and the breaking up of families. If two are united in wedlock by natural selection, and become one in interest to all intents and purposes, what need of woman's enfranchisment, inasmuch as she and her husband are of one interest? But the more masculin women seem to aspire to the position and place of man, and let them hav it and modify the marriage law, and thus to be on equality with man; make it impossible to substitute her maiden name for his. Please excuse my digression from the subject.

Yours for liberty of woman and her marriage by natural selection,

ZENAS KENT.

JOLIET, ILL., Aug. 31, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I want to beg a little space in the most valuable paper published, THE TRUTH SEEKER, if you think this worthy. My object is to find a soul for man, and think it easy. If electricity or magnetism is not matter, is it not the force that operates or forms the mind? I think it is the great secret that the Theosophists hav discovered, and, as W. T. Brown in his communication says, it would be dangerous at the present time. His last sentence expresses my views (page 551, TRUTH SEEKER). Miss Hurst, the Georgia girl with such a power, receives it from that force. I think if she had the key to the occult secret she would be a very dangerous person. If you admit this electro-magnetic power to be what acts upon the brain and body, then we hav a soul, and the Spiritualist sends it by itself to a community of souls, which I deny exists. As Mr. Perry says on page 555, the body and mind are not one thing, but two things connected. Mr. Rothwell says you might as well say a bell is not one thing. Now, take a bell and put it in a tight vessel and pump the air from it, and it would be one thing. If it was struck it would not sound. But let the second thing in—the air—and it would sound. But crack the bell, and it would impair the sound. Now, I take the human body, and when, for comparison, injured or worn out, as in old age, the tone is impaired, and when the electro-magnetic soul leaves entirely, they both return to their affinity, and the electro-magnetic force (soul) is eternal, the same as matter, and everywhere present; and I think the Spiritualist will learn another wrinkle, and admit the materializing of the spirit is by this occult secret only in the mind of the living, formed as you saw them.

You hav my view of things, very imperfectly explained.

Yours, with my best wishes, S. G. SCOLLAY.

36 GRAFTON ST., HALIFAX, N. S., Sept. 21, 284.

MR. EDITOR: A new subscriber from Halifax, Nova Scotia, is something new under the sun, or I am much mistaken. Mr. Charles F. Mott, the new subscriber, is an outspoken Freethinker, and Halifax can boast of few such. I am not acquainted with one other. If there was a possibility of truth seekers fraternizing as church-members do, organization would be much easier. A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind; how much kinder two fellow feelings would makes us no fellow has found out. With your permission, Mr. Editor, I will try to solve the latter problem in the following manner. I am a pronounced Freethinker, and also an enthusiastic checker-player. I am anxious to play a match by correspondence with some checker-playing truth seeker. I can accommodate three correspondents simultaneously. To giv the lasses a show, and to show at the same time that I am no sectarian, so far as the sexes are concerned, I throw the glove to the girls as well as the boys, though I must say I never met a good checker-player of the fair sex; but I am also willing to acknowledge that I hav never met a feminin Freethinker. I am of the opinion the game is too abstruse to be a favorit with the fair sex, but I am quite willing, nay, anxious, that some of the fair readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER may show her superiority at my favorit amusement.

Hoping Brother Macdonald may not think it out of place to thus make acquainted some of his scattered congregation, I am,

Yours fraternally, WM. FORSYTH,
Champion checker-player of Nova Scotia.

WAUSHIP, UTAH, Sept. 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Who was it that said something about fools attempting what angels feared to? He should not hav said it, for I believe it deters many of us who are conscious of a lack of education from attempting to express our ideas. There is no part of THE TRUTH SEEKER that I enjoy better than "Letters from Friends." It is gratifying to at least know that there are subscribers in different parts of the country, and a few words from every village would be interesting. We Mormons used to hav what were called testimony meetings, where it became everyone's duty to bear testimony, which a great many did in these words: "I know this is the work of God and that Joseph Smith was his prophet, and that Brigham Young is his lawful successor."

At one of these meetings I was urged to bear my testimony. I did, and it was my first and last attempt at public speaking. When I stood up, the audience appeared to me to be most all eyes, and something in my throat prevented me from uttering a word until I saw they were all smiling at me, which piqued me to say: "Brothers and sisters, I do not know anything about it; and if I did I am too 'scairt' to tell it." I then sat down with perspiration streaming from me.

Now my sermon may suggest one of the reasons we do not hear oftener from different parts of the country. Utah in particular has not been heard from lately, so I hope this may prompt some of our friends to "bear their testimony."

Fraternally yours, WM. REYNOLDS.

SOLON, ME., Aug. 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It has been a long time since I hav had an opportunity to pen a few lines to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the worst of all is I hav not had time to even read it. I am here in old Maine once more, viewing those beautiful hills and valleys, and can see old Kennebec from my window as I write. I also went to Maranocook to attend the great political mass meeting that was held on the shore of that lake, and must say it is one of the most beautiful places I ever saw for such a gathering. There were three quite large steamers, and any amount of small boats that were skipping over the waters of the lake, and every other convenience that such a gathering would need. I also heard quite a number of speeches from Maine's political leaders, such as Governor Robie, Mr. Blaine, and Eugene Hale, Mr. Fry, Mr. Dingley, and a host of smaller ones too numerous to mention; and a few from out West, such as Emery Storrs, of Chicago, and Col. Plummer, of Decatur, and Mr. Gibson, from Ohio, and some others, all very able speakers. It was a very beautiful day, and all passed off very quietly and without any accident. All seemed to enjoy it finely as a day of recreation and pleasure riding on the lake.

SARAH CLEVELAND HILTON.

WEST BAY CITY, MICH., July 7, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav but little time to write, in consequence of a pressure of business. We are very pleasantly located in the western part of the city. The Becker hotel was opened July 2d. The Liberalists and Freethinkers of the city and adjoining country towns met with a hearty reception from Mr. and Mrs. Becker. The reformatory topics of the day were ably discussed, and the numerous guests disbanded at 11.30 P.M., seemingly well pleased, and socially and intellectually entertained.

Mr. Becker is an old-time subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

In conclusion, I would say that tourists visiting northern Michigan will be hospitably entertained if they patronize the Becker House. I hav read your valuable paper only a short time, and shall enroll my name ere long as a subscriber. I consider your corps of contributors able expounders of natural laws, and sincerely hope that every investigator who wishes justice and truth as boon companions, will aid you as subscribers and contributors.

Wishing you every success, I remain yours ever in the course of truth and mental liberty,

J. N. YAKES.

VIENNA, N. Y., Sept. 21, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: By looking at the tab on my paper, I discovered it read Oct. 1, 1884; consequently inclosed you will find three dollars, to continue for another year. I was never an orthodox, but about thirty years ago I began reading the Bible for the purpose of finding for myself its contents. After reading it three times by course, I was satisfied that it was no good for me. I then read Universalism, but I could not swallow the atonement. I preferred to pay my own little bills here and hereafter. I next commenced investigating Spiritualism, and, like many others, I became thoroughly convinced of its truths; and although I hav read THE TRUTH SEEKER for about five years, with its pros and cons, my faith is not shaken in the least, but I can say I know that this is not all of life, for I hav seen and talked with friends that hav passed over the river where there was no chance for deception. I am glad Brother Chainey has come out honestly and told the world of what he has found.

MRS. C. S. TREMAIN.

ORTHODOXY IMPROVED.

MINNEAPOLIS, Sept 20, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Though not infallible, we suggest improvement on orthodoxy. If a God of infinit love exists, he will most assuredly fulfil all mankind's highest hopes, aspirations, and desires. If a creator cannot exist, still we know that Dame Nature does change creeping worms to most beautiful, lovely butterflies. Who knows that nature cannot change mankind to unfleshed intellectual spirit beings, who may range and explore the grand, immense, infinit universe from planet to planet; from system to system; from world to world, as beautiful happy butterflies go from flower to flower? Thus may not mankind be forever progressing, while eternity unrolls its never-ending line? Is not this a more pleasing prospect than endless misery?

THIS, THEN, IS ORTHODOXY IMPROVED.

If nature changes little worms,
And givs them joy, and love, and wing,
May men not change to angel forms
As earth does lovely flowers bring?

To each and all mankind may come
A change to take the spirit flight,
The perfect Universe to roam
'Mid worlds of ecstasy and light.

Progressing intellect may soar
Free from mortality and clay,
To join the loved ones gone before
When every tear is wiped away.

May not mankind together meet
On bright celestial shining plains,
Where happiness will be complete,
Where harmony forever reigns?

E. N. KINGSLEY.

GLANFORD, CAN., Sept. 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for one year's subscription of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for a friend of mine, to be sent to the address herein given.

In reading your TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 13th, when I came to the convention and read the conversion of George Chainey, it put me in an "eerie swither" whether to advance or retire from Freethinking, Secularism, and Agnosticism, to see one of our supposed best men—a leader and eloquent speaker—join Spiritualism; George Chainey and the Witch of Endor! His experience in joining the spirit-band reminds me very much of a Salvation soldier joining the army of the Lord, who had fought the devil, the world, and the flesh till he conquered them all, and now thanks God for the victory. I am afraid George Chainey has not conquered the last-named evil.

Kindly send me a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 6th, as a friend of mine wants it, and charge it to me. He wants to hav "God's Love for Man," by E. J. Bowtell.

Yours truly, JOHN MCCLEMONT.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Sept. 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read Mr. George Chainey's conversion in THE TRUTH SEEKER. While it is sparkling, dazzling language, it made me feel sad for the man, for I thought he would hav a future. He, in my mind, climbed his Pegasus, but fell over on the other side. Spiritualism I believe to be a phantom created in a semi-diseased brain, which carries to its possessor ecstasy and hallucination, and produces fantastic ideas and pictures which hav been impressed upon the individual previously out of romance and ghost stories of old. Spiritualism has never at any time disclosed a single fact or truth save such capricious fantastic capers as hav been produced by individuals in similar excited state and condition.

I am glad to learn that Mr. Watts is going to settle on this side the ocean, for I think he will hav a far larger field to develop his genius and ability, while England has still able brain enough.

Very truly yours, C. R. L.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., Sept. 14, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed fifty cents, to go to pay for my TRUTH SEEKER. You doubtless receive some surprising statements from some of us worn-out veterans, as, for instance, from Brother James U. Stewart, of the Dayton, Ohio, Home. He says, "I am the only one that takes a Liberal paper out of four thousand inmates of the Central Soldiers' Home of Ohio." You also got the unaccountable intelligence from here that only one man took THE TRUTH SEEKER, Ben Parkins by name. Such a mistake published in the great TRUTH SEEKER and sent over all the United States and Canada, and Lord knows where else, injures the reputation of the Homes. I do not know how many Liberal papers the four thousand in the Dayton Home take, but I do know that there is more than one. So please correct Brother Stewart's statement, lest many be deceived.

Yours for truth, NELSON HUNT.

BURR OAK, MICH., Sept. 20, 284.

MR. EDITOR: In your book notices of September 13th, you mention "Rules of the Theosophical Society (of India), together with an explanation of its objects and principles." Is that for sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office? If so, what is the price? Where are the other works of the society sold? A few words in THE TRUTH SEEKER on this subject might be of interest to quite a number of your readers. N. G. WATKINS.

[We hav to send to Asia for most of the Theosophical works, but we are willing to take orders from our friends if they can possess their souls with the requisit amount of patience. We hav a few of the books on hand, and these will be sent promptly upon receipt of the order.—ED. T. S.]

Mr. Applebee's More Philosophical Remarks.

Closely connected with the ethics of Liberalism is a question which cannot be said to hav been, as yet, satisfactorily determined—the question as to the precise point at which what John Stuart Mill calls "the sovereignty of the individual" terminates, and the right of society to control individual action begins. Society has very often made mistakes, and has punished as crimes what were really very great virtues. The great mischief, perhaps, has been that the dominant power in society has been too ready to assume of certain actions that they are sins against God, and that therefore such actions shall and ought to be punished as crimes against man. Seeing that a sin is a conscious violation of any known law of God—or, if you prefer so to put it, a conscious violation of any known law of nature, it is manifest a man may commit a good many sins and yet not, therefore, commit any crime. Seeing that a crime is simply a violation of the laws framed by society for the protection of its members, it is equally manifest that a man may commit a good many crimes and yet not, therefore, commit any sin. The dominant power in English society once regarded it as a sin to abstain from worshiping God on Sundays and on saints' days anywhere save in the parish church, and not so to attend the parish church was made a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment. In some of the southern states of America it was once a crime to teach a colored child to read; doubtless those amiable persons who originated that law sincerely believed that teaching a slave-child to read was sinful. Not very long ago it was a crime in Spain to read the Protestant Bible; reading the Bible was made a crime by people who had first succeeded in persuading themselvs it was a sin. Not only are actions esteemed sinful thus often made crimes, but very often, too, actions are made criminal which hav not, in the estimation of anybody, any sin about them at all. It is a crime against the government of America to smuggle an English edition of the Bible into this country without paying duty on it; but, I think, the strictest protectionist would hesitate to characterize such an act a sin. I am rather inclined to think the sin would rather consist in not smuggling the Bible, or any other useful book in, if one could get the chance of doing it.* Sometimes Cæsar demands more than his righteous tribute; and, at such times, although it would undoubtedly be a crime to refuse it, it would, as undoubtedly, be a sin to giv it. The higher law man has to obey is but seldom embodied in a statute law. Theodore Parker obeyed the higher law, but disregarded the statute law, when, having married that colored couple, he gave the woman a Bible and the man a pistol, telling the man to use the weapon in defense of his own and his wife's liberty and honor. But, whenever the dominant power in society has presumed to determin for the whole of its members what constitutes a sin, it has always happened that society has unduly encroached on the "sovereignty of the individual." A kirk session in Scotland in the latter part of the last century declared carrying a drink of water from a well on Sabbath day to be an enormous sin; and they turned that supposed sin into a crime, for committing which they made people do a degrading public penance. Those grim kirk elders would not hav given even Jesus a cup of cold water on the Sabbath day unless the water had been standing over-night, and so had lost its freshness.

The truth of the matter seems to be somewhere here—the individual should be left free to act so long as his action does not interfere with the same liberty to act possessed by other people. This principle condemns in every shape and form any authoritativ interference with opinion. It leaves thought, and the expression of thought, absolutely free. It leaves thought absolutely free; and it leaves action free up to that point at which action becomes an intrusiv impertinence done toward others; while, even up to that point, it puts the individual under all the powerful but intangible restraints of public opinion, and amenable to all those penalties which public opinion, when it fancies itself outraged, has the power and the remorselessness to inflict. I would hav the Salvation Army protected in holding what it calls its religious service in that place which the members of the Army hav duly hired for the purpose; and I think that the hoodlums who interrupt those services would be benefited by a month's sojourn at the penitentiary. I would, however, restrain the Salvation Army from perambulating the streets for the same reason that I would restrain a procession of Roman Catholic priests, with the host at their head, from street perambulation. Citizens, to whom such displays of religious zeal are offensiv, hav a right to their own eyes and their own ears, and they hav a right to demand that eyesight and hearing shall not, and against their wills, be invaded.

There are two principles both of which are equally true and equally important in the wise regulation of a state. These are the principle of individualism and the principle of communism—the principle which prompts a man to resist external authority, and the principle which countenances the use of such authority. Both are true, although each one is so different from the other, and although each one is so contradictory to the other. The great difficulty is, and always has been, to find out the exact point where these two opposit principles meet, so that freedom may rightly be restrained by authority, while, at the same time, authority may guarantee freedom. Two things, at least, are essential to the exercise of anything like complete mental freedom—there must be, first, the ability to think; and there must be, second, freedom in thinking. Now, whence does man derive his power, his ability to think? What is that process which quickens within man that ability and so enables him to become a thinker? The answer, of course, is education. Hence the wisdom of Francis E. Abbot, the first president of the Liberal League, but of whom the League did not prove to be worthy—a man who must, I suppose, go through the process of dying before other men find out his worth—in endeavoring to base the League's edifice of freedom on popular education.

But what is education? The process of it is not confined to the disciplin of the schools. Every man living, and all his lifetime, has been undergoing an educational process. Education is that process by which all that is good in a man has somehow, and in some imperfect fashion, been brought to the surface; it is that process, too, by which all that is bad in a man has somehow, and in some fashion, been brought to the surface, too. Such a man has been educated. He is what he is because he has been educated into being what he is. Everything that has happened to him has been an educational disciplin to him. He has awakened into life something in him that was slumbering before. Education, then, is no more nor less than this—a development of one's self, combined with a disciplin, sanctioned by the experience of the ages, which tends to regulate in one's self whatsoever is vicious, and to develop in one's self whatsoever is virtuous. I use the word "regulate" instead of "repress," because, after all, there is nothing in man which needs to be repressed, but everything in him which needs to be developed and wisely regulated. Every vice is a virtue run mad. The desire to acquire things is a very wholesome desire; but let that desire run mad, and it becomes theft. It is doubtless a good thing to shut the detected thief up in the penitentiary; hardly anybody doubts that. Yet, after all, we cannot escape from this conclusion, that if the thief had been born of other parents, had inherited other tendencies, had been blessed with an education which would hav drawn out what was good in him and regulated what was evil in him, instead of having been cursed in his birth by inherited tendencies, for the possession of which he is not responsible, and cursed since his birth with an education which repressed what was good in him, and allowed what was bad in him to run riot, he never would hav found a degraded home in any jail.

In the same way the desire to destroy things—although when it runs mad it means murder—is, in itself, a perfectly legitimate desire. Man would never hav obtained foothold on this world at all if he had not entered into a ruthless war of extermination with those forms of life which were already in possession of it. He did not ask their permission to kill them. He had to commit murder in order to maintain his foothold. And so, when the Pilgrim fathers came to this continent, as it has been wittily said, they first fell on their knees, and next they fell on the aborigines. They did not ask the red man whether he would prefer to be killed or not—they killed him outright and right off, and decided upon the morality and legality of the killing afterwards, when "Lo, the poor Indian!" was not alive to put in his evidence.

But this desire to destroy, inherent in humanity, is esteemed blameless, if not laudable, when exercised in reference to society-indorsed nuisances. It is only considered murderous nowadays when anybody presumes to do a little killing on his own account. There can be but little doubt that many of the murderers who hav, as yet, been hung, if they had been placed in conditions which made the gratification of their murderous instincts legal and legitimate, would hav been carried in triumph from battle-fields, hav had their brows encircled with laurels, and been heavily pensioned as saviors of the world! Murder is a survival of the time when the principle of private revenge was sanctioned by public sentiment and public law. Public sentiment and public law no longer sanction such methods of adjusting grievances, either real or imagined, and so we put the murderer into jail and hang him. But considering what humanity has been, and considering, too, that the humanity which has been so largely determined what the humanity of to-day really is, it is hard to tell whether every murderer executed dies more as a criminal or more as a martyr.

Education, then, it seems to me, is, first and foremost, a drawing out, an educing, of what man is by nature. Second, and only second, it consists of the multitude of impressions made upon the budding human life by the external circumstances surrounding it. Thus education would seem to be made up of two methods—first, the method of educing the new humanity that is perpetually coming to us in the shape of childhood; and, second, the method of influencing the new humanity by what has already been educed from the old humanity. This second method will exercise itself and work its influence, in some way or other, whether we will or no; and the truest policy for educationalists to pursue is simply to leave it alone—neither to indorse what the consensus of humanity says, nor to deny what that consensus says. The pupil is already under that influence now, and he will become more and more under it as he emerges from the school into the world. The primary duty of the educationlist is to let that second educational process pretty well alone, and to confine himself to the task of educing, from the pupils under his charge, something new and fresh, and new for the humanity which is to be. The educationalist, as such, has little or nothing to do with foregone conclusions about religion, or theology, or politics, or sociology—or, in fact, anything. All those foregone conclusions represent something which humanity is supposed to hav mastered—or something which humanity foolishly fancies it has mastered. The education of to-day has comparativly little to do with the results of the past education of humanity; but it has everything to do with what possibly may come of educing from the fresh minds born to us to-day the fresh thoughts with which God is freshly inspiring the new humanity that is ever coming to us.

Necessarily, then, an educational process is that which givs to thought its range, because it is that process by which the thinking power is drawn out and disciplined by exercise. The measure of a man's true education may be said to be the measure of the mental freedom he is capable of exercising. It is of small use to educate the individual and so enable him to think, unless he is free to exercise his thinking. The more a man is educated, the more beneficent his thinking will be likely to prove to the world. The less he is educated, the less beneficent his thinking will be likely to prove to the world; and the less mischief he will therefore do should he happen to think wrongly. A restraint put upon thinking presses most hardly, not upon the little thinkers of the world; not upon those who echo, parrot-like, the opinions of others; but it presses most hardly upon the great, broad thinkers of the world, upon those thinkers whose thinking is most beneficent to mankind, whose thoughts enrich the world's blood, and inspire the world's hero children to the doing of heroic deeds! Whether rightly or wrongly, millions of people care to know what Ingersoll thinks; but who, on this pleasant earth of ours, cares to know what those thrice-soddened bigots of Victoria, B. C., who tried in vain, the other night, to prevent Ingersoll from lecturing in their God-forsaken city, happen to think?

It would appear, then, that society may rightly restrain the individual so as to insure that every child shall hav imparted to it the priceless boon of self-defensiv knowledge; but it may not interfere in the way of defining for the individual the particular subjects on which his thoughts may be exercised, and the particular intellectual conclusions he may, with safety to himself, hold. By neglecting to enforce the education of its citizens society is guilty of a sin of omission; by endeavoring to fetter thought, when education has quickened thought into life, society is guilty of commission. These two sins, it may be noted, generally go together. In those countries of the world were education is most cared for, as in Holland, Germany, Switzerland, France, England, and these United States, thought is freest and most vigorous; while in those countries in the world, as Spain and Russia, where the education of the people is least understood and least cared for, thought is fettered and every new development of it is sought to be suppressed by a cruel and a hard authority.

Some writers hav argued that the majority in a nation, especially if that majority be a great majority, hav a right to coerce the minority into silence. This doctrin is altogether wrong. The government of the many, as in America, has no more right to do it than the government of one, as in Russia, has a right to do it. The best and most popular government has no more right to do it than the worst and least popular. As John Stuart Mill wrote: "It is as noxious, or more noxious, when exerted in accordance with public opinion than when in opposition to it. If all mankind, minus one, were of one opinion, and only one person were of the contrary opinion, mankind would be no more justified in silencing that one than he, if he had the power, would be justified in silencing all mankind. Were an opinion a personal possession, of no value except to the owner; if to be obstructed in the enjoyment of it were simply a private injury, it would make some difference whether the injury was inflicted only on a few persons or on many. But the peculiar evil of silencing the expression of opinion is that it is robbing the human race, posterity as well as the existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion still more than those who hold it. If the opinion be right, they are deprived of the opportunity of exchanging error for truth; if wrong, they lose what is almost as great a benefit, the clearer perception and the livelier impression of truth produced by its collision with error." Persecution, in any shape, for opinion is not an evil confined to the persecutor and the persecuted; it is an evil that is entailed on all posterity. It is sometimes thought to be matter of wonder that Spain should hav descended from her proud pre-eminence among the nations to what looks like national decrepitude and decay. It need be no matter for wonder at all. During the grim reign of the Roman Catholic Inquisition in Spain, every fresh and vigorous thinker Spain produced was ruthlessly cut off. If the same ruthless policy could be reproduced, for only one generation, in the strongest nation on earth to-day, it would leave the nation wretched, weak, and undone. It would entail a curse under which all the humanity of the future would hav to groan. Thought, and not heroic deeds of arms; thought, and not brilliant deeds of diplomacy; thought is the sacred life-blood of a people. It is the crime of crimes, it is the infamy of infamies, to repress it in any child born of woman. Imagin England for the past fifty years under the ruthless sway of a Spanish Inquisition. Humanity, in that case, would hav had no Darwin, no Huxley, no Tyndall, no Spencer, no Harrison, no Dickens to lash sanctimonious hypocrisy; no Thackeray to teach men that mere conventional virtues were but ill-concealed vices; no Swinburne and Morris to sing, in strains heroically musical, of the sacred rights of man. England, now the toughest nation of this earth, would be turned into a driveling imbecil, tottering in the senility of a dishonored old age to a dishonored death!

Fancy America under such a ruthless sway. Emerson would hav been burnt at the stake on publishing his first heresy, and humanity would hav lost all the ripe, incisiv wisdom of that master amongst the world's philosophers. Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe would long ago hav been racked and tortured to death for having written "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Theodore Parker's visit to earth would hav been made yet more transient for his having presumed to think there could possibly be anything transient in Christianity. Drained of her most heroic blood, deprived of her toughest stamina and fiber, America, even in the time of her youth, would hav fallen into premature old age, and would hav lost all power to solve the weighty governmental and social problems that are before her.

* In an earlier paragraph of his lecture Mr. Applebee said that Train richly deserved punishment for publishing the obscene portions of the Bible. Taking the two utterances together we are unable to determin the precise attitude in which Mr. Applebee stands toward that mixture of "grace" and obscenity, the "holy" scriptures. Did Mr. Train deserve punishment for calling attention to the smut of the Bible, or for simply printing smut, no matter where it came from? And would the act of smuggling a Bible be less a crime than smuggling a copy of Shakspere, on account of the former's alleged divinity? And would Mr. Applebee advise the commission of a crime that supposed good might come? Or is it only sinful to repress his "doxy" expressed in his pet book? or isn't it his pet book? Or do we pay our money for his sermon and take our choice of what he means by what he says?—ED. T. S.

In Union There Is Strength.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: On my return home from the convention and congress, I found the following interesting letter, which I wish you would publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER. If all Liberals held to the same views, what a grand work Liberalism could accomplish. It was gratifying at Cassadaga to see so many important steps taken in that direction. H. L. GREEN.

MODESTO, CAL., Aug. 24, 284.

FRIEND GREEN: With regret I now find that I shall not be able to be present at the two great Liberal conventions that are soon to meet at Cassadaga Lake. Although, at the time of those meetings, I shall be engaged in the monotonous routine duties of the school-room, my sympathies will be with my brethren in those meetings.

I hope and expect that, at those meetings, much good will be accomplished by the uniting of all the Liberal elements upon some well defined, broad, and solid basis. "In union there is strength." It is only by uniting that we can accomplish anything in the way of secularizing our now sadly priest-ridden country, and of elevating to a condition of mental and civil liberty the great masses of our fellow-citizens. Like yourself, I know of no Liberal with whom I will not cheerfully work. I know of no sacrifice, except that of principle, that I will not cheerfully make for the good of our great and noble cause.

As to names, I hav come to love the name that we now bear, "The Liberal League." "The American Secular Union," which has already been proposed, would be an excellent name. To these I will add a name of my own, The True Americans. This name, I think, would be more peculiarly appropriate than any other. We really are the true Americans, and the only true Americans. Every other organization is attempting to lug in and to fix upon the people of this country some foreign and un-American god, some foreign and un-American pope, some foreign and un-American creeds, modes of worship, priestly orders, etc., some foreign and un-American monarchical laws, principles, modes, customs, social distinctions, etc., or something else foreign and un-American. If, then, a new name be selected, I would be glad to hav this chosen. All true Americans could surely unite under this name. But, whatever the name may be, I am with you.

Let the Spiritualists of our ranks, and the Materialists, the prohibitionists and the anti-prohibitionists, the vivisectionists and the anti-vivisectionists, and the pro's and the anti's of every other question, differ all they please in regard to those questions; let them discuss those questions all they please; but let them do this in a spirit of kindness; and let them, as brother soldiers, stand shoulder to shoulder in the great battle which is now pending and in which we must contend against fearful odds for the preservation in America of true American—of true humanitarian—principles.

Yours fraternally, JOHN R. KELSO.

THE Buffalo Express having remarked that the feud between the Catholics and Protestants of Belgium has broken out afresh, the Catholic Union and Times explains that its "esteemed contemporary is mistaken as to the parties in this Belgian strife. The 'feud' is not between Catholics and Protestants, simply because there are no Protestants there." According to this last journal, the trouble is caused by the Freemasons, the devil, and the Infidels, and it pours this drop of oil upon the troubled waters: "Catholics themselvs are much to blame for the unhappy state of things existing in these countries. Why don't they rise up, like men, and assert their rights? Why don't they meet boldness with boldness, defiance with defiance, and blow with blow? Then they would no longor deserve the contemptuous soubriquet of 'sacristy Catholics;' and the little Infidel howling minority would not seek to trample upon them." If we may be allowed, we would suggest that the time has gone by for St. Bartholomews.

Children's Corner.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

A Problem.

Sandy and Ned were brothers;
Ned was older than Sandy;
And they were busy dividing
A stick of peppermint candy.

Ned was earnestly trying
To make the division true,
And he marked the place with a fish-hook,
Where the stick ought to break in two.

But, alas for little Sandy
And his poor painstaking brother!
'Twas a long and short division—
One piece longer than the other.

Ned gravely looked at the pieces,
And their quite unequal length,
And he wrestled with the problem
With all his mental strength.

And, at last, he said: "O Sandy!
I can make it come out right,
If I take the piece that's longest,
And bite off just one bite."

Their four eyes beamed and brightened
At this plan, so very handy,
Of disposing of the problem
And distributing the candy.

So Ned ate the pieces even—
'Twas the simplest way to do it;
And he cheated little Sandy—
And they neither of them knew it.

Rodney's Vacation.

Rodney was a good, honest, straightforward young fellow. He had worked hard all the year, and finally determined to take a vacation. He had fifteen or twenty dollars, extra money, that he thought he could afford to expend in sight-seeing.

"I guess I'll go to New York," he said to Jacob Little; "there's a good deal to be seen in a big city like that."

"Oh, such sights! I've been there and I know all about the city. Now if I could only go with you, I'd show you all over the town—'deed I would," said Jacob.

"Why can't you go?" inquired Rodney.

"Well, to tell the truth, I am just a little short for the time being. I hav only a three-cent piece in my pocket. Now if you could lend me enough to pay my passage, I would go along with you and show you around. I hav friends in the city, and we could both stay with them, so it wouldn't cost you anything for board. I would pay you back as soon as we got to my Uncle Dudley's. He is very rich, Uncle Dudley is—livs in a big house, servants, silver plate, and everything."

Jacob was called rather "wild," and Rodney was doubtful about taking one who was regarded as "rattle-headed" as a companion during his vacation; but Jacob's acquaintance with the city was in his favor, and then he declared he would surely pay back the money as soon as he saw his Uncle Dudley. And, after some hesitation, Rodney agreed to pay Jacob's fare in the cars, provided he would lose no time in refunding the money.

"Oh, if you think I'd cheat ye, I won't go," and Jacob turned away with an offended air.

"I don't think so; no, indeed."

"Sure?"

"Yes, sure."

"Well, I'll go then. When do we start?"

"To-morrow morning, bright and early, first train."

"All right."

The next morning the two travelers started on their trip. Jacob was very jolly, telling stories and singing songs all the way.

Along in the afternoon they arrived in New York.

"Aren't you hungry?" inquired Jacob. "Come, let's go and get a bite."

"We might buy some cookies and apples from that stand yonder to last us till we get to your Uncle Dudley's," suggested Rodney.

"What are ye talking about! My uncle Dudley livs away off, ever so far out, next door to Vanderbilt; and they don't dine till six o'clock, either. And I hope you want something better than those dusty old cookies and wormy apples. Come along to Delmonico's. You're a great fellow, you are, to want to eat street garbage!"

Rodney walked on beside Jacob and said nothing.

At Delmonico's he was so bewildered he could not eat, but Jacob ate enough for both. When he had finished his repast, he nudged Rodney, and whispered that he would hav to pay the bill, for as he had not yet seen his Uncle Dudley, he had, consequently, no money. So Rodney paid for the lunch, which seemed to his unaccustomed eyes rather extravagant.

"Of course you want to see the Brooklyn Bridge—you've read of it, you know, and then we'll take a ride on the elevated railway. Oh, I'll show you around, sonny."

Rodney began to think his money would not hold out a great while, but said little and walked on.

Jacob met several friends, and introduced them to Rodney as "good fellows." Two or three joined them, and volunteered to help Jacob show his friend about the city.

"Don't you want some lemonade?" said one.

"Oh, yes; of course," replied Jacob, and without more ado, Rodney was drawn into a neighboring saloon in a cellar where lights were burning brightly, and a negro was playing an accordion, while two or three flashily dressed girls were laughing and talking loudly to some loungers just outside upon the pavement.

Rodney looked very grave, and said he was not at all thirsty. His remark, however, was unheeded, and in a moment some reddish-colored liquid in a glass was tendered him.

"This is not lemonade," he said, as his heart beat quickly.

"Oh, yes it is," said one of the new acquaintances.

"What makes it so red?"

"There's a stick in it, greenhorn. That's the way we take it here in the city," said Jacob.

Rodney swallowed it, so as not to be called "greenhorn" and appear odd, but he was sorry immediately afterward, for his head swam, and his face began to burn.

"Hav a cigar?" and the new friends, with Jacob, lighted each a cigar, and proceeded to smoke it.

Rodney did not smoke, but he did not want to appear behind the others, and with trembling fingers took one from the box, and, lighting it, commenced smoking.

His head seemed to grow light very fast, and he was glad when the party moved toward the door.

"Here, young man, you havn't paid," shouted the keeper of the saloon.

Rodney looked at Jacob, who nodded and said, "Why don't you pay the man?"

Rodney's hard-earned dollars were beginning to disappear, and he felt as though he wished he had not come to the city; but he paid the bill without a word.

"Don't you want to see Central Park and the Obelisk?" inquired one of the new companions.

"Yes; we must show him that sure," said Jacob.

"And the big cathedral, too," said another. "We can take that in as we go along. It is close by the park, you know. But we can go there to-morrow."

Rodney felt like a fool, and a terrible lump was rising in his throat that seemed like a ball of fire.

They walked along, chatting gaily—the companions did—while Rodney was silent. It was getting toward night, and Rodney was tired and almost sick; so, to oblige him, as they said, the company went into another saloon and rested.

The others had more lemonade with "sticks," but Rodney felt too sick from the effect of the other lemonade, which he declared was "too sticky" for him, and could not be induced to take any more.

It was quite dark when they emerged from the saloon, and Rodney proposed to Jacob that it was time to go and see his Uncle Dudley.

"Oh, it is time enough to see Uncle Dud. We'll go through the Bowery first. Come ahead, boys."

Rodney felt like a sheep led to the slaughter, but followed on, trusting in his companions.

The crowds jostled him, the lights flashed on him, and, oh! how much he wished he was almost anywhere but in his present company.

Presently they paused at the open door of an auction room.

"Come right in, gentlemen," spoke a polite man near the door, "come right in. Here's where you get your bargains! Be-u-tiful gold watches almost given away! gold chains, charms, diamond rings to be had for the asking! Come right along in!"

Rodney's mouth and eyes were wide open, but in he went with his companions.

"Here's your nice gold watch—how much am I bid for this solid gold gent's watch?" shouted the auctioneer. "Five, do I hear? Ten, do you make it?—best workmanship—full jeweled—English lever—best watches in the world—warranted five hundred years!—ten, I hav; ten! ten! ten!—going at ten—who'll gim-me fifteen?—fifteen I hav got!—thank you!—who'll giv me twenty?—twenty dollars I hav got for a handsome, fine gold watch!—twen-ty, twentee—going—going—going at twenty—twentee dollars!—a splendid bargain! twen—twen—twen—twen—twen—twent-ee dollars—going—going—going—going, at twen-tee dollars, a be-au-tiful, el-e-gant, splen-did gold watch worth a hundred and fifty dollars—any man's money—going, going, going—gone!—given away at twent-ee dollars!"

"Step right in the back shop," said a polite appearing man with a pencil behind his ear, to Rodney, tapping him on his shoulder at the same time. "Step right in here, sir, and settle—it's a splendid bargain—nothing like it ever went out of this shop before. This way, please."

Rodney stood aghast.

"What? I did not bid on the watch, sir. You are mistaken."

"Oh, yes you did! No backing out. We saw you nod, and your friend confirmed it."

Rodney looked around for Jacob, but he, as well as his companions, were not to be seen. In another moment Rodney was hurried into the back room and the door locked upon him.

"I did not bid on the watch at all; I did not, truly," he gasped.

"Yes you did—we saw you. You made the last bid, and the watch is yours. Come, hand over the twenty dollars, and quickly, for we cannot stop to dally. We do not like to hav any trouble, or get you locked up. It is a bona fide bargain, and you will never regret your wisdom in making this purchase."

Rodney was speechless for a moment, and very much terrified.

"I—I hav not so much money," he stammered.

"How much hav you?" inquired the man, greedily.

Rodney took out his pocketbook, and found that loose change and all did not amount to more than seven dollars and a quarter.

"Well, we shall hav to hold that sum, with the watch, until you bring us the balance. You can go now." And pocketing the money, pocketbook—which was a new one—and all, the man unlocked the door and permitted Rodney to depart.

Sick, sad, and penniless, Rodney did not know which way to turn, but wandered aimlessly on. He did not know how far he walked, but at length, feeling very much fatigued and sleepy, he lay down near a building that had lately been partially destroyed by fire. He slept two or three short, unrefreshing naps, and then arose and walked about till morning. He remembered during the night that he had an aunt living in Yonkers. She had only seen her once, but he knew she would befriend him when once she learned his story. The next thing was to know how to reach her. He wandered along the piers, and in response to his inquiries, a good-natured man told him he might get a chance to work on the freight, and thus earn a passage to Yonkers on the Albany boat. Following the advice, he sought and obtained work according to direction, and it was not a great while before he found himself in Yonkers, and at the door of his aunt's house.

He related his pitiful story, and found a ready sympathizer in his aunt, and two cousins, Dora and Eva.

They agreed that Jacob was a bad young man, and his "Uncle Dudley" only a myth. The companions were of his own stamp, and they felt relieved that Rodney had got away without falling into greater troubles or disgrace. It was a "mock auction" at which they had left him, and Dora thought there was perhaps some understanding existing between the young men and the auctioneer.

It was a great experience for Rodney, but he learned much wisdom from it, that will serve him all his lifetime.

He remained a week with his aunt and cousins, and made several trips to New York in that time, accompanied by Dora and Eva, and saw the great bridge, the park, obelisk, cathedral, and many other objects of interest. But he did not once catch a glimpse of Jacob Little or his friends.

After he returned home, he took up a paper one day, and, glancing over its columns, he came across the name of Jacob Little. Reading the paragraph relating to him, he found that he was indicted for forgery.

"He will hav to go to prison for that," thought Rodney, "and he may stay there for all I care. I hope he will hav time to reflect on his conduct while he is there," he said aloud.

Thus Jacob Little met the penalty of bad conduct. Rodney is a respected, honorable young man, but he will always be careful how he selects his associates, not only when he takes a vacation, but at all other times.

Dear Miss Wixon: I send you two puzzles. I tried to solve Mr. Juergens's puzzles, but could not; and I send you the following answers: In Children's Corner, Sept. 6th, No. 2. Money; No. 3. Dante; No. 4. Alabama. In Sept. 13th, No. 2. Allegnany. Since I hav read the Children's Corner, I hav noticed that such words as have, give, etc., were spelled without an e. If it is no trouble, would you please tell me the reason why? and oblige

Yours very respectfully,
Robert Bernheim.

[Sometime ago The Truth Seeker adopted the reform method of spelling, and the e is dropped after hav, giv, etc., because it is silent and superfluous.—Ed.]

Braceville, Ill., Sept. 16, 1884.

Dear Miss Wixon: I think you are making the Children's Corner a success, and it is read by old people as well as young. Every week the neighbors' children come in to read the Children's Corner. Braceville is a place of six hundred inhabitants. There are two coal shafts here, and they pile the dirt and soapstone, which they get out of them, in a great pile, which they call dump. A person going up on a dump can see eight or ten miles with the naked eye—can see villages which appear like clusters of toy houses—can see the Diamond shaft where sixty or seventy men and boys lost their lives a year and a half ago. It is about four miles from here. Good-bye.

WAIFS AND WANDERINGS. A new American Story. By Samuel P. Putnam. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents. Published and for sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

Some one has said that the creativ power tried its apprentice hand on man, and that then, having had an opportunity to profit by its mistakes and to avoid imperfections, it forthwith proceeded to produce a woman after an improved model. The first product was, however, at least by the second, considered no mean achievement. Mr. S. P. Putnam, to some extent, followed this distinguished precedent when, having with "apprentice hand" written "Golden Throne," he supplemented it with "Waifs and Wanderings." This latter story, as has been previously intimated, is now published in handsome book form. It is an interesting tale. It relates how one Cupples, an honest tinsmith of an activ and skeptical turn of mind, was made the recipient of a baby which did not come into the family in the regular way; how, when he had grown to love it as the apple of his eye, it was taken from him and forced to undergo vicissitudes of a romantic and interesting character; and how in his endeavors to rescue the child the honest tinsmith developed in himself a manly heroism which neither himself, his wife, nor his friends had ever suspected the existence of. The mother of the little waif is introduced early in the story. She is a woman of strong mind and independent predilections, and serves to usher a character into romance which has not been dealt with by novelists hitherto. The minister is there, of course—a regular Aminidab Sleek—the Rev. George Adolphus Hapgood. Then there is the Shaksperian advocate, Stubbs; the imperturbable Sheriff McGuffum, and the hot-headed Southrons, the Bolton's, father and son, in whom Greek meets Greek; and from the tug of war, the son, being chiefly in the right, naturally emerges in the most creditable manner. Numerous other persons are represented, among whom the good Mrs. Maria Cupples should not fail of mention. The story ends in the triumph and happiness of those in whom the reader has become mainly interested. This is as it should be. There is a meretricious tendency among more recent novelists to crown with defeat and death the careers of their heroes and heroins. George Eliot's "Mill on the Floss" has this fault, and has caused many a reader, no doubt, to wish he had never seen the book. Julian Hawthorne's "Archibald Malmaison" and William Black's "McLeod of Dare" are equally unsatisfactory in this respect. If a novelist owes anything to the public it is this, that if he cannot amuse or instruct his readders, he at least should not distress them. A demand for the horrible in romance shows a morbid taste. That person is fortunate who gets through the real world without observing any of the misery which it is the delight of some story writers to depict; and usually one sees quite enough of the disastrous side of life without going to books to find it. It is a quality greatly to be admired in the present novel that, so far as we are permitted to follow them, the end of its characters is peace.

Enough of the fruit of Mr. Putnam's pen is being laid before the Liberal people, from week to week, for them to judge of the quality of his writing. Every period reveals the vigorous mind from which it proceeds. If "Waifs and Wanderings" contained no narrativ to hold the reader's interest, it would still hav sufficient merit as a literary production to commend it. But this narrativ is not wanting, and therefore the book is in all ways attractiv. Everybody ought to read it.

THE BIBLE ANALYZED. By John R. Kelso. Octavo; 833 pp. Published and for sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. Price $3.

I hav read Kelso's "Bible Analyzed" with a great deal of pleasure and profit. I fancied myself pretty well up on that old book, but I found a great many things in it that never struck me so forcibly as they did when reading this splendid work. I can assure you that it is a book that is bound to sell. I am having demands for it frequently. If the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER only knew its merits, they would, one and all, hav a copy. It is full of inspiration of the right sort—inspiration of truth seeking—and the person who reads it will be thoroughly furnished with every good argument with which to meet error, superstition, and bigotry. Get one. W. S. BELL.

From the Radical Review.

Works of this kind [the "Bible Analyzed"] exposing the absurdities and trivialities of the Christian belief, are multiplying within late years. This latest accession to our anti-Bible literature performs its task most faithfully. The book is destined to do good work in enlightening the minds still benighted by superstition, and is able to giv much valuable information to Liberals. There can be no doubt that the book was written under the conviction that it had a mission to perform, when we read the author's touching account of the almost insurmountable difficulties he met with in executing the task he had set himself to do.

"The Health Miscellany" is the title of a 64-page pamphlet, illustrated, published by Fowler & Wells. It has an attractiv contents, including treatises on "The External Senses," "Back-ache," telling its cause and cure; "Water Treatment of Fever;" something about catarrh, small-pox, and malarial diseases, together with various other interesting topics connected with disease and health. The article on "The External Senses" contains the following somewhat unusual statement, correcting a popular mistake:

"The brains cannot be overworked. They suffer little 'wear and tear,' because of exercise. Being soft and almost fluid, and having no duties but thinking and feeling, their motions are almost as free and frictionless as the drops of water which may toss and tumble forever without injury. It is the nutritiv system that is at fault—the assimilating and disintegrating functions—and not the brain, when a person complains of too much head-work. Let him only keep his vital machinery in order, and he may work his brain to the utmost without harming it."

How to keep the "vital machinery in order", it is the object of this pamphlet to explain, and every reasonable person must admit that its directions to this end are exceptionally valuable. The short articles on how to get fat and how to get lean will claim the attention of many. The illustrations are instructiv and well executed. The price of this pamphlet is 25 cents, and the reader will obtain his money's worth before he has read half of the first essay. Those wishing a copy of "The Health Miscellany" may address THE TRUTH SEEKER office, New York, and the pamphlet will be forwarded by return mail.

"The People's Power; or, How to use the Ballot," is the name under which Simeon Stetson, of San Francisco, has put forth a 64-page octavo pamphlet (price 25 cents) on the inefficacy of the present method of balloting to represent the people. His first proposition is substantially this:

"Suppose there are three parties, and the candidates of two of them receive each one vote less than a third of all the votes cast. The candidate of the third party will, then, be elected, although he has but a fraction (viz., two votes) more than one-third of the whole number of votes polled. Thus he would become the representativ of about one-third instead of all the people."

The idea that a majority of the voters can be represented under the present system, therefore, Mr. Stetson regards as absurd. The reader can draw his own conclusion from the premises laid out in the above extract. Further on, facts and opinions of eminent men are adduced. The proposed substitute to the defectiv scheme now in vogue is given under the head of "Proportional Representation." This, the writer claims, permits persons to be represented all the time, and to exercise a preference as to whom they will vote for; now they must either vote the ticket or throw their votes away. The new way is briefly as follows:

"Suppose there are ten representativs to be elected by 10,000 voters. Divide 10,000 by 10 and the quotient is the quota or number of votes requisit to elect one. Then every body of voters numbering 1,000 can elect one. Each elector is to vote for one candidate only. The state will be the district. At the same time the people can vote by districts whenever they see fit. When, however, they are dissatisfied with the nominations made by their party, and are too few in numbers in any one locality to form a quota alone, they can combine with those in any part of the state to elect whom they please. There will be no compulsory districts. There will be no majority at the ballot-box as regards parties. The vote, then, will merely record the number of representativs each party is entitled to, the names of the various candidates, and, finally, the names of those who are elected."

This scheme, it is claimed, would do away with the great parties, which are deemed a nuisance by the writer. Mr. Stetson has his subject well in hand, and the pamphlet is a thoughtful, ingenious, not to say statesmanlike, production. The questions raised are worthy of discussion.

"Signing the Document, The Laokoon of Labor, Chopping Sand, and Other Essays," are the words printed in grotesque letters on the cover and title page of a pretty little book written by "Wheelbarrow" and published by the Radical Review, of Chicago. It deals with the labor question from the point of view of a man who earns his daily bread by furnishing locomotiv power to a wheelbarrow. As he propelled his unicycular vehicle up an inclined plank and walked back down the same between the handles thereof, he cogitated, and this monogram is the result of his mentations. Nineteen different subjects are dealt with, and the literary ability displayed shows that the writer is either not the hod-carrier he professes to be, or that if he is such he is out of his sphere. The essays are so admirably condensed that a synopsis of them would include them all. "Wheelbarrow" looks beyond trades unions for a solution of labor problems, though he regards organization as the best immediate protection for workingmen. In his preface he advances a thought that all reformers should apply to their own efforts. He says:

"I am glad to know that these essays [originally published in the Radical Review] hav excited some discussion among workingmen, and that satisfies me. It is of no consequence whether they think with me or not. That they are beginning to think at all is in itself a victory."

This is strictly philosophical, and those having the truth to present should take courage from it. When thought is once raised, it will generally settle upon something which it finds by the exercise of reason to be the best and nearest the truth. "Wheelbarrow's" thoughts are upon paper and in the air, and intelligent readers cannot help absorbing the truths he has uttered even in the face of their own prejudices. Workingmen will agree with this writer in most that he has said, and what they cannot indorse they will find worthy of consideration as a valuable criticism of the inconsistencies into which some of them hav fallen. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents. Address this office.

"Persiphone and Other Poems" is the title of a book of Freethought poems by Lizzie May Little, of England. Published by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., London.

"The Devil and Hell—What did they Originally Mean? Has the Signification Changed? Supplemented by a Dream." In this tract of 24 pages, Mr. H. S. Ewell, of Romeo, N. Y., adds a valuable contribution to the literature of the subjects indicated by its title. He shows that an indefinable dread which they did not originally possess has been attached by priests and interested persons to the words "devil" and "hell," and that there is nothing in common between their primitiv significance and the ideas with which the church has associated them, and which superstitious people believe them to represent. Price, 10 cents.

In "The Manual Training School for All the People," an octavo pamphlet of 12 pages, Mr. Augustus Jacobson proposes that the $65,000,000 annual revenue from whisky and tobacco be spent in the public schools in giving the youth of the country a proper education. The manual training school is defined to be the ordinary school with instruction in the use of tools added thereto. The more schoolmasters, says Mr. Jacobson, the fewer policemen. The school tax is the annual insurance premium against lawlessness and crime. Teaching the trades in the schools, it is very sensibly claimed, would giv the pupil an opportunity for such experiment as would determin for which trade he is best fitted. An elevation of labor, the writer feels sure, would result. The pamphlet is sold for ten cents. Address this office.

A valuable book of reference is "Ogilvie's Handy Book of Useful Information," price 25 cents in paper, 50 in cloth, and for sale at this office. It contains statistical tables of practical value to most people, being political, historical, biographical, geographical, numismatical, and otherwise packed with information. The flexible covers and rounded corners of the 25-cent edition admit of its being conveniently carried in the pocket.

Messrs. Fowler and Wells are prolific publishers. The latest book from their press is issued under the title of "The Man Wonderful in the House Beautiful," an allegory teaching the principles of physiology and hygiene and the effects of stimulants and narcotics. It is designed for home reading, and also for schools as a text-book. It has two authors, husband and wife—Chilion B. Allen, A.M., LL.B., M.D., and Mary A. Allen, A.B., M.D., both members of the Broome County (N. Y.) Medical Society. In the allegory the human body is the "house beautiful," and its inhabitant the "man wonderful." The reader is conducted through the various rooms of the "house," each apartment being described, and thus he is taught anatomy, physiology, and hygiene, with practical applications and suggestions. The inhabitant of the house—the "man wonderful"—concerning whose identy and destiny there is much incertitude—is next introduced to the reader, and his development and history from babyhood to maturity are traced. The prohibition question is incidentally raised and the conclusion arrived at that liquor should be suppresed by law, and that only fermented wine should be used in communion. This final settlement of these burning questions, however, does not detract from the value of the book so far as it deals with the subjects mainly under discussion, and perhaps a perusal of it will teach more in less time than the reading of any other work on similar topics. The work contains 370 pages, is illustrated, and sells at this office for $1.50.

A TRIO OF MODERN REVELATIONS.

"The Three New Religions" is a term that I trust you will indulge me in using in calling attention to three new dispensations, the first two of which are claimed as direct revelations from the spirit spheres.

The first, called "the Fraternity of the White Cross, is a descent from heaven, and is a duplicate of a society corresponding to it in the spirit-world. Its work is to be the natural way for general co-operation, instead of individualization of the human. It is not handed down by any one man like Zoroaster, Jesus Christ, or Joseph Smith, but is presented by the spirit-world for co-operativ work in the great reforms of the day." And yet there is one medium, who "is the first to announce the Association of Societies in the spirit-world, and from there it is announced that a new church is to be established on earth." The above extracts are from the report of a meeting at Onset Bay, Aug. 11th, published in the Religio-Philosophical Journal Aug. 23d. Mrs. J. Willis Fletcher is the evangel of this new dispensation on earth, so says an exchange, which maketh it to appear that it is to be administered with a "Thus saith the Lord" (spirits), though through a woman instead of a man.

The second new religion has already been introduced to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 30th, in an able editorial review of "The Tae" (the creed), and of "Oahspe" (the new Bible), given by divine inspiration through Mr. Newbrough, of New York.

The third has been also introduced to the TRUTH SEEKER readers, Aug. 9th, in an article from the Philosophical Enquirer, Madras, India, and in an interesting letter from India Aug. 30th, and is the mysterious Theosophical Society, founded by Madam H. P. Blavatsky, in New York city, in 1875, with Col. Olcott for president.

My purpose has been in this review to call attention to a fact that all must admit, viz., that these new religions and all religions that preceded them must agree in their inception, methods, administration, and priesthood: first, the claim of inspiration from some god, spirit, or supernatural source; second, mystery as to its mode of transmission and all that pertains to it; third, a sanctum sanctorum, or holy of holies, into which none but the priest, prophet, or medium could enter; and, fourth, this priest, prophet, or medium is invariably the individual through whom the revelation came, who becomes the founder of the new dispensation, like Moses, Jesus, Mohammed, George Fox, Ann Lee, Joe Smith, or our new oracles in these three new religions. A religious caste, monopoly, or oligarchy is thus created, bought up by the laity paying tithes and obeisance to these inspired moguls, who make themselvs the great head-centers of these institutions. Beware of all such clap-traps, that need inspired men and women to come between the people and their (god) duty. Even the great Pantarch in his Universology has fallen into the same error (see TRUTH SEEKER, Aug. 2d), and I fear I shall hav to add his Universology as the fourth dispensation, the grand annex to the preceding three. Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. MR. BENNETT was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

CHRONIC DISEASES

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to the same plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Gems of Thought.

THE population of the world is made up of a heterogeneous mass of humanity, and with the thousands of years that hav rolled away since man has dwelt on the earth the race is yet far from what it should be; there is not that spirit of love and kindness between man and man that should be sacredly cherished. This is because the spirit of love has not been cultivated and fostered as much as it should be; the more animal part of man's nature has governed him; his aim has been to rule over his fellow-men, to subdue them to his wishes, and to appropriate to his own use the fruits of their labors.—D. M. Bennett.

As nothing is annihilated in the material world, so nothing can be annihilated in the spiritual.—Cerenos.

THERE are some old Scottish institutions which hav retained their vitality and are apparently in very good repair. The Caledonian "Sawbath," I believe, still flourishes, and I am told that in Edinburgh and Aberdeen it may be observed in high perfection. I had a glimps of it only in the country, where it was mitigated by the charming scenery, which remained persistently and profanely bright. But it was very ugly; it was grotesquely ugly. There was a horrible little kirk on a windy hillside, equally naked without and within—except, indeed, as regards such internal warmth as was supplied by the deportment of a rustic congregation listening in almost voracious silence and immobility to a doctrin addressed to violent theological appetites. My host had recommended me to attend this service (which was an excellent example of grim Presbyterianism) for local color's sake; and certainly the little exhibition was very complete. The strange compound produced in the sermon by the profusion of Jewish names and of Scotch accents; the air of doctrinal vigilance on the part of the cautious, dry-faced auditory; the crude, nasal singing; the rapid dispersal afterward, over the stony hillsides to their rugged little cottages, of a congregation for which this occasion represented the imaginativ side of life, as if the nativ granit had given it out and had immediately reabsorbed it—all this had at least a character of its own.—An American Traveler in Scotland, 1879.

IT is not by turning over libraries, but by repeatedly perusing and intently contemplating a few great models, that the mind is best disciplined.—Macaulay.

I DEMAND for every man, whatever be his opinion, that he shall be able to speak out with honest frankness the result of his honest thought, without forfeiting his rights as citizen, without destroying his social position, and without troubling his domestic peace. We hav not to-day the scourge and the rack, the gibbet and the stake, by which men's bodies are tortured to improve their souls, but we hav the scourge of calumny and the rack of severed friendship; we hav the gibbet of public scorn and the stake of a ruined home, by which we compel conformity to dogma, and teach men to be hypocrits that they may eat a piece of bread. The spirit is the same, though the form of the torture be changed; and many a saddened life, and many a wrecked hope, bear testimony to the fact that religious liberty is still but a name, and freedom of thought is still a crime.—Mrs. Annie Besant.

YET much remains
To conquer still; peace hath her victories
No less renowned than war; new foes arise
Threatening to bind our souls with secular chains;
Help us to save free conscience from the paw
Of hireling wolves, whose gospel is their maw.
—Milton.

I WHYLES claw the elbow o' troublesome thought,
But man is a sodger and life is a fought (fight);
My mirth and good humor are coin in my pouch,
And my freedom's my landship nae monarch dare touch.
A towmond o' trouble, should that be my fa',
A night o' guid fellowship sowthers it a';
And at the blythe end of our journey at last,
Wha the de'il ever thinks o' the road he has past?
—Burns.

I HOLD that the wealth of mankind is morally a common store; that we are morally bound to increase it as much, and to waste it as little, as we can; that of the two it is happier to be underpaid than to be overpaid, and that we shall all find it so in the sum of things.—Goldwin Smith.

IT is in the Old Testament that the process of disengagement and the growth of a moral out of a cer emonial religion are most distinctly seen:

Wherewith shall I come before Jahveh,
And bow myself before God on high?
Shall I come before him with burnt offerings,
With the sacrifice of calves of a year old?
Will Jahveh be pleased with thousands of rams,
With ten thousands of rivers of oil?
Shall I giv my firstborn for my transgression,
The fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?
He hath showed thee, O man, what is good,
And what Jahveh doth require of thee;
What but to do justly, to love mercy,
And to walk humbly with thy God?

Here, no doubt, is a belief in the efficacy of sacrifice, even of human sacrifice, even of the sacrifice of the firstborn. But it is a receding and dying belief, while the belief in the power of justice, mercy, humility, moral religion, in short, is prevailing over it and taking its place.—Goldwin Smith.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,
WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain
Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,
Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Odds and Ends.

"LISTEN, my boy," said the nurse; "the good God has brought you a little brother." "Oh! I'm so glad. Does mamma know it?"

IT is reported that a dozen young women are taking a tramp through the Catskill mountains. The tramp must be having a pretty good time.

"YOUR manner is very shocking," said the lady to the tramp. "Ah," replied the tramp, "you noticed it, did you? That's my personal magnetism."

LULU HURST, Georgia's "electric girl," has married a Paul Atkinson. She will now hav an opportunity to test her wonderful magnetic powers. If, a year hence, she is able to draw her husband home from the lodge before midnight, no one will question her phenomenal strength.

"HUGGING societies" hav been introduced into Missouri to swell the church treasuries. The hugs range in price from twenty-five cents to two dollars. This may be considered something new in Missouri, but for years churches here hav found it a "tight squeeze" to keep their treasuries provided with cash.

MISS B.—"How horribly hot it was last Sunday!" Mr. B.—"Hot! I nearly froze." "Why, where were you?" "In Boston." "But the papers said the hot wave extended all over the country. You must hav been in an icehouse." "Oh, no; I went to church." "To church?" "Yes, and got by mistake into a highly respectable Bostonian's family pew."

"A LARGE soap factory has failed in Columbus, Ohio." "Well, you know what is the reason of it, don't you?" "No." "A revival to raise money for the South Sea Islanders has been going on for several months among the ladies, and, as they hav no time to wash their children, the demand for soap has fallen off. There has been an over-production of soap and missionary zeal—that's all."

"WALL, ef dat wa'n't de plam'est caper I eber seed," exclaimed an old negro who sat on the bank of a bayou, fishing. "What's the matter?" some one asked. "W'y, sah, jis' now my dog he cummed erlong an' laid down at my feet, an' jis' dis minnit er alligator he slips up an' grabs de dog an' takes him erway. De imperlitis trick I eber seed. Min's me o' a nigger preacher at er barbecue."

A MUSICAL friend was talking to a negro porter the other day. The darkey said: "I h'ar yo' play de fiddle?" "Yes, I make my living by it?" "I used to sorter take after the music bizness myself, but I done left off since I joined the Mef'dis church." "Indeed?" "Yes; yo' see, I used to wuk a banjo for all it was wuff; but I jess foun' out dat ef I wuked de banjo, I'd hev to drap de Mef'dis church. Yo' see, salvation an' banjos don't hitch, somehow."

"MY dear," said the King of Denmark to his spouse, the mother of Hamlet, "you needn't giv it away, but I poured moulten lead into my brother's ear while he was sleeping in the orchard, and that's the kind of sea serpent that stung him." "You don't say so?" said the queen. "I hav said so, so please don't say that I don't say so. Yes, I poured a bulletmouldful into his ear. It was a capital joke. Do you know what his last words were as he went off?" "I do not." "They were: 'I didn't know I was loaded.'"

BORIOBOOLA GHA.—A PLEA.

With war-club dented and worn,
With ear-rings heavy as lead,
An African sat on a leopard-skin mat,
With a battered chapeau on his head.
Slay! Slay! Slay!
With a scymetar forged in Jaffa.
Somewhat over the bay, he trolled the lay,
Of Boriboola Gha.

Slay! Slay? Slay!
When the tropical sun is high,
Slay! Slay! Slay!
When the desert is parched and dry.
It is hard to weave and spin,
'Neath a brute employer's heel,
But we poor cannibals stake our lives
In pursuit of a daily meal.
Slay! Slay! Slay!
Till the brain begins to swim.
Slay! Slay! Slay!
Till the ax-head's glitter is dim.
Fantee, Kaffir, and Kroo,
Krooman, Kaffir, and Fan.
And in dreams I recommence the fight
Where in morning I first began.

Benevolent men of the land
Where a different diet thrives,
Neither dinners nor suppers you send to me,
But the price of human lives.
Slay! Slay! Slay!
With a scymetar forged in Jaffa.
I secure at a blow a feast and a foe
To Boriboola Gha.

Slay! Slay! Slay!
My labor is never through.
And what are its wages? Some tinsel beads
And a Birmingham idol or two,
A scrap of English clay-sized cloth,
A hut that a toad would stifle,
And an old smooth-bore that the dealer swore
Was a Martini-Henry rifle.

Oh! for an idol of bronze,
This clay one my vision affronts.
Oh! for some fun with a Gatling gun
That would kill twenty niggers at once!
To criminals, paupers, and tramps
You are never weary of giving,
Please to remember a cannibal king
Who has to kill men for a living.

With war-club dented and worn,
With ear-rings heavy as lead,
An African sat on a leopard-skin mat,
With a battered chapeau on his head
Slay! Slay! Slay!
With a scymetar forged in Jaffa.
Somewhat over the bay, he was trolling a lay,
And spearing each nativ who came in his way
Of Boriboola Gha.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Notes and Clippings.

M. RENAN, the noted French author and Freethinker, is seriously ill.

THE Methodist church of Iowa has formally come out for St. John for president.

CZAR ALEXANDER is an incessant smoker of cigarets. The Nihilists should now be satisfied.

EVANGELIST MOODY announces that he will start a revival in Virginia. The home of Mahone should prove receptiv soil for the Christian scheme of moral readjustment.

ROBERT BONNER of the Ledger unfortunately was paragraphed as having given a bell to a western church. Immediately a hundred bells were applied for by begging letters.

IT would seem as if religions were dying out in China, judging from the fact that a large number of temples in Foo-Chow are leased by the priesthood to Europeans for dwelling or business purposes.

DISCOVERED among the ruins of the Zuni and Aztec cities are spindles and whorls remarkably like those employed by the Highlanders in Scotland. The position of some would indicate an antiquity of at least 2,000 years.

THE Episcopal church for this diocese refused, at its late session, to interfere with gambling when disguised as a church fair, though a lay attendant said that it was contrary to state laws. Nice teachers of morality, these!

HANS MAKART, the illustrious painter, is dead. As Comstock at one time suppressed a painting by this artist, it is now in order for him to place Mr. Makart among his victims, and to claim that the world is better off without him.

EMPEROR WILLIAM, of Germany, nearly ninety years old, is now so feeble that his early demise is looked for at Berlin, and its consequences canvassed. He is unable to sit on horseback, and can only witness reviews from his carriage seat.

IN a Western paper we find the statement that an agent for a new force-pump went to a town out there and asked the editor where he could find the "superintendent of the water works." The editor sent him to the pastor of the Baptist church.

REV. DR. RANKIN, of the Congregational church at Washington, permitted a colored Sunday-school class to meet in the basement of his church. This action raised a storm of wrath among the church officials, and the doctor was compelled to resign.

Two burglars had ransacked the house and secured every portable thing of any value. While passing through the pantry, one of them picked up a piece of cold meat and was about to eat it. "Whist, Pat!" said the other warningly, "av yez fergot phat day it is?" "Be jabbers," said Pat, dropping the meat, "Oi had; it's Friday marnin'."

SOME of the religious papers in Massachusetts are discussing the question, "Should ministers wear mustaches?" Mr. Robert Burdette, the jester, thinks it is the minister's duty to society to wear so much as that, at least, and in the great cities where society is more coldly artificial and formally exacting, he might, with commendable worldly wisdom, add a vest and a pair of trousers, especially as the season advances.

THE Religion of Humanity seems to be taking practical shape as a religion in some quarters. At the late Positivist service in memory of Auguste Comte, says the Herald, Dr. Congreve commenced his prayer thus: "We praise thee, humanity, as for all thy servants, so especially for Auguste Comte; and we pray that, in proof of our gratitude, we may become thy more willing and complete servants." At the conclusion of the service the following benediction was pronounced: "The peace of her slowly dawning kingdom be upon you, the blessing of humanity abide with you, now and forever."

THE Boston Traveler givs a hint that may show why missionaries were once welcome to foreign shores. It says, "Later on the demand for New England rum from the ports of the Mediterranean was immense, and there was scarcely a vessel left the port of Boston for Smyrna whose cargo did not consist principally of New England rum. Smyrna at that time was the principal objectiv point for missionaries seeking fields of labor in Asia."

IT is estimated by the Hartford Times that the numerous Bible societies hav, in the aggregate, during the past thirty-four years, printed 290,000,000 copies of the Hebrew scriptures, or one for every family in the world. Having now furnished everybody with a Bible, it should be the next duty of these societies to devote their income to hiring people to read it. The result, however, would in all likelihood be very different from what they desire.

LIGHTNING struck a Florida man the other day in the side, ran down his leg to the knee, forked and burnt two streaks to the sole of his foot. After leaving him it hunted up a can of powder, which it exploded, and then knocked a sick man out of bed. The latter found himself cured of the chills when he recovered from the surprise, and the other fellow is none the worse of the lightning trick. The house, however, is a total wreck from the powder explosion.

THE typical total abstainer is described by the London Times as a person of inferior physical development, and not remarkable for intellectual power. Smallness of body and mind characterize him; he is easily led by his emotions, or by what he fancies to be eloquence; he is ready to take up any idea pressed upon him with sufficient volubility; and, in short, the same causes make of him a teetotaler, an anti-vaccinator, and an anti-vivisectionist. The Times does not know what it is talking about.

BISHOP GILMOUR, of Cleveland, Ohio, prints a card in which he insists that Mr. Cowles, editor of the Leader, denied his daughter freedom of conscience in the exercise of her religion, and declares that, while withdrawing the charge of inhuman and brutal treatment, he reaffirms that freedom of conscience was denied. Mr. Cowles is the genius whom the New York Sun has immortalized as the only true hebetudinous crank. Bishop Gilmour has not as yet been classified, but he is an interesting specimen for the contemplation of the naturalist.

OLD tales are taking on new versions; the following for instance: Damocles, the Sicilian sybarite, being particularly fond of the pleasures of the table, the tyrant Halicarnassus did not fail to invite him to a sumptuous banquet, at the beginning of which he called his priest's attention to the fact that just above his head was a sword suspended by a single hair. So profoundly possessed was Damocles with the apprehension that the hair might at any moment fall into his soup, that he was utterly unable to enjoy any of the rich viands provided for his delectation.

PREPARATIONS are being made in Manchester England, to celebrate the twenty-first anniversary of the Wholesale Co-operativ Society. This concern was made a part of the retail co-operativ system because private tradesmen united and informed wholesale dealers that they would cease to buy of them if they sold goods at the same rates to co-operators. Thus forced to defend themselvs, the promoters of the system devised the plan of doing their own wholesale business, and a central store was founded at Manchester, with capital supplied by a large number of the retail organizations. Friends of the movement point out that in twenty-one years the members of the societies hav increased sevenfold; their capital seventeenfold, and their profits twelvefold; and that with this ratio of increase, the first years of the coming century will see the whole of the working classes of England interested in associations which will hav the staple trades under their control. The Wholesale Co-operativ Society has purchased depots in this country and on the continent of Europe. It owns buildings and steamers, and carries on a banking department.

A CHINESE pamphlet recently circulated in Hong Kong against the Christian mission work, affirms that Europeans do not belong to the human race, but are descended from monkeys. "This race of wild beings," it alleges, "worships neither the heavens nor the earth; they do not honor their parents nor hav respect for their forefathers. They come into China under the pretense of preaching a religion, but really come to take the eyes and the brains of dying people, and the blood of children. With these they make medical pills which they sell in their country, and in this manner secure shrewdness." If the Chinese are superstitious enough to believe these remarkable statements, they hav but a slight transition to undergo in order to become Christians.

THE way of the presidential candidate is hard. Even Mrs. Belva Lockwood is now learning the truth of this text by sad experience. It is true that as yet the political slanderer has been able to do her but little harm. He began his nefarious work promptly after her nomination by publishing the hideous falsehood that her back hair was not her own original hair. Several ministers thereupon wrote letters saying that in order to preserve the sanctity of the American comb they should be reluctantly compelled to withhold their votes from a woman whose hair was not sincere and truthful.—New York Times. The irony of the Times is not out of place considering the disagreeable conspicuousness which some clergymen are giving themselvs in this campaign. When questions of morality are being discussed the average minister is not useful as a debater. He should seek the retiracy of retreat, and, according to his inherent gracefulness, become an ornament to seclusion.

THE funny men of the press will never cease slandering the Boston woman, in spite of the fact that she is the schoolma'am of the world. The New York Herald is responsible for this story: As the car swung into Madison avenue from Forty-second street, two ladies got aboard. One of them wore glasses and that intellectual contraction of the eyebrows peculiar to the ladies of the Hub. With the true Boston instinct, she began talking about books and authors. "You hav read 'Jane Eyre,' of course?" said her companion. "Oh, yes," said the intellectual lady from Boston, "I hav read all her works, and like them so much!" The other lady coughed behind her handkerchief, and then asked, with a twinkle in her eye, "Hav you ever read any of 'Daniel Deronda's' novels?" "Yes, indeed," said the Boston lady, "all of them. But do you know, I think he is almost too analytical." "How do you like 'Adam Bede's' writings?" asked the New Yorker. "Oh, they are lovely. But don't you think they are a little shallow?" "I hav never read them," said the other, behind her fan. The lady from Boston cast a look of pity on her illiterate companion, and the two got off the car at Sixty-first street.

A GOOD story is going around about a Cincinnati minister. He is a vegetarian of the strongest order, and in the course of his pastoral career he was invited out to a Sunday dinner by one of the sisters of his flock named Brown. Old man Brown didn't go to church that morning. His wife told him to expect her to bring company home to dine, and he, with the aid of the cook, laid the foundation for a superb repast. Mrs. Brown came home, but all the company she brought was the minister. They were seated at the table when this sort of conversation ensued: "Mr. Jones," meaning the minister, "what part of the chicken do you like best?" "Really, Mr. Brown, I don't care about any chicken." "Well, here is some extra fine roast beef; try some of this." "Excuse me, Mr. Brown, I will forego the beef." "I hav some tender lamb here; how will that suit?" "I never eat lamb." "Well, now, I know you can't refuse this boiled ham." "Pardon me, but ham I never touch." During all this time Brown's father, an old, gray-haired sinner, had been seated near him watching operations, and standing it as long as he could, squeaked out in a piping voice, "John, maybe the damned fool will suck a raw egg." The enjoyment of that dinner is said to hav been practically dissipated.

AN alleged Anarchist on trial at Berne, Switzerland, last week, declared that he was in the employ of the Berlin police, and his function was to incite Anarchists to commit outrages which would lead to their expulsion from the country. His statement has been confirmed.

A DYNAMITE scare was produced in London last Saturday by the discovery of a piece of unexplainable mechanism in the Guildhall. Subsequent investigation showed that it was an electrical apparatus used in putting up telephones, and had been carelessly left where it was found, by a workman. The scare then subsided.

MR. BLAINE is journeying through Ohio doing political work; Gen. Butler is further west stumping for the People's party; Gov. Cleveland has been receiving gratifying ovations from the Democrats of this state; and Mr. Hendricks gets overwhelming audiences in Virginia. Other candidates are getting in their work, and the political pot boils hilariously.

COURTLANDT PALMER addressed the meeting of a Butler and West club of this city one evening last week. He said the People's party was based on the principle to love your neighbor as yourself, and on the Declaration of Independence, which, in guaranteeing life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, guaranteed also to labor the results of its toil. Mr. Palmer favors Gen. Butler's candidacy.

RABBI BROWNE continues the agitation in favor of the Hebrew children being allowed to remain from school on Atonement day without receiving demerit marks. He wishes to place the children and the day on an equality with Catholics and Good Friday. The rabbi is on the wrong track. He should work for the abolishment of Good Friday as a legal holiday instead of seeking to introduce another. If he regards atonement as of more value than education, let him take his choice without grumbling.

A MAN was in court in this city one day last week with a charge against a lodge of Odd Fellows of having abused him in the course of initiation. He was on crutches, and had contusions on his head. He testified that members of the lodge had blindfolded him, fastened a chain around his body, and hoisted him to the ceiling. While in this position he had been struck from behind, causing his head to strike violently against a stool. He was then let down suddenly to the floor, and sustained internal injuries which, the doctors said, might yet prove fatal. They then led him around in chains and cap. The members of the lodge admit these statements, but say the man is a fraud, and they treated him accordingly.

The New Land Projects.

They who are speculating on a change from fee simple to leases from government, in the tenure of the soil, hav free scope in the region of ideas. It costs them nothing to suppose an honest government and impartial land agents who shall execute their theoretical conceptions faithfully. We may fairly infer that they hav put the best foot foremost, and made the statements they believe most congenial either to our common sense of justice, or to the interest of actual farmers. For the sake of meeting these innovators on a possible common ground, I will allow with Mr. Riley, in the June number of Truth, "the assumption that the government has ceased to be a tool of the usurers—has ceased to pay interest, abolished all sinecure offices, and that its work is wholly for the good of the people."

Only I must ask, who is to be judge of this goodness? And for what part of the people? Without imputing sinister intentions to the new school of land reformers, I propose to show the unequal bearing and the dangerous fallacies of the tenure by state or government lease. I call this scheme the new school, in contradistinction to that which inscribes on its banner "the inalienable homestead," leaving the individual free to merge his title during life in a collectiv or corporativ ownership, but not to alienate it from his family or legal heirs. The old school of land reform and the new school agree upon the principle of limiting the areas held, whether in fee simple or in lease, of discountenancing speculation in land, and of requiring actual settlement and improvement.

Writing in the San Francisco organ of State Socialism, Mr. Riley has no hesitation in compelling, by United States authority, the change of tenures. He is careful, moreover, to assure present owners that "government, in undertaking the stewardship of the land, will pay the present so-called 'owners' thereof, a fair valuation price in greenbacks." Now the issue of these greenbacks (credit money) being discretionary with the government, a billion costs it no more than one dollar. There cannot therefore be the least difficulty in paying loyal citizens well provided with faith in Uncle Sam. And the farmers so paid are to retain, if they like, as government tenants, their old properties, or such portion of them as may not exceed the statute of limitations for actual settlers.

Mr. Riley cheers us, moreover, with the assurance that "the rent we should hav to pay would be less than the taxes and rates we had previously paid!" He adds that all taxes and rates will be abolished, the land rental alone sufficing for the expenses of government.

Mr. H. Royer, in the Radical Review, June 28th, advocating Henry George's scheme, takes the same ground, though less couleur de rose; not so explicit on all points. He adds that "the rents are to be paid annually in advance, and that while the individual improvements of a farmer shall not be taxed, yet the rent shall be raised every five or ten years in proportion to increase of market value resulting from improvements around him."* Observe what a nice discrimination, so easy in theory, so difficult in practice, is hereby attributed to the government land officer. Let us suppose him infallible, and proceed to state a case. I, who now hold my estate in fee simple, would then hold it on lease at the discretion of the land agents. I occupy 76 acres and pay $2 tax. I support myself without much to do with markets, raising only fruit, wine, and such stock as pleases me without enslaving me. Completion of a railroad and thicker settlement around me, would quickly raise the valuation of my tract ten or a hundred fold. I should then hav to pay ten or one hundred times as much rent, and to do this, would hav to renounce all my tastes, all my personal liberty, and drudge for the market; but as my advanced age and incapacity to provide for hireling labor render these impossible, I should be forthwith expropriated, to make room for a "worthier use," as Mr. Royer says, and pauperized. Now, it would be an easy matter for capitalists controling improved farm machinery, steam ploughs, etc., or starting factories, to increase so suddenly and so enormously the market value of the farms adjacent, as to determin the expropriation of all the small farmers now independent, but whose means would not allow them to employ the machinery, or hire the labor, necessary to pay their increased rent. Thus, even supposing no unfairness on the part of the land agents, and the large capitalists, like others, to be restricted to a given area of actual occupation, they may, by the concentration of labor and skill with machinery, on that area, as effectivly monopolize the soil, under government leases, to hired laborers in their employ, as if they openly bought out the small farmer, or extruded him under cover of liens or mortgages. Actually, I hav interested motivs for well-wishing to my more prosperous neighbor, whose improvements react advantageously on my property; but under the rental scheme proposed, I should dread his improvements as entailing my ruin. This scheme is perfectly assorted with cutthroat competition, with might makes right, and the exclusiv law of the market. Only the richest, the smartest and most driving, could survive under it. It would accelerate the reign of financial feudalism, and render the independent yeoman impossible. First slaves to the state, under high-pressure rents, no industry or skill, without great resources of capital, could long pay such rents as capital, using equal industry and skill, can afford to pay; and the farmer, in consequence ousted, would hav no other choice than to surrender his personal liberty to the capitalist as a proletary.

Another aspect of this proposed innovation is the necessary increase of government offices and patronage. The land officer of a district would hold there authority and influence incomparably greater than any civic function at present, unless the high judiciary. And if, to avoid arbitrary personal preferences, questions of rent were referred to juries, the cost of the system would be greatly increased, or less business would be done, and vexatious delays incurred, all of which would react in raising the rents, from which such expenses must be liquidated. The cumbrous mechanism of a state is, at best, a vicious circle, as compared with the free play of personal energies. Only fit to foster privilege, when it attempts justice, it givs infinitesimal results at exaggerated costs. It is the dynamization of How not to do it. All we need of government, for the use of the soil, is—Hands off. Let Labor, untrammeled, assert its own rights. Occasional wrongs may be looked for under any system, or without system, but they are general and permanent only where governments forbid the individual to right himself.

Is it necessary to remark that a diet of greenbacks is not absolutely nutriticus, and that no amount of government credit will keep its office-holders fat without roast beef and plum pudding, that somebody must work for?

The two systems of landholding hav distinctiv social and religious correlations. To the Inalienable Homestead attach the sentiment of the family, of the association of childhood and of personal proprietorship, involving many labors of love, and values purely esthetic. To the Government Lease attach the exclusiv subordination of all sentiments to the money standard, and the continual enforcement on the mind of that uncertain and transitory tenure of human affairs, which teaches man to regard himself as but a waif upon the earth. In their bearings on the soil itself, the Inalienable Homestead favors permanent improvements, even at the cost of immediate profits; whereas the Government Lease compels the average renter to skin the soil, and otherwise push for immediate profits, in order to swim with the rising tide of rents consequent upon the application of machinery to agriculture on a scale hitherto unprecedented. It is true that in the race for profits he must lag fatally behind his better-equipped neighbor, but he may hold out long enough to desolate the country, bared of forests, and the cream of its soil washed into the ocean. Under the commercial facilities afforded by steam, this process is going about a hundred times as rapidly as in previous generations, and peace becomes almost as destructiv as war to the radical resources of nature. To the facil transportation of crops hav been added the facility of emigration, and temptation presented by large tracts of rich, open land. The sentiment of the home and of personal property in the soil that we cultivate has thus become very much enfeebled in America, and the habits of superficial work consequent hav prepared for the acceptance of a superficial tenure on the soil, against which the sturdy old yeoman or French peasant proprietor would fight to the death.

The religious considerations are of two orders, bearing on the solidarity of the individual with the collectiv life at any given period, and on the solidarity of man in his generations, present, past, and future. The Inalienable Homestead, which harmonizes with the latter, is favorable to the former, as the sentiment of personal dignity and of a permanent stake in the country favors patriotism.

The Government Lease system also contemplates a sort of solidarity; it is that of dependency, and attaches the individual to the state, as a tenant to his landlord. It ignores the higher forms of solidarity.

Hitherto, capital, controling in Great Britain the votes of its landless dependents in the agricultural districts, as well as of its factory wagelings, has in the United States controled only the latter.

Now, if leasing farmers become dependents on the graces of the United States land officers by the discretion exercised in the appraisement of their tenures, these officers, vowed by their offices to support the ruling party, will control a great number of farmers' votes. It will then become so much the easier for capitalists to control the elections. Many will themselvs administer the land offices, while the poorer land officers will be more readily influenced than a much greater number of independent farmers.

Finally, the advocates of the new tenure by state lease giv great prominence to the motiv of escaping the oppression of monopoly. I hav shown by what indirect means monopolists may defeat its provisions. Moreover, the Inalienable Homestead, while constituting in itself a partial bulwark against the encroachment of monopolists, is perfectly consistent with other prohibitory forces, whether legislativ or resulting from spontaneous agreement among farmers. The limitation of areas to personal occupancy is equally consistent with either form of tenure, the fee simple or the lease, though the lease affords greater facilities for baffling it. EDGEWORTH.

Cannibalism.

I hav recently heard a good deal of horror expressed because of the cannibalism said to hav been resorted to in their dire extremity of starvation by certain members of the Greely party. To me, also, the thought of this terrible deed brings a feeling of horror. And yet, having myself experienced the maddening pangs of extreme hunger, I can look with a good deal of allowance upon those who commit the deed, as did the parties in question, in the insanity of starvation. There is a form of cannibalism, however, which is extensivly practiced throughout all Christendom, upon which I cannot look with any such allowance, it not being practiced under any dire necessity. I refer to that form which is practiced almost weekly by the well-dressed and well-fed crowds that throng those gorgeous bazars of fashion, superstition, bigotry, and intolerance called churches, cathedrals, etc.

As you are doubtless well aware, these crowds are wont, in a public and ostentatious manner, to eat the flesh and to drink the blood of an executed person called Jesus. Though they claim that this person's spirit was a god, they all admit that his body was human, the god, as such, not having any body; and, since the eating of human flesh and the drinking of human blood constitute cannibalism, these parties are, undeniably, cannibals.

The only question that can arise in regard to this matter is as to the genuinness of the flesh and blood consumed on these occasions. That they really are the genuin flesh and blood of Jesus we hav the positiv and oft-repeated testimony of over 200,000 priests. And now, are these 200,000 priests all outrageous liars and impostors, or are over 200,000,000 of Christians all cannibals? If all these priests are outrageous liars and impostors, can anything good come from their influence? If, on the other hand, they be truthful men, and the wholesale cannibalism in question be genuin, can any good come of so horrible a practice? In any view of the case, is not the practice a degrading one? Since the eaters and drinkers fully believe the flesh and the blood to be genuin portions of the body of Jesus, is not their moral nature as much affected by the devouring of these things as it would be if they had the body of Jesus before them and were to eat flesh cut directly from his body, and to drink blood taken directly from his veins? Will some one of these cannibal priests please rise and explain? JOHN R. KELSO.

In the Beginning.

From the Spectator.

August, year unknown; time, six o'clock in the morning;
Sate in a tree, an Ape; irrational; eating an apple,
Raw; no cook as yet, no house, no shred of a garment;
Soul, a blank; taste, nil; a thumb but slowly beginning;
Warranted wholly an Ape, a great jack-ape o' the forest,
Jabbering, hairy, grim, arboreal wholly in habits.
So he sate on till noon, when, hushed in slumber around him,
Everything lay dead; all save the murmuring insect,
Whose small voice still spake, proclaiming silence. Awaking
Suddenly, then he rose, and, thinking scorn of his fellows,
Longed to be quit of them all, his Apess specially. She, dear,
Knew no dream, no vision; her Apelet playing about her
All her thought, her care. At four he finally left her,
Went to liv by himself, but felt a pang—'twas a conscience
Budding in germ ; yet went; then stopped to bathe in a fountain;
Wow! What an ugly phiz! He saw and shuddered; a Ruskin
Stirred in his breast. Taste born!—the seed of a mighty Ideal,
Raffaelesque, Titianic! Erect he strode through the jungle,
Cleaving his way with a stick;—Art's rise! An implement maker,
Parent of Armstrong guns, steam rams, et cetera? Still on Plucking the fruits he went; felt pain, no matter the region;
Said it was not the apple, or crab, or cranberry, no! nor Even the sloe. 'Twas a chill. He caught it there in the fountain.
Bathing, still in a heat, the water cold o' the coldest.
Glorious Ape!—Logician! not yet a perfect Induction,
But good step that way, as good as many among us!
So he went on till eve, when, reached the edge o' the forest,
Just where the opening paths sloped westward; then i' the gloaming,
Mounting a rising knoll, he saw the sun in his glory
Set over flood and fell; and joining, as in embraces,
Earth to heaven draw near; he saw, and suddenly trembled;
Sudden his apehood shrank as a robe, and fell from off him;
Sudden a soul was born. He owned a greater above him,
Near him, round him, in him, far away in the splendor,
Having a right to rule, and he a duty to serve it.
And this happened at eight—at eight P. M. precisely—
On that August day; and if you cannot believe it,
Go to your Darwin; read how an Ape grew man; and a moment
Was when his soul was not, another, his soul was quickened.
And this must be true, or else—unhappy dilemma—
Men and monkeys both hav souls, or flourish without them.
So farewell, Ape-man! Lo, we, your progeny, greet you;
Thank you much for a soul, and—may we never forget it!

An Unhappy "Spirit" Abroad.

Whether or not there are miserable and evil spirits in some other world I do not pretend to decide, but that there are some in this is beyond all doubt. Poor, unfortunate victims, they deserve our commiseration, and willingly would I offer them some material help, only it is to be feared that the "conditions" by which they are surrounded are of such a nature as to render available aid impossible. It is not kind, I know, to smile at another's misfortune, but I could not avoid enjoying a very hearty laugh over the furious attack made upon me by one Mr. Oliver, whose article from the Spiritual Offering (what an offering to spirits!) was copied into THE TRUTH SEEKER. How sad that an unhappy spirit should hav taken possession of this gentlemanly genius and so alarmingly disturbed his equilibrium! The abuse which he hurled at my poor offending head, while under this fatal influence, might be judged to savor more of the spirituous than the spiritual, did we not know that those who hold intercourse with "spirits above" never meddle with "spirits below." How sorry I am that my address so seriously affected this very sensitiv ethereal being that even after days of solitude he had not recovered from the fever my humble words caused him. Really, I was not aware that anything I said on the occasion had such a potent influence on one who tries sometimes to "call spirits from the vasty deep." But we—some of us—liv and learn. Materialists are a "herd," and I am the John Bull of the herd, stamping with hoofs, goring with horns, and going ramping, raving mad, till gentle-like Oliver was obviously frightened at my "greedy, bulging eyes," lest he might, like his figurativ toad, disappear and be seen no more. Oh, holy pokers and sacred tongs! what a commotion about nothing! A storm in a teapot I hav heard of before, but this is a hurricane in a spoon, a thunder-storm in a thimble, a waterspout in a winkle-shell. What, in the name of all the spirits at once—or, to use a more solemn source of appeal, all the gods in the Pantheon—is it all about? Had Mr. Oliver been eating unripe fruit, or was he suffering from a severe bilious attack? I fail to comprehend him. But that's no marvel. I am "a hidebound buffalo of the plains, a hippopotamus of rivers dank," eating beef (by the way, is it not cannibalism for a buffalo to eat beef?) and guzzling ale Englishman, and cannot be expected to understand spirits of earth, or air, or water, or that other place usually supposed to be under the earth. Does not Mr. Oliver know that because a man has the misfortune to be an Englishman it does not therefore follow that he necessarily either eats beef or drinks ale. If it did, I should hav been in a rare fix during the week I spent at the Cassadaga camp, for the whole time I was there I saw very little beef, and not a drop of ale. To be serious, if this sort of language and such dirty mud-pelting be the outcome of Spiritualism, we do well to leave it to those who can display celestial ire, and keep ourselvs for the staid and sober things of earth.

Mr. Chainey must be proud indeed of the refined manners and elegant and choice phraseology of this apostle of the "new gospel." Reading the article of Mr. Oliver's, there can be no question as to its softening influence upon the manners and the intellects of some of its adherents. Glad am I to know that it has not this effect upon many of the Spiritualists, the majority of whom, according to my experience, are polite, civil, and honorable ladies and gentlemen. But as it frequently happens in good families that some "black sheep" are to be found, so in great movements many "cranks" are discovered. If it should ever be my fate to meet Mr. Oliver on a public platform, my special endeavor will be "in the mildest manner possible" to cure him of his malady and to inspire within him a sense of his duty as a gentleman. It is too much to hope that anything I may write now will redeem him from his "fallen condition," as probably, according to the law of evolution, he has not yet reached the redeeming point; but, for the advantage of others who are more advanced, and, therefore, better capable of appreciating accuracy and the right of fair controversy, I will pen the substance of my reply to Mr. Chainey, and thereby correct the misstatements of Mr. Oliver.

In no one instance did I indulge in "disgusting personalities" towards Mr. Chainey, as my remarks in last week's TRUTH SEEKER will show. That gentleman gave a public statement of his failure as a Liberal exponent, and sought sincerely, I believe, though, in my opinion, injudiciously, to blame the Liberals and their principles for his failure. This I thought was a mistake upon his part, and, in vindication of a cause which to me is most dear, I said so, and gave my reasons for so saying. I hav nowhere alleged that "woman should never enter man's domain," but I did urge that I thought my friend Chainey had too much of the tenderness and nervousness of women, without the stern, practical, enduring nature that should belong to men who hav to grapple with the rude realities of life, the result being that he is too effeminate. So far from limiting the sphere of woman, I hav taught for the past twenty years that all disabilities founded on sex should be removed; that as all human beings hav an equal right to the full development and the free exercise of their faculties, we ought to open to women as to men all spheres of activity. They will succeed in those for which they are fit, they will fail in those for which they are not fit.

One of the grave charges brought against Liberals by Mr. Chainey was that we "cultivate our intellects till our hearts and intuitions are dead within us." This I resented as a libel upon a class of men and women whose lives prove that they are in no way destitute of love, affection, devotion, and benevolence. Is it true that Liberals fail to appreciate music, painting, sculpture; that they care nothing for the glories and grandeurs of the world; that they take no part in the treasures of the imagination? Certainly not; we recognize in all these emotional gratifications the very high utility of touching to rapture some of the finest chords in our nature. We believe in blending the virtues of the mind with what are commonly called the virtues of the heart. For if wisdom givs the requisit light, love alone can giv the requisit vital heat. Wisdom climbing the arduous mountain solitudes, must often let the lamp slip from her benumbed fingers; must often be near perishing in fatal lethargy amidst ice and snow-drifts, if love be not there to cheer and revive her with the glow and the flames of the heart's quenchless fires. No one admits more readily than the Secularist does, that we need tender hearts no less than hard heads, and that we should cultivate warm feeling as well as cool reasoning. Can we not nurture the affections and the imagination as well as and along with reason? Assuredly we can, and the wisest and healthiest of men hav been they who harmoniously cultivated their whole nature, physical, moral, and mental, and not any one faculty at the expense of all the others—a mode of life only to be justified by an over-mastering special genius, whose vindication rests in its extraordinary achievements.

Another great error into which Mr. Chainey fell was in saying, "If life is bounded by the cradle and the grave, you can well afford to sell a birthright in an imaginary world for a mess of pottage." What is meant by this doubtful statement? Is our present abode the imaginary world? There cannot be any other if life is "bounded by the cradle and the grave," but surely existence is no mere imagination, as Mr. Chainey would soon discover if he left phantoms and attended to real practical life. His full meaning, however, came out in another part of his lecture, when he exclaimed, "If we think this life the be-all and end-all, the more sensual we are." This is the cry of one who revels in selfish gratification, and not of him who aims at rational conduct. Suppose this life is the "be-all and end-all" (I do not say it is), is it not worth having for its own sake? Are there no duties devolving upon us as members of the great whole, the very performance of which adds to the joy and happiness of our being? Do lying, cheating, dishonor, and licentiousness enhance the value of society more than truth, honesty, honor, and temperance? Does not real virtue adorn human character, and does not every benevolent act which alleviates suffering and lessens misery, convey unspeakable satisfaction and feelings of delight to the actor? A man who fails to experience pleasure in lofty aspirations, in noble deeds, and in a career of integrity, even if confined to this life, must be fallen indeed.

Coming now to what should hav been the practical and reasoning portion of Mr. Chainey's addresses, what are the facts? He volunteered to announce publicly that he would prove on the Sunday night that Spiritualism was superior to Materialism. We were, therefore, justified in expecting that some attempt would be made to explain the meaning of the two "isms." But Mr. Chainey never deigned to giv us any information as to what he meant by the use of those terms, neither did he afford us the slightest indication that he understood either the one or the other. In his presence I stated that Materialism recognizes the material universe as the one existence, and all phenomena as resulting from changes taking place in matter. This universe, it maintains, has existed from all eternity in some form or other, and being composed of that which is indestructible, it must continue to exist forever. Life, according to this theory, is a resultant of certain combinations of material atoms, which we call organization; and when this combination is broken up, the life ceases, or more probably changes into some other form or force, just as a sudden arrest of motion converts momentum into heat. Thought is held by the Materialist to be simply a function of the brain, and all mental power resultant of a particular kind of organization. Mind, therefore, depends entirely upon matter, and has no independent existence. The brain, in fact, secretes thought, and when the cerebral organization ceases to exist there is an end of mental manifestations, just as the secretions of the bile cease when the liver is destroyed. Thus what is termed mind is not an existence per se, that is, it does not exist of itself. It is a phrase used to indicate that part of the material organization to which the name mental has been given. As Dr. Wigan remarks, "The mind, every anatomist knows to be a set of functions of the brain, differing only in number and degree from the intellect of animals. . . . Can the mind, then, be a thing per se, distinct and separate from the body? No more than the motion can exist independent of the watch." Spencer also says in his "Elements of Psychology," "Though we commonly regard mental and bodily life as distinct, it needs only to ascend somewhat above the ordinary point of view, to see that they are but subdivisions of life in general; and that no line of demarcation can be drawn between them otherwise than arbitrarily."

Such is the Materialistic position, and one that Mr. Chainey held as sound until his "conversion," when he professes to hav found something truer and nobler. Hav we not a right, therefore, when he publicly states this, to inquire what that something is, and why he claims it as being superior? Surely he will not acknowledge that he has been converted to something of which he knows nothing, and that without any explainable reason. True, he calls his new idol Spiritualism and talks of consciousness after death. But he made no effort to explain what a spirit is, or to show how it is possible for consciousness to continue when that which has been conscious is no more. Judging from experience, life and brain are necessary to consciousness; and to possess life and brain, organic structure is indispensable. Why, then, did not Mr. Chainey inform us how he has arrived at the conclusion that life, thought, and consciousness can continue their manifestations when all that was required for their production has ceased to exist? So far as we are concerned, it has, hitherto, been impossible, even with the aid of the telescope or microscope, to discover anything that corresponds with what Mr. Chainey terms a spirit. If he has been more fortunate, he should hav given us the benefit of his unique power of perception. Our mental vision is so limited that we can only recognize phenomena, but what underlies appearances is to us unknown, and our modesty forbids us to assume a knowledge that we cannot command.

The mode of investigation suggested by Mr. Chainey to ascertain the accuracy of his new faith appears to me to be unsatisfactory. To hav to grope in the dark to get light upon such a marvelous subject as Spiritualism is supposed to be is not encouraging. And then the loopholes to cover failures are so numerous. The slightest opposing element "breaks the circle;" a non-success is explained by the plea that "spirits cannot be controled," or that "lying spirits," or "powerless spirits," are present. Of course I do not deny many of the phenomena, but I see no reason for ascribing them to aught but natural power. Besides, Mr. Chainey should hav considered that, inasmuch as those manifestations take place in nature, they are thereby natural. Further, what idea has he of the alleged supernatural, and what are the distinctiv marks between its supposed power and the acknowledged natural force? And, still further, has the extent of nature's capabilities been sufficiently ascertained to justify anyone in dogmatizing either upon what she can or she cannot do? Does not Mr. Chainey know that a large and intelligent class of Spiritualists in the United States attribute the very phenomena which hav captivated him to material means? Would it not, therefore, hav been wise upon his part to hav given the subject a little dispassionate study before talking so positivly as to imaginary causes, of which he knows nothing, and for which he can giv no reason apart from a hastily formed opinion?

Frequently during the Convention held at Cassadaga, I asked friend Chainey what he regarded the practical results of Spiritualism to be? His only reply was that it afforded him "sweet consolation," and opened up before him a glorious immortality. In it he had found a "new gospel." Now all this might hav been very satisfactory to him, but it was no justification for his reckless taunts hurled at some of his former associates. These unfortunate Liberals were termed by Mr. Chainey, "inflated egotists," who sought to overthrow in a most remorseless manner "all opinions but their own," who cared as little for the feelings of those who differed from them as did "the Wall-street speculators for the widows of those they ruined;" and finally, these Materialists were charged with "speaking lightly and profanely of the sacred relation of the sexes."

These were among the charges made by Mr. Chainey against men who, if they fail to see into the "spirit-world," hav, at least, clear and definit conceptions of the virtue, honor, and fidelity which belong to this. "Inflated egotists," forsooth! And this from friend George, who claims to hav discovered in a few days, for a certainty, a sure immortality. "Friends," he exclaims, "I know we are to liv forever." Who really is the egotist, the man who admits that he does not know the unknowable, or he who professes a positiv knowledge of the "unseen world?" There is, of course, no "egotism" in Mr. Chainey saying, "God is the soul which is through all, in all, and around all." Again, "Our present life is inseparably connected with the spiritual realm; sometimes this union is conscious, and at others quite unconscious." And this from one who, until a few weeks ago, held the very opposit opinions, and who, at present, is unable to giv a logical reason why he does not entertain the same opinions to-day.

"A new gospel," to be of any practical value, should be superior to the old gospel. Will Mr. Chainey state where are the superior features of his recently acquired faith to those of Secularism? What science, philosophy, and ethics has it that Secularism does not contain? Where is its unique moral guide and rule of life? Is it a "sweet consolation" to believe that there is a future existence, or that "we shall never die?" If so, Secularism does not deny the right to such a belief to those who think they hav evidence of its reality. Secularism does, however, condemn that "inflated egotism" which inspires the allegation that there is such evidence open to all, and that those who confess their inability to recognize it will suffer hereafter in consequence. Many Secularists, knowing only of one existence, content themselvs therewith, feeling assured that the best credentials to secure any possible immortality is the best—physically, morally, and intellectually—use of the life we now hav. The man who has lived well has made the best preparation to die well. What has such a man to fear at death? He knows by experience that death is the consequence of life, that no form possesses immortality. The plant that blossoms on the mountain side, the bird that flutters in the summer sun, the bee that flies from flower to flower, the colossal elephant and the tiny animalcule, the intelligent ape and the almost unconscious zoophyte, all pass into a state of unconsciousness when their part is played and their work is done. Why should man be an exception to the universal law? His body is built upon the same principle, and his mental faculties differ in degree, but not in character, from theirs. He is subject to the same law as the rest of existence, and to repine at death is as absurd as to weep because he did not liv in some other planet or at some other time. Nature is imperativ in her decrees, and must be obeyed. Death is the common lot of all. The atoms of matter composing our organism are required for the construction of another, so they must be given up for that purpose, and to repine at it argues an ill-tutored mind. The work is done, and if it has been done well there is nothing to fear when "life's fitful dream is o'er." CHARLES WATTS.

Toronto Notes.

The "apostle of Albert Hall," as the press of Toronto hav named Charles Watts, lectured on Sunday last on the subject, "Secularism Superior to Christianity." It had been raining all day, which had thinned the churches, and a thin audience was feared likely to listen to the "apostle of Albert Hall;" but in spite of the weather, and all other obstacles, the house was crowded in every part. Charles Watts is a good speaker—clear and distinct in his enunciation, decided and forcible in manner, deliberate and pleasant in pronunciation; and in debate, when necessary, he is rapid, concentrated, and voluble in replying to his opponents.

Irving and Ellen Terry appear at the Grand Opera House, Toronto, next week. I ought to hav said Irving, Terry, and Tom Mead, for what "Britisher," "blawsted" or otherwise, does not remember Tom Mead? He has made starring tours in Shaksperian characters all over the British Islands for many years past, and has been a prime favorit wherever he has appeared on the stage. He is one of the pillars of Shaksperian drama. For many years three of the greatest stars of the British provinces were the three Toms, as they were called—Tom Mead, Tom Swinburne, and Tom King. Let every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER make it a point not to miss seeing Tom Mead play in support of Irving and Terry. Tom is a good and faithful Secularist.

Every Freethinker, every Materialist, every Evolutionist, must hav felt, for a number of years past, the pressing necessity for a dictionary of the new words, scientific and otherwise, pertaining to evolution. A mass of literature, vast in extent, has grown up, with its corresponding mass of technical and scientific words, endless in number, on the subjects of Materialism and evolution. And all this without a key to unlock its treasures in the way of a dictionary of new philosophical and scientific terms. Let every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER find a way of getting access to the "New Imperial Dictionary," sold by Scribners, New York. It will be found that the "New Imperial" givs a complete and illustrated vocabulary of all the new philosophical and scientific terms used in the Materialistic and evolution philosophies. Let every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER try to induce some publisher in the United States to reprint the "New Imperial Dictionary" at half price. Scribners sell the British print at twenty dollars. It would pay to reprint it at ten dollars.

The Central Canadian Secular Society, who hav commenced establishing branch societies all over the Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific, are calling together a convention from all parts of Canada. Among other subjects which will be dealt with by the Convention are: 1. The building of a Secular hall in the city of Toronto. 2. Some amendments to the Constitution. 3. The advisability of forming a junction with the United States Secular Association. 4. Ways and means of establishing a Freethought journal to represent the skeptics and Secular organizations—both local and general, national and otherwise—throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion of Canada.

One gentleman wrote a letter to the daily press purporting to reiterate statements the writer had heard Mr. Watts make from the platform. Charles Watts inserted a letter in reply to the effect that he (Charles Watts) had never made one of those statements at all—that the whole of the charges were wilful falsehoods—and recommended the orthodox Christian libeler to read his Bible, more especially to attentivly consider Revelations xxi, 8.

A Mr. Reynolds got upon the platform of Albert Hall, at the close of Mr. Charles Watts's lecture on Sunday night last, to oppose the statements of the address. Had Mr. Reynolds during his childhood's happy hours been fortunate enough to hav the privilege of attending the dame school of his nativ village home, he would hav escaped making such a display of what he didn't know. O Mr. Reynolds! If the powers above would only gie us, to see oursels as ithers see us! Alack, and awell a day! Mr. Reynolds delivered a reply to Mr. Watts in the Orange Hall, Toronto, on Wednesday night last. According to the public press, if Mr. Reynolds went out into the highways and hedges to compel them to come in, his success in scaring up his audience, culminated in (including, I suppose, small boys, news girls, two peanut men, three big umbrellas, and one small Scotch terrier dog), thirty-nine all told. Victory in One School-District.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Down here in the "Old Dominion" is quite a hotbed of Christianity, there being but very few outspoken Liberals. But you can score one more victory for Freethought. Just one year ago I began, single-handed and alone, a fight for our side, by opposing the opening of our schools in this district (Sapponey) with prayer. I wrote to our county superintendent in regard to the matter. His only reply was: "If I were in your place, I would not throw myself in the face of public sentiment by opposing this thing." I referred him to our champion's "Individuality." Getting no satisfaction from the county superintendent of public instruction, I wrote to our state superintendent, Hon. R. R. Farr, whose reply I giv below: "I desire to state that no public free school teacher has any right to introduce any religious rites into his school." I laid this letter before the school trustees of our district. The result was that the trustees issued an order to the teachers of all free schools to discontinue the reading the Bible and opening the schools with prayer.

Thus it will be seen what one industrious worker in our cause can do. Let us hav Watts and Putnam down here this winter—say in Richmond, our state capital.

Poor Chainey! He is surely as "unstable as water." GEO. W. BARNER.

Goodwynsville, Va., Sept. 28, 1884.

A Prophetess in the Land.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Immediately upon the nomination of Mr. Blaine for the presidency, Mrs. Morrell, a Spiritualist medium of this city, told me that he would never be president. Immediately upon the nomination of Mr. Cleveland, she said the same thing of him. As her friends claim that she correctly predicted the results of the three preceding presidential elections immediately upon hearing of the nominations, I was curious to know how it could be that neither of the nominees of the two great parties would be president. She replied: "It seems to me as though one will die and the other be killed." She still insists upon her prophecy. On August 1st, Mrs. Morrell called upon Mrs. Fisk, a medium who claims to write under spirit control, and while there Mrs. Morrell saw the spirit of Abraham Lincoln enter the room and indicate that he wanted to write something. Mrs. Fisk was immediately controled to write the following communication:

"When the time arrives for the decision of the people upon the choice of candidates, there will be silence and mourning in the halls of Congress; for the dead will be more than the living of their number, and out of the choice the people shall make there will be no one to respond; for the reaper will hav gathered the sheaves, and the hand of destruction will hav swept the representativs of the people from their places. We know the times are filled with premonitions of ill, and we would not add to the insecurity of the masses; but labor and capital must hav their struggle, and the friend of the oppressed alone can endure. He who lifts his voice for the poor will be the chosen ruler, for the poor man's friend is the next in order in the history of this nation. He whose hand has ever been raised in defense of right will be supported by the myriad hosts upon our shore, and he will be given the highest position from the people. ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

This prophecy points to Butler as the next president, a result wholly unlooked for at the time it was made, and even now expected by only a few. Its publication by you will interest many of your Spiritualist readers as well as many friends of Ben Butler.

Yours truly, DAVID S. WHITE.

Agnostic, Positiv, and Pantarch.

AGNOSTIC: Atheism, Pantheism, and Theism, when rigorously analyzed, severally prove to be absolutely unthinkable.

A God understood is no God at all.

The power which the Universe manifests is to us utterly inscrutable.

All things are manifestations of a Power that transcends our knowledge.

The consciousness of the presence of an Infinit and Eternal Energy, from which all things proceed, is an absolute certainty.

Is it not just possible that there is a mode of being as much transcending Intelligence and Will, as these transcend mechanical motion?

POSITIVIST: Has the Agnostic a positiv creed? Yea, verily. "An Infinit and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed!" Or, as Athanasius would say, "Neither made, nor created, nor begotten, but proceeding!" But this Infinit and Eternal Energy is Unknowable, and don't you forget it, nor dare to omit the capital letters. And if you would hold the Agnostic Faith, you must not think of the Unknowable Being as a He, or even as an It! You must simply worship the Unthinkable, which without doubt is an absolute certainty.

Such is the faith of the Agnostic; hear now the creed of the Positivist:

Whosoever would be saved, before all things, it is necessary that he hold the Positiv Faith, which is this: That we worship God only in Humanity, neither created nor uncreated, neither begotten nor unbegotten, neither comprehensible nor incomprehensible, neither transitory nor eternal, but existing as long as concrete man exists, and, therefore, always to be adored.

PANTARCH: There is no such thing in the absolute sense as the Unknowable. It is a logical absurdity, for if it were existent we should not know of its existence, and could neither affirm nor deny it.

The quarrel between the Agnostic and the Positiv arises from a confusion of ideas caused by the poverty of language. Knowledge has three degrees, to wit: 1. Cognosis, or cognition; indirect or relativ knowledge. 2. Ag-gnosis, or gnosis; direct or absolute knowledge. 3. A-gnosis, or not knowledge, i. e., ignorance. The learned Agnostic confounds the first degree with the second—cognosis with ag-gnosis, relativ with absolute knowledge—and because we hav no cognition or relativ knowledge of a thing, he dogmatically affirms that that thing is Unknowable. The Positivist rather prefers the term Unknown, but isn't quite decided what word to use. Both are in the fog, and the only way out of it is a new and universal language in which every word has a fixed definition.

The Agnostic who professes to hav discovered an Unknowable God will hav to yield to the Positivist who claimed to hav found that God idea in the common consciousness of Humanity.

AGNOSTIC: Humanity indeed! You ask me to worship a thousand million savages—nay, a thousand million multiplied by a thousand million, comprising all the man-apes that hav existed since your humanity was evoluted from a tadpole. Humanity be damned!

THE PANTARCH: While my brother Positivist is preparing an answer to this last assault, in which he will exhibit a power of repartee and logical eloquence of which he is a master, I will only observe that the Altruism of the Agnostic is just what the great child-like soul of Comte intended to affirm as the dominant element of the practical Religion of the future. All sympathy is Altruism, and whatever sympathy exists between any two, says the Agnostic, is an instance of race consciousness. Just so, and that is an evidence of ultimate concrete race consciousness. Man, as a race, may now be scarcely conscious of any such consciousness, but he will by and by evolute into a full recognition of the Religion of Humanity.

THE North American Review for October contains essays by many noted men, who are mostly mistaken in their views. The leading article is by an eminent college president, who evidently thinks that Christianity and morality, or moral character, are interchangeable terms; and the "Benefits of the Tariff System" are discussed by prejudiced writers—John Roach, for one. The other writers are O. B. Frothingham, on the "Philosophy of Conversion," a subtil paper by a splendid though mild heretic; the "Origin of Yellow Fever," by Dr. C. Creighton;" "Why I Wish to Visit America," by an English reverend; "Shall the Jury System be Abolished?" by Judge Hayne; and, to lovers of Tennyson's poetry, a very interesting contribution by R. H. Shepherd on the genesis of "Maud," probably the best production of England's laureate.

A LEADING firm of publishers in Stockholm, Sweden, hav translated Ingersoll's works into the Scandinavian language, and propose to publish them as works demanded by the progress of the age.

The League.

How to Organize a Local League.

The National Liberal League is formed by the union of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues. To organize a Local Auxiliary League, any person (man or woman) may place the following Call at the head of a sheet of paper and solicit signatures:

CALL.

We, the undersigned citizens of [here introduce name of town or city], agree to organize an Auxiliary Liberal League, to work in connection with the National Liberal League, and to pay the sums set opposit our names for that purpose.

Names.	Residences.	Amounts.

As soon as ten persons have subscribed to this Call, and five dollars have been paid in, make out an application for a Charter, inclosing the application, together with a money order or postal note for five dollars (or the amount may be inclosed in a registered letter) to the secretary of the National Liberal League. The fee for a Charter is ten dollars, and the Board of Directors have voted to allow the organizer of the Auxiliary Liberal League to retain five dollars as compensation for his or her services in effecting the organization.

Any Liberal society can by a vote qualify itself an Auxiliary Liberal League, and take out a charter.

On receipt of the five dollars and application signed by the President and Secretary (or the temporary Secretary) of the new League (and as many others as may choose), the Secretary will forward to the applicant a Charter signed by the proper officers of the National Liberal League. Samuel P. Putnam,
Secretary of the National Liberal League.

SUPPORT OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE.

In order to provide an adequate revenue to the treasury of the National League, to enable it to carry out the requirements of sections, 4, 5, and 6 of Article III. of its Constitution, and to do other legitimate work of the League, every auxiliary is requested to contribute a certain sum montbly, not less than five cents per month from each one of its members, for the use of the National League. The amount thus collected should be remitted quarterly on the first days of January, April, July, and October, by the secretary of the auxiliary to the secretary of the National League.

FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

To Samuel P. Putnam, Secretary of National Liberal League.

C. B. Hunter, Moscow Mills, Mo.: Your labors in this state would meet with great success.

Albert Chavannes (Editor of Sociologist), Adair Creek, Tenn.: Please find inclosed $1 for the Campaign Fund.

Ralph Helm, Syracuse, N. Y.: Please put me down for ten dollars. I heartily approve of the action of the League the last session.

Gideon Marsh, Marcelona, Antrim Co., Mich.: We need something to arouse us up. Help us this fall or winter, and we will do all we can.

J. W. Leighton, Greeley, Col.: Inclosed is $1. I hope each Freethinker will do what I hav done—send what he or she can spare, if it is only a little.

J. S. Edgerton, Chester Hill, Morgan Co., O.: A League could be organized here that would do good work. If you and Mr. Watts will come you shall hav a warm welcome.

Joseph Wensel, Wayland, Mich.: Inclosed I send $1 for the Campaign Fund, and I hope that each Liberal in the country who can spare one dollar will do so, and help on the great cause.

Wm. Reynolds, Wauship, Summit Co., Utah: Inclosed find $5 to help make the Liberal "pot boil." Liberal missionaries are needed in Utah. There is plenty of material to make a valuable auxiliary League.

H. B. Jones, Burton, Wash. Co., Texas: Nearly all our young men in every community are Liberally inclined, and I know of no place where a League could not be started, if proper steps were taken. I hope to hear from you soon, and that you can pay us a visit.

John J. Jost, Ogden, Utah: The necessity of missionary work I hav always agitated. Two good lecturers and organizers will fill a great want. Our League will push ahead. One of our Liberal friends has promised us a hall which will be ready in a few weeks.

Edward Ross, Montezuma, N. Y.: I hav been a Freethinker for ten years, and hav watched with much interest the proceedings of your National League. Please send your constitution and by-laws. I am sure that I can organize a League in this place.

H. L. R. Jones, Osage Mission, Neosho Co., Kan.: My course is planned as follows: 1. Open a subscription list to meet our just share of your expense, both traveling and salary, for at least one day in our county. 2. Secure the co-operation of all Secularists in different parts of the county, and raise a fund for county work for at least six months in the year. I hope to effect an organization having the foregoing in view. I believe it will not be difficult to raise $1,200 in this county to carry on such work. Let us know of your approach, and we will be ready to receive you.

So goes the work all over the country. Fall in, friends, and lend a hand. Do your "level best," and we shall succeed. Giv us a good word, and we will send it ringing along from column to column of our lines. Samuel P. Putnam.

The Call of the Leaguers.

There's a revolution rising; there's rebellion in the land;
There's a movement past disguising for a better law to reign;
And our able secretary sends his call on every hand
For the sinews necessary to the opening campaign.

In our call we hav demanded every church shall pay its share,
In a manner open-handed, of the government expense;
We demand appropriation to remunerate for prayer
Shall without procrastination be no more directed thence.

In our halls of legislature there are parsons by the score,
Paid to violate the nature of each man that holds a doubt
As to God and inspiration and a dozen dogmas more;
Let us purify the nation, friends, and turn the rascals out.

There's a God-in-Constitution party roaming through the land,
With a view to comminution of their foes from sea to sea;
Let us raise the Liberal banner with a strong, athletic hand,
While we peal the loud hosanna and the anthem of the free.

Rally to this standard, brother, with your word and with your deed,
Let us try to save each other and the land that gave us birth;
Follow where our leaders call us, be a help in time of need,
And whatever then befall us, we shall disenthrall the earth.

George E. Macdonald.

Contributions to the $5,000 Fund.

The National Liberal League affords you opportunity to prove your Liberalism is a reality; that you are not simply a Christian under another name, making a mere profession of faith instead of living out your avowed convictions. Do justice. Is it just to your fellow-creatures to leave them in the dark bogs of superstition, and under the cruel dominion of priestcraft, without making one effort or self-sacrifice to deliver them, when your deliverance cost the martyrdom of Paine, Bennett, and other noble pioneers of civil and religious liberty?

Love mercy. Is it merciful, because you are now released from the cruel fetters of superstition, and the bonds of fear, to leave your friends and neighbors shackled, when you could so easily help set them free?

Endeavor to make your fellow-creatures happy. Think for a moment of the vast amount of time and money freely contributed to the church. Think of the privation and self-denial cheerfully endured by the votaries of superstition, to afford others the imagined benefits of their visionary mythical salvation. Should we not do as much for the real salvation of our fellow-creatures? Should we not blush with shame every time we hear the word Liberal, if we do not?

How many Liberals hav members of their families attend some church, and pay from $20 to $250 per year to its support? If Liberal, would it not be well to be consistent, and giv at least half as much to the cause of reason, right, and truth, as to the cause of superstition and error? Liberals realize the delights and joys of genuin salvation. How can we better promote the happiness of our fellow-creatures than by aiding them to secure salvation—salvation from fear of priest or parson, and slavish subjection to the usurped authority and dictation of the church; salvation from the dread of death, and the terrible fear of meeting a cruel, bloodthirsty, relentless, and vindictiv deity; salvation from the terrors of an ever burning hell; salvation from a life of self-torment and self-denial, from trying to believe, despite natural benevolence of disposition and morality of life, all men and women are miserable sinners, of which they are chief; salvation from fear to giv vent to one honest laugh, or enjoy one hour of merriment? They tell us Jesus never laughed, and it would be a sin for us to do so, if it were really true that all who do not attain Christian salvation are doomed to eternal suffering. Salvation that enables us to enjoy this beauteous earth, and the love of our near and dear ones, living ourselvs to promote the happiness of those around us, and thus securing an Eden of love, a paradise on earth, here and now.

The National Liberal League is devoted to securing for all this salvation. How much will you contribute to its support? The plans of the Board of Directors are broad and practical, and cannot fail if carried out to make the League, after this year, self-sustaining—a permanent success, and a mighty power for the advancement of universal mental liberty.

Reader, fair lady, good gentleman, hav you sent your contribution to the National Liberal League fund? Hav you pledged all you can really afford? Remember five dollars sent now—in this, the hour of need—will do more than five times the amount next year, when the League will be firmly established and self-sustaining. Every subscription sent now induces others to send. If you hav not already sent, don't wait until to-morrow; send at once. Send draft, express, or post-office order payable to S. P. Putnam, Secretary of National Liberal League, 55 East 9th street, New York.

Chas. B. Reynolds,
Chairman Ex. Com. N. L. League.

A SUBSCRIBER.

From the Iron-Clad Age.

Stewartsville, Mo., Sept. 26, 1884.

My Friend Dr. Monroe: I am not a very wealthy man, but will help a little toward the $5,000 fund to spread, not the gospel, but truth, justice, mercy, and good sense among the benighted heathen of our land, called Christians. Their time is pretty near out. Where science and good judgment enter, priestcraft, superstition, and ignorance must take a back seat. Inclosed please find $5, which you will please forward to the proper office. S. N. Bradford.

ANOTHER.

Aurora, Ill., Sept. 25, 1884.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I see that my subscription to the val uable Truth Seeker soon expires, so I will send you $3 to renew, and $2 to help the League sustain Messrs. Putnam and Watts in their lectures. I hope that Liberals will be liberal in their contributions toward the good move of getting truth before the people. I will contribute more in time, as my means will allow.

Yours for the spread of truth, A. F. Benedict.

THE MILWAUKEE LEAGUE.

The attendance at the League hall on Sunday, the 28th ult., was about one hundred. The address was by Dr. Juliet H. Severance, who delivered her lecture upon "The New Republic," a short abstract of which was printed in The Truth Seeker last week.

CLEVELAND LEAGUE.

Cleveland, Ohio, Oct. 3, 1884.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: We hav but little to report from this part of the vinyard at present, but hope to make a better report later.

Our committee has decided to giv a reception every month during the winter, as the League exercises for one day, and to giv lectures the remaining Sunday evenings of each month.

Our beginning will be made Nov. 9, 1884, when all the friends will be rallied together by invitation and asked to join the merry throng; the entertainments to consist of music, recitations, etc., after which the balance of the evening will be impromptu.

I should like to see all our Leagues create a social union in this manner. I think they would find their meetings more attractiv, and strangers would feel at home with us, though their homes might be many miles distant. It is our intention to make our League the model. We hav the material to do so, but it will take some hard work.

I hope we may hav the pleasure of entertaining Messrs. Watts and Putnam on one of these occasions soon, and in course of time on many.

Yours for truth and right, W. I. Irvine.

A STIRRING APPEAL.

From the Investigator.

"To the Liberals of America." We urgently ask the attention of every one of our readers to a stirring appeal headed as above, on our third page, written by Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, secretary of the National Liberal League. (Next week we shall publish another similar article which he has sent us.) It will be seen that Mr. Putnam proposes, in connection with Mr. Charles Watts, to make a lecturing tour throughout the entire country, for the purpose of raising $5,000 to promote the objects of the League.

This sum can be raised, and we hope it will be very soon, in order that the League may hav more facilities for doing its work than it has at present. Let the appeal now made be widely circulated, and let Messrs. Putnam and Watts be constantly employed, for they are able lecturers and well qualified to do a great work if they are only properly encouraged.

THE EIGHTH ANNUAL CONGRESS.

From Pittsburgh, Pa., Truth.

The proceedings of the Eighth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, which adjourned on September 9th, should, we think, meet the approval of all good Liberals, and, so far as we hav been able to see, everything appears "all quiet along the Potomac." We consider the platform as presented by the Congress a grand one, and feel confident that it will be indorsed by all Liberals throughout the country. As to the proposed change of name of the National Liberal League to that of the "American Secular Union," we agree with Mr. Wakeman's views, as expressed before the house, on that project. We also think Mr. Green's point was well taken. The action of the Congress in paying strict attention to the Nine Demands of Liberalism, to the exclusion of extraneous matter which has heretofore burdened the National League, we think deserves special commendation. We consider the newly elected officers "the right persons in the right place," and believe that with the proper aid they will push the objects of the National Liberal League further than they hav ever been pushed before—so far, in fact, that we expect to see the ramparts of heaven take a tumble. In conclusion we will say, with the new secretary of the League, "Let us bury all differences and look forward to the future." F. A. P.

CALL TO THE STATE LEAGUE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Now that the National Liberal League has held its Convention, and is fairly ready for activ work, what about our state League? Is it not about time that some decisiv action was taken in regard to the next state Convention?

The officers of the state League are: president, Jas. E. Emerson, Beaver Falls, Pa.; vice-presidents, Hon. A. B. Bradford, Enon Valley, Pa.; John R. Kemp, Altoona, Pa.; and Professor William Seymour, Philadelphia, Pa.; secretary, Harry Hoover, Pittsburgh, Pa.; treasurer, S. F. De Jones, Pittsburgh, Pa.; executiv committee, W. F. Porter, Philadelphia; D. R. Christian, Altoona; Roman Staley, Pittsburgh; Pulaski Carter, Scranton, Pa.; finance committee, Lewis Plack, Altoona; G. C. Fink, Foxburg; Wm. Crookston, Irwin Station, Pa.

The newly elected chairman of the executiv committee of the National League, Mr. Charles B. Reynolds, writes us that he will look to the state League for information concerning the auxiliary Leagues; and as the new chairman is chockfull of go-ahead-ativness, it behooves the executiv committee to bestir themselvs. We do not think the coming presidential campaign should stand in the way of speedy action looking to a time for holding a state convention. It should be held as soon as possible. Now, gentlemen, do not be slow to be move in this most important matter. In reference to this duty we would like to hear from James H. Cole and Miss Eva A. H. Barnes, of Clara; William Barnsdall and C. M. Hays, of Titusville; G. W. Baldwin, of Linesville; George Thorn, of Clearfield; Charles Jones and W. F. Barkley, of Mount Pleasant; J. T. Richardson and D. W. Perry, of Harrisburg; Samuel Warner, of Scranton; Lewis Plack and John R. Kemp, of Altoona; and F. Fish and George Longford, of Philadelphia—or from any other members of those Leagues. Come, now, gentlemen, speak up. Don't be backward.—Pittsburgh Truth.

Two or three of our Liberal contemporaries hav fallen into the error of reporting Courtlandt Palmer as "secretary of the executiv committee" of the League. Mr. Palmer is treasurer, of the N. L. L., and hopes to hav something to do.

J. E. Remsburg is now lecturing in Nebraska.

The Second Salamanca Freethinkers' Convention will be held Dec. 5th, 6th, and 7th next. A number of able speakers hav agreed to be present. H. L. Green, manager.

Dynamite.

It seems a little strange that, when war is declared between two nations, and the army of each aims to slaughter as many of the other as possible, the invention of gunpowder and cannon should hav had the effect to lessen the destruction of human life in battle, and to discourage the trade of war itself. Yet such was the fact. In the days of dueling the pistol, now called the revolver, came into vogue, because, in a quarrel between a big man and a little one, the pistol placed both on an equality as to power. Otherwise, the big man, conscious of his superior strength, would play the bully over his weaker brethren, and there would be no such thing as living with him. So a small army, with improved artillery and skill in the management of it, has often been known to defeat an enemy of twice its size.

Now we need not be surprised if the science of chemistry, by teaching every body how to make explosivs, would, before the close of this century, do two things for the welfare of the human race, which neither religion nor morality has been able to accomplish: First, to put an end to arbitrary governments; and secondly, to lead to the establishment of an international court of arbitration for settling all difficulties between governments peaceably, instead of by war. It is painful to think of the vast standing armies of Europe made up of millions of able-bodied men withdrawn from their homes and the cultivation of the soil, and compelled to lead the lazy and vicious lives of soldiers in time of peace, while the laboring classes are taxed nearly to death to pay the expenses of such policy. If these soldiers could all go home to their families and earn their living by their own industry; and if the nations that keep up such establishments, each to defend itself against the possible aggressions of its neighbors, would enter into a treaty, each one binding itself on the penalty of falling out with all the rest, to abide by the decisions of an international jury, Europe could enjoy the same prosperity that has crowned the pacific policy of this country.

A century ago a man would hav been laughed at if he had predicted that a question between two such nations as the United States and England as the Alabama question was, could be settled amicably. Our deep sense of the injustice done us by England, and the sense of pride on England's part, would hav then made a war inevitable and expensiv. But, by arbitration, the case was satisfactorily settled without the shedding of one drop of blood. And I hav always considered that after that splendid triumph of modern civilization over ancient barbarism, this government was false to its grand mission in the world, in that it did not avail itself of the advantage given it, to propose to the nations of Europe, and to follow it up year after year through our accredited ministers to their courts, a general disbandment of their armies and navies, and a settlement of all disputes by a court of arbitration.

Dynamite is to be henceforth our security against foreign invasion. If the tribal relations of the Indians were broken up, and they were made citizens, we would need no army at all, except a few soldiers to take care of our forts and arsenals. And if the policy recommended by Washington in his farewell address, to avoid all entangling alliances with foreign nations, were continued, we would need no navy; and West Point and Annapolis could be converted into normal institutes for qualifying teachers for the public schools in all the states. If we were at war with all Europe, and it were possible to bring her ironclad ships across the Atlantic, it would be impossible to approach any of our sea-port towns, if the bottoms of our harbors and bays were all lined with dynamite cartridges and other deadly explosivs. Science is so democratic, and so benevolent in its ultimate intentions, that every nation, great or small, may now defend itself against aggression, because dynamite is cheap, and every body knows how to make it. I foresee the day—such is my faith in progress—when the states of Europe will hav disbanded their armies, paid their national debts, and entered on a career of prosperity which will make all their people contented and happy. If the states composing our Union, some of them as large as any European state except Russia, can settle all the disputes which arise between their peoples by a Supreme Court of the United States whose decisions shall be final, dispensing with standing armies, allowing all their citizens to follow the peaceful pursuits of civil life, and hav homes of their own, why may not Europe do the same thing? I feel disposed, then, to baptize dynamite, and giv it the name of peacemaker.

But if dynamite may become a peacemaker among the nations, why may it not be resorted to in a particular nation to secure the just rights of the people against their oppressors, when all moral and pacific measures hav proved to be vain? For,

> You may as well go stand upon the beach,
> And bid the main flood bate his usual hight;
> You may as well use question with the wolf,
> Why he hath made the ewe bleat for the lamb;
> You may as well forbid the mountain pines
> To wag their high tops, and to make no noise,
> When they are fretted with the gusts of heaven;
> You may as well do any thing most hard,
> As seek to soften that, than which what's harder, the heart of a despot who rules the people by hereditary right.

We Americans enjoy to the full our national rights—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The iron of bondage does not enter our souls. We hav agreed, by a written compact, to settle all questions as they arise by a show of hands. Therefore, dynamite, as a revolutionary agent, is entirely out of place among us. But it is not so with other people. The masses, by the million, in Europe, are ground down by taxation, and oppression of all kinds, which cannot be remedied by the ballot, nor even by the bullet. It becomes a practical question, therefore, growing out of the brotherhood of the human family, how far an oppressed people hav a right to resort to dynamite as a means of redress. It is a ticklish question, I admit, but there is an answer to it.

The main argument, and it is a strong one, against the dynamite policy, is, that it is not certain of striking its victim, and may involve many innocent persons in the destruction of one who is guilty, and deserves to die. But by the ignorance, or carelessness, of an engineer, or switchman, a locomotiv engin may do infinit harm to life and limb. Fire may, and does, destroy much valuable property. It is, however, no argument against an agent, or force, that it becomes dangerous in the hands of those who do not know how to wield it. In like manner, dynamite, this last and terrible resource of modern civilization against the old and unscrupulous barbarism, may be used in a way not to be justified; just as old John Brown used military force at Harper's Ferry. A mountain-load of responsibility, therefore, rests upon those who resort to this ultima ratio papuli. But that an oppressed people who hav used all other expedients in vain, hav this right, we are bound to admit, or else become infidel to the self-evident truths of the Declaration of Independence. He who denies the axioms of geometry, and yet makes pretensions to a knowledge of the science, is a fool. And he who denies that all men are created equal, and hav an inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that governments derive their just powers only from the consent of the governed, is a traitor to his race. What is an inalienable right? Why, one that no government has any right to take away, unless forfeited by crime; and which the possessor himself has no right to part with. The Southern slaveholders knew what they were about when they declared by law that a slave, whether as white as snow, or as black as jet, was not a person, but a thing. Of all living beings on earth we can predicate personality only of man, because man cannot be made property of, and be liable to all the incidents of property. Now, when a government is so prostituted and perverted that, instead of devoting itself to securing to the people the enjoyment of their natural rights, it tramples those rights, and their owners, into the dust, the people are bound, in fealty to themselvs, to revolutionize the government, and make it accomplish the end of its existence, provided there is a reasonable prospect of success. If there be none, submission is a duty of policy, as well as necessity. The people of Russia are "subjects;" that is, men cast down on the ground by the hand of the oppressor, and under his foot are subdued. They hav, therefore, the right, provided that in the exercise of it they do not unnecessarily slaughter themselvs and others, to do execution upon the tyrant, and put him to death. This is the sentiment and conviction of the Nihilists, and they seem to hav counted the cost. And it will not do for an American who has Revolutionary blood in his veins to condemn these heroic men and women who deliberately accept the alternativ of liberty or death.

The Irish, in their abortiv struggles to regain their ancient independence, prove themselvs to be a peculiar race of people. There seems to be an inherent vice in their character, which leads them to blunder in all their revolutionary attempts; and what is worse, and applies to no other people on earth, they betray each other. During our seven years' war with England for our independence, we produced only one traitor. The Tories believed in monarchy and hated republicanism. But when the Declaration of Independence was made, and was backed by the overwhelming majority of the colonists, they should hav quietly retired across the lines, or hav been scrupulously neutral. But Arnold, after shedding his blood in the cause of liberty, was base enough to betray it, and allowed his gallant coadjutor, Andre, to die, instead of himself. Russian Nihilism, so far as I hav learned, has produced but one traitor. We cannot say as much for Ireland. The murder of Burke and Cavendish, at Dublin, was an Irish blunder, as well as a crime; and this, with the betrayals of Carey and others, seems to raise the question whether the Irish are not utterly incapable of managing their own affairs, or even originating a wise plan to secure their independence. The late misunderstanding between Parnell and Davitt lends additional strength to what I hav said. The natural traits in the character of the Irish people are excellent. Ethnologically they are superior to the English. The attributes which hav made them political abortionists and traitors hav been superinduced by their religion, and will forever keep them in bondage to the English government, unless they throw it off. The men whom Carey betrayed to the halter were not Protestants whose religion he hated worse than the tyranny of the British rule. They were as devoted Catholics as he was. Yet he went over to the enemy he had cursed the day before, and surrendered them into the hands of the executioner. I say, we must look for this dastardly trait of character deeper than their blood. The Nihilists do not betray each other. They are all Infidels to the cursed religion of the country; and the courage and conscientiousness which enable a man to throw off the degrading bondage of superstition bring out all the manliness of a man. No priest, armed with the doctrin of hell-fire, can hav any influence on a Nihilist to betray his associates. He hates, not only the despot who oppresses, but the cruel religion which justifies him in his despotism, and requires his subjects to submit, because the despot is the "minister of God," and those who resist his authority shall receive to themselvs damnation.

The Irish are all Catholics. A true Catholic has surrendered everything into the hands of his priest, in the firm belief that the priest can open the gates of heaven to him, or shut them against his entrance, at his own pleasure. And the British government, knowing this to be the case, plays, first, upon the pope and cardinals, who play upon the bishops, who play upon the priest, who, at the confessional, extorts all secrets from his confiding dupes, and keeps their consciences in his pocket, to be used as so much money for the advancement of the church. Rome would sacrifice a dozen Irelands, if, by so doing, she could accomplish her present object of regaining the position she held in England before the Reformation. And this explains the meaning of Cardinal Manning's constant visitations to the pope during the late, and present, Irish troubles. He is the unofficial, yet real, agent of the British government, paid, no doubt, out of the secret service fund, to get the pope's influence in keeping Ireland as a subject province, to be ever consumed by hungry landlords and priests. Hence, when the Irish Sisyphus rolls the stone of successful revolt nearly to the top of the hill, where the ground is level, some Catholic traitor appears upon the scene, who will betray the cause and its advocates, and send the stone rolling down again! If, by miracle, five millions of Americans could take the places of the five millions of Irish papists who now occupy that island, the world would see, in less than three hundred and sixty-five days, what dynamite would do in the way of redressing grievances. The Yankees would use this weapon so wisely and so effectually that the oppressor would soon come to terms, and be willing to giv them their rights.

Every one has observed that few sympathize with the Irish in their present struggle, either among the English oppressed classes or the people of the United States. The reason is that their long spiritual bondage to the church, in which they seem to glory, has taken away their manhood to such a degree that no faith can be put either in their wisdom to devise, or their fidelity to execute, a comprehensiv plan of revolt.

If any one is disposed to condemn the tone of this article, let me remind him that I hav the verdict of the world in favor of my side of the question. Nations by their extradition treaties and laws will surrender up thieves, murderers, and other criminals, who take refuge in their territories, but they will not surrender political offenders, even though, in their revolutionary attempts, they may unintentionally destroy life. England herself, during the Napoleonic reigns, would never giv up political refugees. Even in the late rebellion in this country—one of the most causeless and unjustifiable movements that ever took place—as soon as it assumed national proportions, and professed to be contending for political rights, the government could not put its prisoners of war to death as rioters and rebels, but were compelled to adopt the principle of exchange. And we Americans would laugh to scorn the proposal of Russia, Germany, or England, if any of them would make it, to giv up for trial and punishment men who, in the agony of despair, hav attacked the governments which oppressed them, and, failing therein, hav sought the protection of our flag.

Then, hurrah for dynamite! Only let it be used in such a way as will not strike down the innocent with the guilty.

Enon Valley, Pa., Oct. 1, 1884.

Over one hundred paupers are buried each month in the pauper cemetery of Kings county (comprising the city of Brooklyn), N. Y. The cost of coffins alone is over $3,000 a year, and the ground is becoming rapidly overcrowded. In view of these facts, two of the charity commissioners favor cremation, and will recommend to the board of supervisors to spend $5,000 in the erection of a crematory.

CLAIRVOYANCE.

DEAR FRIENDS: Sept. 23d I went to see Mrs. E. W. Mills, clairvoyant and spiritual medium, 286 Ewen st., Brooklyn. I had no idea of getting anything more than mere twaddle, for I had never really believed in clairvoyance. But I was surprised, astonished, and bewildered. She took me by the hands and said: "When I saw you I took you for an old maid, but I see you are married, hav two children, and one miscarriage." I mention the last fact because she could not hav obtained it from the press, as she might the former. She told my age when married, and many facts of my past life; some that would apply to most lives, and some too personal for any but my own; gave names (first asking the initial letter), dates, and minutia; telling who of my family was alive and who dead; prophesied I would liv to be a widow; gave two or three other prophecies which time alone will prove true or untrue. She charged one dollar, and I felt it was well spent, as I found proof of mind reading mind, and, I think, something a little beyond that, but nothing to me as a test that the dead liv; though in us there may be traces enough of our dead to giv to others the power of partially discerning them as they were. I hav penned it all and laid it away, and if occasion warrants it will tell you if the prophecies be fulfilled. My hope is that they may not be, yet we do not know what is best for us or for others; though we do know that we must accept what comes, and should seek from it our highest good.

Sept. 25th.—Another cool day and pleasant morning. I hav been two days in New York, hav seen and talked with a great many new friends and old ones, and find but a small number among them all who do not believe in spiritual phenomena or facts. They do not know what it is, but they hav so much incontrovertible proof of something out of themselvs that tells facts no one but themselvs can know; they see forms so much resembling their dead, and others see the same forms at the same time; and the same forms are seen at widely diverse seances and dressed the same; and they get them just identical when alone, that they are confounded and bewildered; and many, like Chainey, are convinced that the dead liv. I walked miles yesterday to addresses given me as those of mediums, but failed to find one who was practicing; some sick, some out, some going or gone to Europe. I walked till I was ready to drop; but the day was not lost, for I had a two hour's talk with a doctor who has had thirty years' experience of Spiritualism. She gave me the full history of it all, and on her solemn oath pronounced it true. All her friends call her more than honest. I am called clairvoyant as regards knowing and judging people at sight, and I call her honest. If one-tenth she told was real, it is marvelous. She even made herself a cabinet, so fearful was she of fraud. She never gave any but home seances and free ones, so there was no money in it for her. She got the same forms privately that came to her at seances of others, and dressed the same; her mother always wearing a short nightgown and a nightcap, and all present seeing her just the same; so you see the form was no phantom. If I see my mother here, and others see her, and I again see her in Snowville, and people there see her, and we all compare notes and prove it the same, you will understand it to be a real thing, however created, ormed, or seen, and messages from her just as correct and natural in each place. I shall stay as long as my bit of money will allow. I am not satisfied with half-way seeing. I hope to learn more. I hav no proof yet that the dead liv.

SPIRITS, OR WHAT?

September 26th I went to THE TRUTH SEEKER office; saw Eugene and had a pleasant talk with him, and then his brother George took me to his mother's. I found her in cozy, pleasant rooms and doing her own work. She met me with a friendly, cordial greeting, and I felt as if I had known her for years.

Mr. Bennett's mild, benevolent face looked down upon us from the wall (a duplicate of the one upon his tomb). I ate a good family dinner with them, and then, while Mrs. Macdonald was washing dishes and "ridding up," we had a nice sociable gossip—all about Chainey and the Convention, and about others of our notables and their doings and sayings. I don't like scandals and slanders, but I do like a good friendly gossip about people as they are—people at home and off of their stilts.

She took me to a prophetic medium, Mrs. M. C. Morrell; I had a sitting, and it was a pleasant and agreeable one, though she got no real tests for me. She gave me much that Mrs. Mills did, promising or prophesying long life, and saying that, though I had done a great work, my life-work was hardly begun; that she saw a great book (measuring some two-and-a-half feet that I would yet write—that I would do that much writing); that I was an inspirational writer and very mediumistic and could impress people to think as I did; that in three months I should be working in the Spiritual ranks, though still in my own legitimate field; that my father and other wise heads that had had gone before were helping me; that spirits were crowding thick around me—she described several, but I could recognize none; some names hit, some did not. She impressed me favorably, was simply dressed, and a perfect lady; says she has made hundreds of prophecies and never failed in one when she assured a person it would happen. If any friend who reads this has known of a failure, please aid truth by letting me know of it. She charged me nothing, but as she had been burnt out and needed money, I could not do less than insist on her taking a dollar as other mediums do. I never want something for nothing when it is possible to pay or to return the favor.

In the evening, at eight, myself and two friends went to a materializing seance at Mrs. Stoddard Gray's. We found large and pleasant rooms and nice, genteel people. There was some twenty-five or thirty in the audience. We had full chance to examin the room and cabinet; all seemed plain and square. We sat in two lines of chairs, alternating men and women as far as they could, and then formed a circle by holding hands. The medium made a short address and explanation, then all light was excluded and we sat in total darkness fifteen or twenty minutes; heard noises of trumpet, bells, banjo, etc. The son was cabinet-medium—a young man of twenty-five or thereabouts; he looked weird, but evidently knew his business pretty well. Great numbers of spirits came out—Joan of Arc, old Egyptian spirits, spirits of friends of the audience, some of which were recognized(?). Many materializations seemed to rise from the floor only a few feet from us. We could see a white, misty appearance, like illusion, or fine lace, slowly piling up—growing—and all at once a light female form clothed in a white veil and robe would shoot into full hight and come clear out and show herself, lift her veil, etc. They would take flags and bracelets and other things in their hands, so they were not shadows, but real persons—whether from the cabinet or some other place deponent saeth not. No test came to me from all the ghosts, but after that was over the son medium came out and full gas was turned on from several jets, and it was lighter than day. We were each one of us given a square piece of printer's paper (so as to hav it unglazed), and were told to write to a dead friend; write as if to a living one and ask questions; then fold the squares so that if cut in the folds there would be thirty-two pieces (the writing inside, of course). These were, one by one, handed by the writer to the medium; he would hold it a minute or two to his forehead, and then write on a clean square the reply. If desired, Mrs. Gray would read these aloud, or the owner might do so. In every case the question was answered, or a direct reference made to it, showing that the medium knew its contents—had read the note while folded and pressed to his forehead. My note was this:

DEAR MOTHER: If it be possible, I shall be glad of a line in thy familiar hand; and giv me some test that it is thyself by signing thy maiden name. ELMINA.

The reply was:

DEAR CHILD: You shall hear from me, but not in my handwriting. I am your living truly mother.

Truly, MOTHER.

Now, the fact that he knew I wrote to mother instead of Bennett, as I thought of doing, and that he mentioned handwriting, shows that he knew what I wrote; but no proof of mother there. None of her style—not even Quaker language. I wonder he overlooked that. I asked for her name as a test. The boy refused, saying he was too tired. His mother urged it, and so did others, but I think he could not giv it.

While I am getting proof of clairvoyance and mind-reading, and perhaps more, I see no proof of continued existence after death. I hav five dollars yet for seances, and then I am done. Mansfield is gone, and so is Bliss. But Mrs. Gray is as good at reading sealed letters as anyone (or rather her son is). But I can't find a slate-writer. Meantime, I'm doing, hearing, and seeing all I can, and with the aid of friends, who are kind and helpful.

A RED-LETTER DAY.

I hav just had a perfect day—not with spirits out of the flesh, but with the real and tangible.

A medical friend came and took me through Bellevue Hospital. I saw specimens of all the diseases and deformities flesh is heir to; some preserved in alcohol, and some made of wax, and my friend, being a physician, could explain all, so I understood what I saw. How terrible it is to think of what poor humanity has to endure, and to know that not the one-thousandth part of it is a necessity—that it might be avoided by moral and hygienic living—by true heredity and good teaching.

In the afternoon another friend went with me to the Eden Musèe. It was a perfect mine of interest and instruction. Hundreds of notables in tableaux, all in wax, and so perfect they would deceive the very elect. After three or four deceptions in thinking wax persons real ones, I grew so wise that I took real ones for wax, as did lots of the audience. We saw Sitting Bull, who killed Custer, and half a dozen more live Indians from Dakota, and heard a good lecture on civilizing the Indians, so they could take care of themselvs. The "Chamber of Horrors" contained tableaux of Guiteau in his cell, Stanley on his explorations, the scalpers, cannibals, lynchers, the knout, the guillotine, etc., each in its original surroundings. Above this were all our presidential candidates, Butler, too, as in life, all looking so real. Lincoln, Victor Hugo, Robert Fulton, Grant, actresses, musicians, and all were there, so you felt as if you had really seen each person. If any of you go to New York, don't fail to go in this Eden. It is better than any museum I ever saw. It is real life-history. All are dressed by the best costumers in full natural suits as in life. A whole year of travels would not show you as much variety as this Edenic glimps. In the galleries are fifty large hereoscopes, containing two thousand views of the most remarkable places in the world, large as in life-size.

TO BOSTON.

Sept. 28th.—I hav as yet only received a few dollars towards my trip to see spirit manifestations. Francis D. Lacy has sent me $25, as he promised; a few others hav sent a few dollars. I intended to make up the great balance of it myself. I hav walked till wearied and exhausted to save five cents car-fare, and eaten at ten-cent restaurants, and often but one square meal a day, so as to save money to visit mediums.

I hav seen all I could in New York and Brooklyn, but havn't found one slate-writer, nor can any of my Spiritual friends find one for me. So I am compelled to go to Boston. I did not want to, but I can't go home and leave my work only part done. I shall go, and trust to fate or friends for funds to go back on; and I rarely fail to get help when it is really needed. I am impressed to go. I was wakened at 3 o'clock this morning by something telling me to "Go to Boston." Perhaps (?) that impression was caused by a letter from a friend there offering me a home while I was searching for "spirits of just men made perfect," and by another sending me an address of a slate-writing medium there. I shall do my best to see it all. I hav not spent a penny for personal pleasure since I left home. Friends hav taken me to see noted places and paid expenses. Each trip helps me to enlarge my view of things and broaden my mind.

I hav seen no proof yet of eternal existence, but I think I hav of clairvoyance or mind-reading, and may of continued identity. I shall wait till I see all before I conclude which way to jump, but when all is done you shall hav clean facts, as I see them, let it be for or against.

If any of you choose to help me by sending twenty-five cents or a dollar, send it to my address in Snowville, and it will find me, wherever I am.

CHAINEY.

So many are asking me what I think of Chainey that I will say here, for all inquirers, that I was surprised at his sudden acceptance of the spiritual phenomena as proof of continued personal identity, but I had no word of blame or condemnation for him. He went, he saw, and he believed. Perhaps I, too, may do the same, though I do not expect it. But I am sure if I should accept this ism as true, I should not be one whit the better woman, morally or physically. I pride myself as much on doing right and being good and true, as a Materialist, as I possibly could if I were a believer in immortal identity. If self-love, love for our children, our husbands, our wives, our relativs, neighbors, and friends, and love for our race, would not keep us from physical abuse and moral evils, I am sure no form of religion could possibly do it for any length of time.

I read Chainey's beautiful address in last TRUTH SEEKER, and hope he will forgiv me for feeling that it was not the satisfying food I hav heretofore found in his utterances. I hav so long looked upon him as one of our lights, and as a dear personal friend, that I could not keep back the tears when I learned that he had run into dissipation because of the old false plea, "Eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow ye die." I think his strong fund of good sense will show him his mistake, and his sterling honesty will make him acknowledge it.

Materialism is what we make it. We can make it build up the moral and physical being, and fill the earth with love, beauty, harmony, and song. Or we can make it cold, austere, and lifeless. It is the sweet influences we bring around any belief that giv it the beauty and estheticism. With a little change, I re-quote from his quotation: "To thine own self be true. Do the task that lies nearest. Follow the truth thou seest. Open thy heart to beauty. Make good works thy duty." ELMINA.

PARKER PILLSBURY paid a flying visit to Cleveland, after attending the League Congress, where he was pleasantly surprised by an informal reception given him by a few of the friends of Liberalism, at the residence of Thomas Lees, several members of the city press being present. Mr. Lees writes to the Banner, that the veteran reformer, notwithstanding his late serious sickness, looked remarkably well, and hopes and expects under the regime of Theosophy to work for some years in a quiet way in the reform work.

THE French Senate has adopted a clause abolishing prayers at the beginning of its sessions.

An Annual for 1885.

We would call attention to a passage that occurs in the Introductory to the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1884, reading as follows:

"The editor cordially invites correspondence upon such events as shall come to light in the researches of Freethinking students. American incidents, with names and dates, are particularly desired. Such gathered facts will be carefully preserved, and gratefully used in future Annuals. Accuracy in these matters is, of course, essential."

League for the Protection of Personal Liberty.

Wisconsin, and especially its large cities, is thickly settled with Germans—who, as a rule, are the very best of citizens. They interfere with no one's religious views, educate their children, hardly ever become burdens on the public, are devoted to America, and extremely interested in having good government. But they are nearly all Freethinkers, and most of them drink beer. Not only do they not support the churches, but they persist in making Sunday a holiday, a day of healthful recreation and amusement, of jollity and song.

In thus introducing the "continental Sabbath" into the state of their adoption, our German friends hav offended their high mightinesses, the Christians, who cannot bear that another should enjoy himself on Sunday unless it be in the contemplation of the world's woes and the pleasurable certainty that nine-tenths of the people on the globe are bound directly for hell. The Christians hav, therefore, manipulated the legislature of Wisconsin, as church lobbyists well know how, and obtained the passage of "Sunday laws," in violation of the natural rights of non-Christians, and prohibition statutes, to the especial annoyance of the Germans.

So far hav these encroachments extended that the formation of a league for the protection of personal liberty has been completed by the citizens of Milwaukee county, which League proposes that in future no man shall be elected to the Wisconsin legislature from that county who is not pledged to work and vote for the repeal of Sunday and prohibition laws. The League now numbers ten thousand. Its special purpose and object is, to quote its constitution, "to prevent, by energetic and organized opposition, any attempts of the Sunday and prohibition fanatics to accomplish their ends, which consist in the revival of antiquated laws that are in conflict with the fundamental principles of the republic and the spirit of the times. It also proposes to do everything in its power to secure the election of such representativs and legislators as can be relied upon to oppose, energetically and faithfully, the passage of any such Sunday or prohibition laws, and to use all their influence to repeal laws trespassing on the liberty of conscience and the personal rights of individual citizens."

For each Assembly (legislativ) district the League appoints an "agitation committee," to which it issues the following instructions:

"1. The agitation committees are to exert their influence upon all parties activly engaged in elections, in favor of the aims advocated by the League, and particularly to see to it that only such candidates are nominated for the Assembly who, if elected, will work in their legislativ capacity for the interests of the League.

"2. Immediately after a nomination for the state legislature has been made by any party, the agitation committees shall call on the candidate, acquaint him with the objects of the League, and ask him for a written declaration concerning his position with reference to the League. Blanks for pledges will be prepared by the executiv committee, and supplied to the agitation committees.

"3. The agitation committees shall at once report the result of their interviews with candidates to the chairman of the executiv committee (C. Hermann Boppe, 470 East Water street), so as to giv the executiv committee an opportunity of informing the voters, by means of the daily papers, concerning the position taken by the several candidates with regard to the League.

"4. In Assembly districts where there is danger of opposition candidates being nominated by either party, the agitation committee should labor for the timely organization of clubs, as members of which all legal voters might be admitted who, without regard to other party affiliations, favor the election of Liberal-minded members of the legislature. The formation of such clubs in general is to be recommended for every Assembly district.

"5. Should it become necessary for the League, in any Assembly district, to put up a candidate of its own, or to favor or oppose a certain candidate, the executiv committee of the League and the district agitation committee shall jointly adopt all measures necessary for securing success at the ballot box. In case the League is obliged to nominate a candidate of its own, the agitation committee shall, in time, recommend suitable persons to the executiv committee.

"6. On election day, the agitation committee shall see to it that representativs of the League are stationed at every poll."

This agitation committee, besides its general propagandist work, "goes for" the candidates of the several parties with these questions:

"Dear Sir: You hav been nominated as candidate for the Assembly (State Senate), and since the 'League for the Protection of Personal Liberty,' of which eighty societies with at least 10,000 members in the county of Milwaukee hav become members, is firmly resolved to support, on election day, only such candidates as hav pledged themselvs, in writing, to use, if elected, their utmost endeavors in furthering the objects of the League, we submit to you the following questions:

"1. If elected, will you, in your capacity as member of the Wisconsin State Legislature, oppose energetically and faithfully all attempts at the passage of Sunday or prohibition laws?

"2. Will you, furthermore, use all your influence to secure the repeal of existing obnoxious laws trespassing on the liberty of conscience and the personal rights of individual citizens?

"3. Do you pledge yourself to comply, in your legislativ capacity, with all just demands of the 'League for the Protection of Personal Liberty' according to your best knowledge and ability? And in case the League desires to address memorials, bills, etc., to the Legislature, do you pledge yourself to transmit and advocate the same?

"Should you be disposed to answer these questions in the affirmativ, we respectfully ask you to let us know by return mail. Only those candidates who giv us a written pledge that they will work for the principles and aims of the League in case of their election, will receive our support on election day."

With the questions is inclosed this agreement for the candidate to sign:

"I, the undersigned, candidate for the Wisconsin Assembly (State Senate), do hereby answer affirmativly the questions submitted to me by the Executiv Committee of the 'League for the Protection of Personal Liberty,' and pledge myself to use all means within my power to advance the aims and principles embodied in the Constitution of the League."

It is contemplated to expand the organization into a state society, and it is confidently expected to become a power sufficient to effectivly oppose all attempts to curtail the freedom of individuals to enjoy themselvs in their own way. The Milwaukee Germans—an immense majority of whom are Freethinkers—are a live body of men and women, and the voters among them can be relied on to carry their state for the free religious amendment which will be submitted to the states when the National Liberal League shall become strong enough to obtain the necessary initial resolutions from Congress. This League would doubtless support all the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and certainly the National Liberal League would aid in any attempt to repeal existing Christian Sunday laws.

Appropriations for Sectarian Purposes.

The facts asked for in the subjoined letter should hav been furnished earlier, but absence at Cassadaga, and press of matters since, hav prevented:

EUREKA, WIS., Aug. 13, 1884.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I notice in the last TRUTH SEEKER, in an editorial on "Politics," after speaking of Gov. Cleveland's veto of the Catholic Protectorate, you say: "If Gov. Cleveland honestly held these views, and has the courage of his convictions, it is surprising he did not veto all the sectarian appropriations, instead of just this extra one for the Protectory." This is equivalent to a charge that he has not; a very damaging charge if true; for the rule he has established, during his administration as governor, seems to be that "all public money must be applied for public purposes." Has he violated his own rule? The facts should be known; and I suppose you are in a position to know, or to obtain, the facts in the case. Has the New York legislature passed any bill appropriating money for sectarian purposes, which the governor approved? Now, please, giv us the facts.

Yours truly, C. B. ROUNDS.

This state regularly aids "charitable" institutions by a per capita payment on the number of inmates committed to such by state officers.

But the main chance for religious thievery in New York comes through this city, and the money from its treasury. The bills authorizing the payment of money to the Catholic Protectory, New York Orphan Asylum (Protestant), and other places of the kind, must be signed by the governor of the state, for the city is not autonomous, but is dependent upon the legislature for the privilege of spending its own money. Mr. Cleveland signed the Supply bill, less the item mentioned, which included the sums for the per capita payments to religious institutions. In doing this, we hold, he violated his own rule.

The Campbellites.

This writer of the following is interested in a waning sect:

FLYNN'S LICK, JACKSON CO., TENN., Aug. 22, 1884.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Can you please inform me when and who were the founders of the Campbellite church, which is now called the Christian church? And what will it be worth? GEORGE ROGERS.

The "Campbellites," or "Christians," or "Disciples of Christ," or "church of Christ," as they variously call themselvs, owe their sectarian existence to Alexander Campbell, who was born in Ireland, in 1788, and came to this country in 1809. He died March 4, 1866.

Mr. Campbell's idea, in preaching his ism, was the restoration of Christianity to apostolic practices. His first church was at Brush Run, Washington Co., Pa. The Campbellites, though rejecting the trinitarian terminology, are essentially like other sects in their opinions of Christ and the resurrection.

This is worth a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Papal Humbug.

Leo PP. XIII. has issued an encyclical letter from Rome on the subjects of the Rosary of Mary and the Asiatic cholera. An encyclical letter is one intended for general circulation, something like a circular from the chairman of a campaign committee or the general order of a military officer. "In times of difficulty," writes Pope Leo, "it has been the wont of our predecessors to hav recourse with increased fervor to the blessed virgin. Inasmuch as the enemies of Christianity," he continues, "are so stubborn in their aims, its defenders must be equally stanch." To overcome this pressure of unbelief, therefore, his holiness has deemed it his duty to "exhort again this year the people of Christendom to persevere in that formula of prayer known as the Rosary, and thereby to merit the patronage of the great mother of God." That is to say, the church, the bride of Christ, should gain the co-operation of her mother-in-law, the virgin. Very few brides can claim a virgin for a mother-in-law—but that is not to the point. With the intercession thus to be prayed for, it is the opinion of the pope, otherwise known as Joachim Pecci, that the hosts of Infidelity will be substantially vanquished.

With respect to the cholera, it is also "necessary to implore the intercession of the most powerful virgin." "Under God's will" this scourge has spread to Italian soil; and whereas the will of God does not in this instance happen to be the will of the church, the pope has therefore

"Resolved, That in this coming month of October, from the 1st of October to the 2d of November following, in all the parish churches, in all public churches dedicated to the mother of God, or in such as are appointed by the ordinary, five decades at least of the Rosary be recited, together with the Litany. If in the morning, the Holy Sacrifice will take place during these prayers; if in the evening, the Blessed Sacrament will be exposed for the adoration of the faithful. To all those who shall hav assisted on the prescribed days at the public recital of the Rosary, and hav prayed for our intentions—to all those also who from legitimate causes hav been compelled to do so in private—we grant for each occasion an indulgence of seven years and seven times forty days. To those who in the prescribed space of time shall hav performed these devotions at least ten times—either publicly in the churches or from just causes in the privacy of their homes—and shall hav expiated their sins by confession and hav received communion at the altar, we grant from the treasury of the church a plenary indulgence. We also grant this full forgivness of sins and plenary remission of punishment to all those who, either on the Feast day itself of our Blessed Lady of the Rosary, or on any day within the subsequent eight days, shall hav washed the stains from their souls and hav holily partaken of the divine banquet, and shall hav also prayed in any church to God and his most holy mother for our intentions. As we desire also to consult the interests of those who are in country districts, and are hindered, especially in the month of October, by their agricultural labors, we permit all we hav above decreed, and also the holy indulgences gainable in the month of October, to be postponed to the following months of November or December, according to the prudent decision of the ordinaries."

So runs the rigmarole of the pope, who closes with the remark that he "doubts not that rich and abundant fruits will be the result of these efforts." Christian people charge that the heathen in his blindness bows down to wood and stone. The Catholics do worse. They bow down and listen with sober faces to a masquerading clown—Pope Leo XIII.

Editorial Notes.

Mr. A. P. Miller, of the Worthington Advance, is a Freethinker and anti-Prohibitionist. Mr. James G. Clark, of the Minneapolis Spectator, is also a Freethinker. But the two gentlemen view some questions from different standpoints, Mr. Clark being an upholder of St. John's party. Mr. Miller made a speech once in which he quoted prophecy to show that the man with the gospel name had a platform dangerous to the welfare of his country. Mr. Clark pleasantly remarked that Mr. Miller was crazy. In self-defense the latter asserts that "the Prohibition party, as distinguished from the Prohibition principle, is first, last, and all the time, the God-in-the-Constitution party. This is put first in their platforms, this crops out in their resolutions and speeches as the first object to be attained, prohibition being but one object of the party. The amending of the Constitution, so as to make this a 'Christian government,' and unite church and state, is their purpose. They even place Sunday laws before liquor laws in their demand. We are thoroughy imbued," he continues, "with the idea that there is now forming under the ribs of the old parties, and in the vitals of the nation, the most dangerous party that has ever been organized in America. This is the so-called Prohibition party. The prohibition cry is a cheat and a blind to mislead temperance men into supporting a union of church and state. 'The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau.' And these hands are to be laid on the Constitution and the government, and America is to be put back among the European monarchies, and the spirit of the old Puritan laws is to prevail over the whole nation. This is what they are aiming at, and at the rate the party is gaining ground, it will soon succeed, unless the people are aroused to resist it. The editor of the Advance is 'crazy' on other subjects than anti-Prohibition. Many church fanatics think us 'mad as a March hare' on those very subjects upon which Mr. Clark agrees with us, and for which he is working with us shoulder to shoulder. But we are proud of our 'madness,' and proclaim it freely on all occasions, for it puts us in the ranks and in the same category with those who hav reformed the world, from Paul to Garrison. Every man of them was 'crazy' in the eyes of the purblind world around him. But their 'insanity' was communicated to others, and the world became 'crazy' also. The insanity of one age is the sanity of the next. Those who dare to be 'crazy' to-day will rule the minds of men to-morrow. But not everyone can afford to be 'crazy.' Insanity and the scaffold rule the future, and 'behind the dim unknown, stands our God within the shadows keeping watch above his own'—lunatics."

A dispatch from Syracuse of Aug. 9th to the Times of this city givs the following account of a curious crank who once held a debate with Mr. Bennett in these columns, which is published under the title of the "Bennett-Teed Discussion:"

"Dr. Cyrus R. Teed has an office in West Onondaga street, in this city, which is considered one of the most aristocratic streets in the city. He has been here for only a few years, but has gained a lucrativ practice among some of the best people in the city. In the official register Dr. Teed givs his birthplace as Walton, N. Y., Oct. 13, 1839, and says that his diploma was given him at the Eclectic Medical College of New York in February, 1868. His brother, who is also practicing with him, givs his name as O. F. Teed, and says that he was graduated by the Philadelphia National Eclectic Medical Association in 1868. Mrs. Charles Cobb, a member of the Plymouth Congregational church here, has been treated by Dr. Teed for nervous prostration. She charges him with obtaining money from her and from her mother, Mrs. Willis, of Camden, N. Y., under the plea that he is 'Second Christ.' Dr. Teed claims that he is now the prophet Cyrus, who, according to the prophecy in Isaiah xiv, 12, was to appear on earth. He also claims that when he was thirty years of age he received divine manifestations, and that when he is forty-six he will be translated to heaven, whence he will return in fifty days to found a kingdom where all will be love. By love he means only mind love of great purity and elevation. Those who follow him as the great exponent of this belief will liv forever in this world. Dr. Teed has been publishing a daily paper called the Herald of the Messenger of the New Covenant of the New Jerusalem, at both Moravia, N. Y., and at Sandy Creek, N. Y. When he was in Moravia it was supposed that he was at the head of an establishment after the order of the Oneida Community. He lived in a house just outside of the village. It was said that he had eloped with Mrs. Ella Wolsely, whose husband keeps a livery stable in Moravia. District Attorney Lewis says that he was consulted in regard to the matter. He is ready to proceed legally against Dr. Teed for obtaining money under false pretenses at any time. Dr. Teed, in his own behalf, says that he can prove by biblical and scientific lore that he is the prophet Cyrus. He is indorsed by the Rev. J. H. Clymer, the pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal church here."

It seems that all of Mr. Bennett's clerical antagonists are fallible. The charges against Mr. Humphrey we chronicled some months ago. What is the matter with these fellows? Are the wicked Christians the only ones with energy enough to defend their faith?

The Methodists attribute the disease of insanity mainly to Spiritualism; Neal Dow points to intemperance as the first cause of it; the daily papers are deprecating over-study as a fruitful source of the evil, while Talmage goes ahead of them all and holds modern Infidelity responsible for every unbalanced mind. These are chiefly mere generalizations. We would like to submit a fact without comment from the Indianapolis, Ind., People. It is not an isolated case, but is the one latest at hand. The account reads: "A young woman named Kitty Marshall, has for some time lived as a domestic in the family of Dr. Abbett, at 854 North Pennsylvania street. On last Wednesday morning she left the house at a very early hour without assigning any reason. The family hav for some time past suspected her mind to be unbalanced. The cause of her malady seemed to be religious excitement. At about three o'clock on Wednesday afternoon George Wooten found Kitty lying between the rails of the I. B. & W. road, west of the city. He attempted to raise her, but she screamed and clung to the ties with such strength that five men could scarcely release her grasp. In a fainting condition she was conveyed to the station house by Flanner & Hommown, where as soon as tranquilized she began speaking of her religious convictions. She said she left Dr. Abbett's house to go to the mountains to pray and laid down on the rail as a test to her faith."

In quoting from Saladin's paper, published in The Truth Seeker of September 27th, the Catholic Union and Times says: "There is no longer any fight between Protestantism and the church. The battle has long ago been fought and won. The sects indeed hav still a sort of nominal existence; but their members stand upon a believe-as-you-please sort of platform. Begotten in negation, and nursed in passion and confusion, the Protestant principle of private interpretation of scripture in its last analysis, logically leads to Infidelity. Hence thoughtful and God-fearing men, outside the church, hav long since seen and deplored the inherent weakness of Protestantism and its utter inability to grapple with the growing and defiant spirit of unbelief. And many of those men, with the reverence for revealed religion, hav involuntarily, as it were, turned to the rock-founded church of Christ as the only hope of beating back the daily-swelling tide of all-destroying Infidelity. The present battle then is between the church and Infidelity. Protestantism takes no part in it. Its cohorts are either away in the rear or sick in the hospitals. And that the Infidel enemy regards it with contempt, entirely unworthy of its notice, appears from a paper by W. Stewart Ross, editor of the London Secular Review, read at the recent Cassadaga Lake Freethinkers' Convention."

The Rev. F. Mason North deprecates too close an analysis of the Bible. Some of the texts which hav become the shiboleth of contending sects, he holds it probable, were merely incidental and not important. "Over-analysis," says Mr. Mason, "often mars beauty." He further holds that some phrases should not hav been given the conspicuousness of paragraphs. No instances are cited, but something like this may hav been referred to: Exodus xx, 13—"Thou shalt not kill;" Exodus xxii, 27—"Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side and slay every man his brother." True, true! If these passages had been "run in" so that they would be less easily distinguishable, great trouble would be avoided. But if this plan were to be adopted as to the absurdities of the Bible, what would become of its so-called beauties? It is best, after all, to take the Bible for what it is worth, and let it go at that. Meanwhile, it is every person's duty to help destroy a superstitious belief in this book, which, after contradicting nearly every fact known to science, proves its own unreliability in a hundred places by contradicting itself.

Our Asiatic contemporary, the Philosophic Inquirer, of Madras, reads The Truth Seeker diligently. In the last number of that journal which has reached these shores we find the following note of approbation:

"The New York Truth Seeker for July 5th continues from the talented pen of Chas. B. Reynolds, 'Facts and Fallacies in Regard to the New Testament,' and contains an interesting account of Mr. Bradlaugh 'Aiding a Nihilist.' And this important Freethought organ, the boldest in the New World, has the following observation on the Bradlaugh case: 'Mr. Bradlaugh is in no wise daunted, and the unequal struggle of one man against the great English government will be continued while life holds, or until the victory is won.' True! Freethinkers all over the world owe a debt of gratitude to The Truth Seeker Company, for the really admirable lithographic engraving of the Bennett monument erected by the late Mr. Bennett's one thousand devoted friends, which is inclosed in The Truth Seeker issue for June 28th; and the engraving is so very good as to induce each and every friend and admirer of Bennett to ornament his and her home with the lithograph of the same in an appropriate frame."

May the Inquirer always be as well pleased with our work!

The editor of the Independent, writing an article on the religion of humanity, among numerous misleading statements, interjects the following:

"The audacity of Comte in claiming originality for his system is only equaled by the audacity of his disciples in claiming what is best in modern society and science, and ethics and government, for Positivism. Eighteen hundred years before Comte, Christianity taught the principle which Mr. Harrison claims as the essence of the religion of humanity, 'Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.'"

If Comte's disciples are audacious in adopting a principle which is thousands of years old, what shall be said of Christian religionists who hav travestied the Golden Rule of Confucius, and attributed it to Christ as original? Centuries before the Christian religion was heard of, the Chinese philosopher wrote, "Do unto another what you would he should do unto you." That saying is as old as history, and will probably be regarded as a useful guide of life "when everything connected with Christianity, except its crimes, has been forgotten."

To break the force of Remsburg's forthcoming work on "Bible Morals," the Christians of Ohio are now circulating what purports to be a stenographic report of this address as delivered at Ludlow Falls some time since. In this pamphlet Mr. Remsburg is made to say about everything he did not say, while not a single sentence uttered by him has been reported. Dr. Brandon, of Laura, O., has already ordered thirty copies of our edition of "Bible Morals," which he will circulate in connection with this orthodox report. This will serve to nail the arguments Mr. Remsburg makes in his work respecting Christian veracity and honesty.

Mr. Seaver holds out his hand to Canada with this greeting: "We learn from the New York Truth Seeker that Mr. Watts has commenced his Freethought lecturing in Toronto and Hamilton (Canada), and been very well received. He is able, attractiv, and popular, and cannot fail to prove a great help to the Liberal movement. The Christian papers in Toronto hav already begun their attacks upon him, and this fact shows that he is sowing the right kind of secular seed, of which there is considerable scarcity throughout Canada. But she can be regenerated in course of time, and the work appears to hav commenced."

Bishop Warren is continuing his scientific essays. In his latest effulgence he avers that "the heavens about him are shining stairs up which his soul may climb, and hang his mental trapeze between Arcturus and the Polar Star, and swing himself clear out of this system of suns, to where gravitation stops and turns the other way." Joseph Cook should take Bishop Warren in hand, and either teach him what he knows of physical science, or else insist that the next time the bishop finds himself suspended between Arcturus and the Polar Star, he should take a fresh grip on the mental trapeze and stay there.

A writer in the Independent named James F. Claflin asserts that "the grim Materialist, working at the boundaries of force and matter, is blindly preparing the soil whereon shall bloom the beautiful flowers of universal faith in God." This may be so; but it is curious to note that the longer the "grim Materialist" works, and the more he discovers, the less faith men appear to hav in any power outside of nature. Mr. Claflin's vaticination lacks the necessary merit of being justified by facts.

The inmates of the jail at Waco, Texas, seem to be desirous of reforming. Last week they asked J. D. Shaw, the Freethought lecturer, and publisher of the Independent Pulpit, to giv them a talk, which he did. We are afraid, however, that it's another case of

"When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;"
But
"When the devil was well, the devil a monk was he."

Mr. Remsburg, says the Kansas Blade, received the honor of delivering the best lecture at the New York State Freethinkers' Association at Cassadaga Lake, New York. His subject was "Bible Morals." This comparison is invidious, for the subjects were so varied that no one lecture could be called the best. They all excelled in their own way. But Mr. Remsburg's discourse was among the best, as will be testified to when it is seen in print.

The Committee of Catholic Theologians in session at Baltimore, Md., are confining their attention strictly to questions of church disciplin in the United States. They argue that "times change, and in order to accommodate herself to the new conditions, the church finds it necessary to amend her disciplin." It is one of the peculiarities of the Catholic church that, while wholly infallible, it frequently finds itself mistaken.

The estate of the late Bishop Simpson, says the Sun, amounting to nearly a hundred thousand dollars, was nearly all the result of profitable investment. As Bishop Simpson belonged to the Methodist church, it is not impossible that he was let in on the "ground floor" of the Isabella Mining Company. In an enterprise like that, no church dignitary should hav allowed himself to prove a deadhead.

Cardinal Manning, in an appeal for the Catholic college of All Hallows, located in Ireland, said that "Ireland was the most profoundly Christian, and the most energetically Catholic nation on the face of the earth." Precisely. And she is also the most ignorant, degraded, servile, and wretched. The last conditions proceed from the first.

Mrs. Washington Keeler, of Reading, Pa., was moved to commence a fast by reading of Christ's abstinence while in the wilderness. She died at the end of her forty-eighth day, however. Who shall say that the New Testament has not, in this case, been guilty of murder?

Mr. Charles Watts has kindly consented to take the names and subscriptions of friends wishing to become subscribers to The Truth Seeker in Canada. We thank Mr. Watts, and shall be glad to know that he has secured us a long list of new readers throughout the dominion.

We shall next week begin the publication of Mr. Remsburg's speech at Cassadaga Lake—"Bible Morals." It will occupy two or three pages in two numbers of the paper.

Mr. Charles Watts's lecture engagements for the next month are as follows: Sunday, Oct. 12th, Toronto; Monday and Tuesday, 13th and 14th, Hamilton; Wednesday, 15th, Welland; Thursday, 16th, Dunnville; Friday, 17th, Seaforth; Sunday, 19th, Toronto; during the following week a tour through north of Canada; Sunday, 26th, and following week, Hamilton and the west; Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday, Nov. 2d, 3d, and 4th, Montreal. Mr. Watts will arrive in New York November 6th.

Letters from Friends.

HUNTSVILLE, ALA., 1st Lord's Day, Sept., 1884.

MR. EDITOR: "Are you a Christian?" was asked me by an ex-prizefighter, whose face would prove a splendid sample of a buckwheat cake, and who now has charge of the Sixth Street Mission, near Pine st., Cincinnati, Ohio. I answered: "Sir, your question is hardly fair? Can I help it that I was born in Turkey, and that I necessarily believe in Mohammed, unless I forego the promises of paradise?" "You don't say you are a Mohammedan?" retorted the ex-gambler. "Who said I was?" retorted I; "but am I to blame if I was born in India, and must believe in Vishnu, or be everlastingly exposed to a slow, roasting fire?" The exhorter, no doubt convinced that he had a desperate case before him, never said another word, and I left.

In Cincinnati I visited the Holland church on Hughe street, which may be reached by the "Zoo" cars as far as they go. Instead of the inscription in the Huntsville Episcopal church, "Reverence my sanctuary" (by the way, a direct insult to any church-goer, as if pre-supposed to misbehave and to be void of manners), I read this: "De Heere regeert" ("The Lord reigneth"). I heard a dull lecture by a pious German, as the minister was absent. The church on Broadway is still for sale.

In Louisville I saw a man working at the steeple of the new Methodist church, at the peril of his life.

Why not build homes for workmen where in time they may liv rent-free? for everyone born on this earth has a rightful claim to a portion of it—so much, at least, as to enable him to exist.

Here is an instance of church tolerance, or "equanimity of the spirit:" In "Marvin's Sermons" (Methodist) (Brand, St. Louis) read page 277:

"The Lord's Supper. How blasphemous is the audacity of the driveling priest who converts the table into an altar, and enacts the solemn farce of offering the very Christ upon it in the form of bread and wine! No human priest can offer him; he offered himself without spot to God, and that 'once for all,' and now 'ever liveth to make intercession for us.' Having suffered for us, he gave us this bread and wine, a most blessed memorial of his love; and now to see a poor, vain mortal playing priest with these dear tokens of his death, it is shocking, it is monstrous!"

So far, Marvin. It is a wonder that the holy Methodist preacher did not die from the consciousness that such "shocking, monstrous" acts were and are performed in the nineteenth century. I imagin myself Marvin weeping. Truly, superstition is a never-healing cancer.

In Illinois I heard the phrenologist, Fowler. If I had been a preacher and my flock had laughed at me, their shepherd, I would hav exclaimed with thunder, "Go to hell, ye accursed ones, for laughing at an embassador of Christ!" and I would hav walked out and never preached again. At the conclusion of Professor Fowler's lecture on Monday evening, he invited the audience to select some one whose head they wished examined. Rev. Mr. Hubbert was selected, and Professor Fowler gave him a good head, but said he had no religion, and if he should marry a wife who should hav none there would be little praying done in the family. This created a laugh at the expense of Hubbert. This Hubbert, a Cumberland preacher, has his church full to suffocation in Lincoln, Ill. The wonder is that his flock continues to hear him, even after Fowler's honest verdict in 1882.

The North American Review has on pages 570–580 an article, "The Decline of Clerical Authority," a real masterpiece, by George P. Fisher. He says, p. 574: "The principality which the popes hav ruled over a thousand years, and the possession of which they assert to be essential to the proper discharge of their spiritual office, has been wrested from them by a Catholic sovereign, with the nation—a nation of Catholics—at his back. Protests and anathemas from the side of the papacy hav proved of no avail."

I suppose the fact that two rival bishops are fighting about the holy diocese of Tournay, Belgium, is old news to you; also that holy Canon Bernard fled thence to Canada, after appropriating a quarter of a million of holy money.

Archbishop Elder of Cincinnati has a lengthy article in the Commercial Gazette of Sunday, Aug. 24th. His sanctity says in his "Defense of the Acts and Character of Jesus," addressing the editor of the Gazette: "You know that we Christians believe, as sure as we believe the sun shines, that our blessed redeemer is himself the true God, having assumed a true human nature to his divine person. . . . Whatever else a Christian loves—his dearest friends—it is our Lord Jesus Christ that has given them, and he has given the very heart with which he loves them. Why should every sentiment that is dearest to us be shocked by such things as you hav uttered against him?"

This article is exactly one column long, and finishes up by: "If my article appears long, please consider that a single blow, even badly directed, may inflict a pain which long administrations are required to heal. Very respectfully, † William Henry Elder, Archbishop of Cinc."

The same paper says, in another article concerning the Purcell claimants: "These claimants are not only renegades to their faith, and put their names to an article insulting to all Catholics, but they, like beasts, snap at the hand held out to aid them. Cast not pearls before swine, lest they turn and rend you. They do not want pearls, they want slop." This article is signed "D. P." I do not quite agree with "D. P." I indeed think that the Purcell victims would be too glad only to hav pearls cast to them, as these could be converted into money, which, again, would go far to buy bread for the deluded Purcell dupes. Neither does a kitten snap at my hand when I feed it. It cares not to bite me.

A third article, signed "S. R. R.," says: "The venerable prelate says, 'Jesus, calling himself God, showed to the Jews it was not a blasphemy, since the judges of the people had been styled gods by God himself.' This is a plea that Jesus did not call himself God in a real meaning. In this fierce pursuit of the Jews the respected archbishop seems to hav knocked out the very foundation of Christianity. It is well that his high office lifts him above censure, for such a lapse in faith—" etc. The writer, "S. R. R.," livs in Cincinnati. It certainly would help the cause to hav him in our ranks.

I easily could write twenty columns more, but, like the venerable prelate, will excuse myself. I cannot conclude, however, without mentioning the effect upon me of the great to-do about Ryan's reception in Philadelphia. Ten thousand Catholics met him, the archbishop elect, at the cars; a torchlight procession, headed and backed by martial bands, conducted him, unlike Jesus, to his palatial residence. Will superstition ever cease? How much rather would I hav welcomed a horny-handed mechanic—one who adds to the comforts of life!

HENRI PALING.

POMONA, CAL., Sept. 23, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Pomona has been treated to a holy circus for some time past. It has been managed by a set of religious lunatics—an offshoot of Methodism. They style themselvs "Holiness Band." They are Christlike in many respects, according to the Christian mythology, as most of them hav no visible means of support. It is presumed that they are hearty eaters, as well as fervent prayers. They claim sanctification, and from their general appearance they need something that nature has failed to furnish them in order that they may compare favorably with the balance of the animal kingdom on the other side of the connecting link. Now, these animals, both he and she, are nightly telling the people who listen to them that they are in close relation with the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, whoever they may be, and that they (the band) are on the direct road to their ranch (the F., S., and H. G.), and that they (the vile herd) can't sin, being sanctified by the aforesaid (F., S., and H. G.), and all that is necessary for us is to get ready, join the band, and prepare for the big chivari that they, the Christians (H. B.), are going to giv the old man and his son when they get to the "mansion in the skies." They even tell us that they are going to be joined by a great many fowl people, old residents of the place, that are acclimated, and hav "got the run of things," though they hav not, up to the present time, put any of this foreign collection on exhibition at their circus here. Possibly they are keeping the birds for the last performance in order that they may capture our last dollar before leaving for good.

Why should we of America, born and educated under a republican form of government, desire to be transported to the realms of a despotic and vindictiv king, with no other inducements than simply to stay there, whether we were contented or not, offering only as compensation "milk and honey," the most nauseating diet that could be prescribed for our comfort? No other amusement than to hurrah for a king and his satellites, foreign to our desires, tastes, and educated habits, in a country and climate antagonistic to our natures, whose laws are in conflict with ours—what inducements are offered to us to accept passage in their little unnatural boat to convey us, minus our baggage, to so remote a place? It would be more in harmony with our methods of doing business to wait until more definit information be obtained. It is possible that the whole thing is a myth. What is there to be gained by these possible mythical Christian teachers? We giv up that which is for that which is not, destroy present real happiness and comfort for the unreal, leave off all that which we know for the unknown, turning the picture and viewing it continually from the dark side, expecting thereby to become apprised of its merits, beauty, and loveliness, attempting to gain knowledge by other than natural methods, expecting us to understand and adopt laws conflicting with the five senses which govern our actions and thoughts. In short, continually doing that which conflicts with our natural wants, in order that we may gain the unnatural. All this to please somebody's God, whose mandates must be observed, and whose will is law. It is hardly conceivable that an abundance of happiness to an individual will be realized by an attempt to set aside the laws which govern him in the battle for existence here. If compliance with the laws of this world unfits him for citizenship in another, it would be as well if he failed to attempt any change, continuing his allegiance to a world in harmony with his nature. There could possibly be nothing lost by remaining, if by going nothing would be gained. This may seem quite absurd to the seeker of phantoms. Are we to remain continuously stupid simply because it is to the parson's interest to do so? or simply because our wives and daughters so desire us to do, for the sole purpose of gaining a little popularity among the priest-ridden, God-fearing, superstitious, non-thinking portion of humanity? Because our mothers were imposed upon, humbugged in the past by these dealers in phantoms, is no valid reason why we should not think and search out the avenues of human happiness, comfort, and enjoyment, when they lie directly in our path, in the grand avenue of nature's highway. There is no logic in our leaving the green fields for the dry stubble, the broad avenue for the narrow tow-path; there is nothing to be gained by substituting the Christian method of mathematics for the system now in use in all our schools, and which assists us so materially in the affairs of life. I refer to the Bible rule of three times one is one, and one times one are three.

Christianity givs us no more hope than what we already hav for the future. It destroys the bloom and fragrance of our summer day, that we may better enjoy the darkness of the long winter night; lessens the joys of life, and increases the sorrows of death; blights the sweet sentiments of love that we hav for all that is, for the shivering prospect of a few cold promises of that which is not. Let realities take the place of myths in the minds of the living, and life will be more desirous, and death less feared. H. L. SHAUG.

LOUDONVILLE, N. Y., Sept. 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: If you don't think I come in too often, may I hav a little "say" in the "Friend's Corner?"

I hav just been having a good time reading the letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and couldn't resist the temptation to answer some of the friends. How amusing and interesting some of those epistles are! There is the political question which is agitating so many minds at present, and I'm just conceited enough to want to giv my opinion on the subject. First, why do so many sensible people make it a party question? Why not follow Darwin's idea—let it be a survival of the fittest? I never would consent to stand on one "Plank" all my life. If I saw a party on the other "Plank" which I thought more fitting, I should not hesitate to step over and giv him my support. Ah! that word reminds me that I hav made a grievous error; they support the "Plank" instead of standing on it. Well, please excuse me; "I am only a woman," so can't be expected to always get these things correct. But, anyhow, Grover Cleveland is my choice of the two candidates for the presidency. He has shown himself not afraid of "his party," and from all I can learn, is honest and conscientious in the performance of his public duties. As for Benjamin Butler, I would not take one penny's worth of stock in him. Why? Because, like Mr. Willis, I consider him a tyrant.

Like Mrs. Mattie Mitchell, I hav often rejoiced that I was too young to realize the horrors of slavery. Now, there is a Mr. A. J. Reading whom I consider a man of good solid, Liberal reasoning. How very true are his words: "Locality and training often hav much to do with one's opinion." If Mr. H. Willis had been "born and bred" in the South, and the North had swooped down some day on him and taken all his wealth (negroes) from him without his consent, would he not hav considered that he should hav had some recompense? Slavery is a terrible thing, but the slave-owners of the South had some terrible injustice—in many instances—dealt them by the North.

Well, Mr. Wallace Moore, if Mr. Cleveland "has nothing to recommend him but a life-long adherence to the Democratic party," what has Mr. Blaine to recommend him but a life-long adherence to the Republican party?

Mr. H. B. Jones, you are right in regard to the "Ku Klux outrage." Why is such a hue-and-cry raised over that dead affair? It is nothing that nearly every day's paper records the outraging of some poor white child or woman by some fiendish negro? Nothing that countless horrible murders are committed in the North daily? Look at the record of crime on Long Island during the past year. Why, if it had all occurred in a single Southern state, how the Northern papers would groan over it!

What a ridiculous assertion, Mr. Wallace Moore, that "nine-tenths of the saloon loafers" in the land are "Democrats and opposed to Woman Suffrage" (that last was a sop thrown to the suffragists, I presume)! Don't you know that you can not find any two things exactly alike in nature? Then to take your little Gahanna as a sample of the rest of the United States! Just wait until you hav visited some of the Southern towns where "nine-tenths of the saloon loafers" are ignorant blacks, and Republicans at that, armed with the negro's favorit weapon, a razor!

And now for Dr. Foote's terrible effusion, "A Hypochondriac." I suppose you've all heard of the man who, in a crowd, was struck by some one, and who got up on something (perhaps it was a fence) and said: "A man struck me just now, and I'm going to hit him with this stone." Every one in the crowd remained quietly gazing at him, to see where he would aim, but the guilty man instantly dodged, and then the man who was struck threw down the stone and proceeded to thrash the culprit. Well, now, don't "A Hypochondriac" look just like a dodge from "The Vivisector's Death-bed?' But don't be frightened, doctor; Mr. Preston does not believe in cruelty to animals. What a sneering, cold, heartless thing it is! Would not such a man be the last man in creation to call in to treat an ailing, helpless babe! If you are so kind (?) to helpless beings, sir, and do not believe in "unnecessary cruelty," pray why do you sneer so at Mr. Elliott's work of humanity and kindness to animals? Some people might say because you are a vivisector yourself, and are dodging. To all those who believe Mr. Preston to be an exaggerator, I will say, write to Mr. Preston, 6 Park Square, Boston, for literature on vivisection—read, and form your own opinions. It is all very well to sneer and cry exaggeration, but it is a terrible fact that one man alone vivisected 70,000 (seventy thousand) helpless animals in ten years, and he is still living, I believe.

Shame on any one who ridicules a woman who is a helpless invalid, and whose only pleasure lies in writing to her friends, even though she endures great pain in the effort to write!

Yours fraternally, WINEFORD V. ASPINWALL.

WHAT BROTHER MANTENFEL SAID IN THE TEUTONIC LIBERAL CLUB.

As the meeting settled down to business Brother Mantelfel sait, Liberal brothers: We soon hav the president election, and the business is, How shall we vote? We hav a good many political partys. In one is the nominee St. Piter, and in the other St. John. Brothers, this ar most to holy names for me to touch. The St. John's platform is appriciable by a strong smell of brimstone—to strong for any Liberal with common sense. I will only consider the three strongest partys. First, the Republican, with their blatform, where Mr. Blaine stand in the center, and around him the Millioners, Bankers, Monobolists, three-fourths of the Ministers, and the well feed Officeholders.

The say when Mr. Blaine were a mamber of the house of Representativs in 1875 he introduced a liberal resolution, the resolution being killed by an absurd amendment. Since that time he being as still as if killed with the resolution.

Brothers, the Democratic platform is built so close to the Republican that the can step from one to the other and not to get hurt. On that blatform Mr. Cleveland stand, and the hungry officeseekers the say Mr. Cleveland laid his veto on three bills what the New York Legislature past. Now you see if Mr. Cleveland is right, then the Legislature is ignorand, and vice versa.

If Mr. Clevelaed should be elected president, then the Millioners, Bankers, Monobolists will step over on the Democratic blatform, and the will stand on that blatform just as safe as on the Republican. In that cause the Republican officeholders would heve to wait till Gabriel's trumpet blow. Also on both of them blatforms stand small business men, farmers, workingmen, and vote for the aristocracy to let them be a little longer there slaves. Grangers who club together against monopoly, and on election day vote for monopoly, also some Liberals who like the almighty dollar better than the downtrodden people. Church-members stand on both of them blatforms, because the minister or priest told them so, and if poor to suffer in this world to get in an imaginary heaven.

The third is the Anti-Monopoly National Greenback Labor Party, on which blatform Mr. Butler stand, and a good many of the downtrodden people, special workingmen, farmers, business men, and all who know a little more common sense than their brothers in the other partys.

Brothers, it is our duty to look out for our rights bodily and mentaly. If we are half slaves now, our children will be whole slaves. We are all born alike, and hav all the same natural right. As soon as one child is born with a gold or silk garment on, I will acknowledge that child as king or pope, but not befor.

Brothers, I do not say to you to vote for Butler, but I say if you vote stand on the people's blatform. Mr. Butler's record is better than Blaine's or Cleveland's. Years ago Butler defendet the poor factory girls. He were the defender of the poor in the poorhouse. The rich took there strength and health, then send them to the poorhouse. The officers in the poorhouse stole that little the had, and after ther death skinned them, tant their skin, and sold it to the rich for slippers. So you see the rich had everythings except the bones.

Brothers, now I will explain the weak side of Mr. Butler. He is a orthodox. His letters and speeches prove that, and if you say he is not, he only like to satisfy the people, then he is a hypocrit. But I belief the man is sincere. I can forgiv a orthodox if he do right and is for the people and with the people, but I cannot forgiv a Liberal who votes with the aristocratic against the people. We Liberals hav to draw most of our force out the common people, and to do that we hav to free them first to be aristocratic slaves.

Liberal brothers, if you go to the poles to vote, look out that the rooster not crow, "O man, you helpt liberty betray." I vote for the principles laid down in the blatform where Mr. Butler stand, and not for any aristocracy. Das hat augespield.

ITHACA, Oct. 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please find one dollar as my share of campaign fund for the late organized League—though I am an Independent, believing, as I do, there are two sides in nature, the objectiv and the subjectiv, which is the inevitable fundamental contrast, to be seen everywhere, and will be kept up until scientific knowledge brings about a union by the Holy Ghost of natural selection. I use the Bible terms, as being extreme significations, but not as personalities outside of man. Man is the embodiment of all the extremes of moral and animal nature, which includes male and female, with all their senses and members; and until we come to the knowledge of our human capacities we shall ever make war with and behold outside enemies.

Nature is male and female of herself, whose embodiment is human to those who hav eyes to see it. There is no sense or knowledge in inanimate nature, hence all expression of knowledge is in humanity. The terms used in the Bible record, thus: Lord, God, Jesus, Christ, Holy Ghost, etc., are extreme significations belonging to the universe of humanity, either moral or physical; as the case may be. Please keep in view that a knowledge of self, male and female, is the extreme outside of the science of nature. When we hav a knowledge of ourself, we will find our enemies are all within, and each will find enough to invade his or her enemies at home. But it will seem impossible that but few of the creeping things of the sense of taste can hav the capacity to turn their eyes within. Hence an organized war will go on, and I take the objectiv side, which is the male or moral side of the fight; but it is a poor fight when a city is divided against itself, or a war inaugurated between the objectiv and the subjectiv, the male and the female of nature, represented especially by Materialism (the male) and Spiritualism (the female); these twain must become one flesh.

Mr. Chainey's speech, "Through Day to Night, and Night to Day," was expressiv of many truths, whatever the answer to it may hav been. He represents the wo-man (rib) taken from the side of Materialism (the moral man) when in a deep sleep of extremes and constitutional necessity, while the extreme charms of woman (the breath of life) can only answer the serpent's voice within, and thus she partakes of the forbidden fruit of mysterious life after death, so desirable and good to look upon, and thus she most assuredly will giv of the fruit to her husband (Materialism), and he will eat, and in due time their eyes will be opened to see the nakedness of mystery and animal sensation, of individual life after death, and be ashamed. History repeats itself, and is herein applied. We may fight our outside enemies till doomsday and we shall not conquer them, but when we conquer our enemies within, love will subdue all without. Christians hav fought their enemies from time immemorial, and hav never conquered them. Let us not take pattern by them, but let us subdue the selfish man of sin within, and all will be subdued.

Yours for human authority within, Z. KENT.

MOSCOW MILLS, Mo., Sept. 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I received the book entitled "Truth Seeker Collection of Hymns and Forms" in due time, and in good style. It makes a beautiful addition to my little library. Friends of Freethought, I wish to impress upon your minds that if we all want to work together in harmony, we, as a body of reformers, want to pay strict attention to what we are doing, and what we want to do. In establishing our League and national Liberal societies, we want rules, laws, and by-laws solidly and permanently established, so that all can see, read, and understand, and then we will hav no blunders and mistakes, and then, and not till then, will the great machinery of the Liberal reformers work harmoniously. I notice one great blunder that correspondents of the Liberal press make, and that is of not using the proper date of their labors. Some use 109, some 284, and others 1884. Please, what is the use of some pulling one way, and some the other? Why can we not use the proper date of 284, as was suggested by some or all of our forefathers that hav worked before us? It does look more lovely, grand, and glorious to see a united body of workers pull and labor harmoniously together, and then the body presents a more beautiful front.

I hav not been living in this county over three months, and hav been working up my county, and I find, to my great joy and surprise, that we hav got a good many Infidels here, hidden away in the bushes as it were. They are, or hav been in the past, afraid to speak their true sentiments. I am going to send you some names in the not far distant future for the petition for State Secularization. Hav got three names, and I think I can get several more. We need a good lecturer here.

Some of our sanctified, redeemed, and washed-in-the-blood-of-the-lamb say: "Mr. Hunter, please explain why it is that you are working so earnestly and persistently against the cause of Christianity, and hate the Christian people so." I told them that it was not the people that I hated, it was that blighting disease that humanity is heir to—the Christian religion. Billy Foster says that all of us wicked Infidels will call upon God for mercy when our dying day rolls around. I told him if we were not racked with pain, our death would be as calm and serene as any dying Christian dared be. I told him that I did not want God and Christ to reign over me, I am able to take care of myself. Their Bible, God, and Christ are myths; no truth or goodness in them. Brother Isaac said recently that he honestly believed that if everybody would fall upon their knees, and humbly implore God's goodness, the world would shortly come to an end, and that we would be shuffled off to glory. What nonsense and foolishness!

Any young lady of good moral habits, and good standing in society, who upholds Freethought and reform, and who wishes to correspond with the intentions of matrimony in Liberal ranks, will please address C. B. HUNTER.

CLAYVILLE, N. Y., Sept. 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am highly pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. The first object of every one's inquiry should be, What is truth? "Ye shall know the truth, and THE TRUTH SEEKER shall make you free." Now, I hav an irresistible desire to be free, free from the degrading influence of ignorance, error, priestcraft, and hypocrisy, in all its hellish forms. O ye invisible intelligences, throw around those noble pioneers, who are now in the field of action, your strong shield of protection, and enable them to uphold and defend intellectual freedom.

I see there is a sharp controversy between the Materialists and Spiritualists, pertaining to the final destiny of the human race. The former claim that human consciousness begins in the cradle of birth, and ends in the dirt or grave, and even quote from that old obscene book to prove that ultimately man will attain to no superiority above beasthood. The latter, just as earnestly, contend that human consciousness buds into existence in the couch of birth, and continues to blossom through this rudimental sphere, and will brighten in its bloom while eternity grows old.

Now, both of the above theories cannot be true, because they are in direct conflict with each other; there is no halfway-house to occupy in this controversy between beasthood or dirthood, and ultimate angelhood or spirithood; either consciousness does exist and maintain a conscious progressiv activity after the dissolution of the animal or physical body, or it does not. Which? Now, I hav no blackguard expressions to hurl at my brother Materialist. You are, doubtless, as sincere in your views of this matter as I am in mine. That intelligence does exist now, you will not deny. How did it originate? If it had an origin, does uncompounded matter possess the inherent principle of intelligence? Will some Materialist friend give me a little light on this subject? Assertion and assumption amount to nothing unless demonstrated and supported by self-evident facts. Now, Mr. Materialist, I hav as much irrefutable evidence of a conscious hereafter as you hav that twice two are four.

Mr. Editor, I am glad you giv both sides a fair hearing—the gangreen of error must be removed before health can revisit the diseased system of thought pertaining to this matter; let us clear the deck for action; "the agitation of thought is the beginning of wisdom." The dogma of Christianity sinks in the gulf of oblivion when compared with the matter at issue between the above contending parties, namely, whether universal humanity will ultimately attain to something (a conscious existence) in the eternity of the future, or retrograde back to nothing (or unconsciousness) annihilation.

Yours for truth and eternal progress,
J. P. SMITH, Spiritualist.

IDAHO SPRINGS, COL., Sept. 23, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to thank you for the prompt attention you gave our order for the pamphlet, "Real Blasphemers," and THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also for the kindness you showed us in publishing our notice of Col. Kelso's "Bible Analyzed." We would like to tell you that the colonel's great work reminds us of an incident in his early life when he was a lad of twelve years of age. He, in company with several other boys of a like age, was passing a small cabin home that was temporarily vacated by the owner. A halt was called, and he proposed to show them that a young Samson was in their midst, and that he, unaided, could lift one corner of the cabin and take out a log; and suiting the action to the word, out came the log, and the consequence was that the cabin tipped toward that corner, and the little home presented a deplorable appearance. When the owner of the cabin returned, the colonel's father, a very kind, genial gentleman, called the neighbors together to help replace the log which his son had so easily torn out, but it took the united efforts of several strong men to put it back in place, who did all that it was possible to do to put the building in its former condition; yet the family that had been reared beneath its sheltering roof could no longer look on it as a safe retreat when a boy twelve years of age could lift a corner and take out a log. In the "Bible Analyzed" he has not only taken out a log, but has completely destroyed the building beyond repair, and has left it in its ruin, as he did the log cabin, without one timber to erect another building on its foundation. If this is the all of life, as the colonel seems to think, if we hav only a visionary home, to us it is real, and is it not a wrong done to deprive us of it without giving us a real and a better one? Some may reply that it is truth, and we must progress and grow wiser; but what is the need for wisdom, and what use can we make of progression, if the torch thus lighted will burn but a brief period and be extinguished forever? These are questions which ever rise up foremost, Mr. Editor, when reading your ably conducted journal and kindred works issued by the Truth Seeker Publishing House, and which thousands of earnest souls, no doubt, desire an answer to. MRS. H. A. HOUGH.

BARRE, MASS., Sept. 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please say to E. B. Foote, Jr., that there was no necessity for me "to look upon the horribly graphic illustration and read the intense and thrilling poem by Elliott Preston, 'The Vivisector's Death-bed'" (as expressed by that true-hearted woman and philanthropist, Mattie C. Mitchell, in TRUTH SEEKER, Sept. 27th), in order to "bring me to a realization" of the horrors of vivisection, for I hav known of its shocking barbarities these many, many years. Neither was there any necessity—for the purpose of casting odium upon all anti-vivisectionists—for him, in the "preface" of his "prize poem," to go out of his way to wring in my name by ridiculing that sensitivness to torture which is the glory of all men as well as women; for my courage in times of danger is well known, my presence of mind in emergencies unquestioned, while my well-regulated emotional nature and strong nervous equanimity hav been fully tested by experienced physicians and surgeons in cases of severe burnings of the human body, of people mangled by accidents, to say nothing of experiences in the war of the Rebellion. And when he sneeringly calls attention to "indescribable shivers," "shudders," and "frightful sensations" to prejudice thinking people and the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER against indignation at this uncalled-for and atrocious crime, he shows himself as far beneath a man as a man can be beneath a brute.

I will leave others of greater ability and more leisure to write up the "prize poem," "The Horrible Tale of a Hypochondriac," as it deserves.

I am very glad to see, by last TRUTH SEEKER, that Winneford V. Aspinwall is to write for the "Children's Corner" of your paper. She will do justice to any subject she selects. THE TRUTH SEEKER grows better and better with every issue. Will it ever find a limit to its progression? I am very happy to hear of its increased circulation. Let us all shout Amen.

Yours for mercy and justice, ELLA E. GIBSON.

MURRAY, O., Sept. 24, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read with interest the report of the eighth annual Congress of the National Liberal League. The officers elected are the right persons in the right places. I am glad the Congress did not pile anything more on the League, for in my opinion the secularization of the state is sufficient for it to carry through and do it successfully.

The League has a powerful enemy to fight in the God-in-the-Constitution movement, which has some very wealthy and influential men on its side, but it is rejoicing to know we hav wealthy and influential men and women on our side. I trust the League will ever watch with eagle eyes the enemy of liberty and progress.

On page 574 of THE TRUTH SEEKER I see a picture and a poem by Mr. Elliott Preston, entitled, "The Vivisector's Death-bed." What an awful representation! So dismal is the illustration that it can scarcely be looked upon! It is the very picture of horror and despair! Well might the vivisector on his death-bed ask,

"Was this a dog—this mangled thing
Stretched stark, along the floor,
Its lank jaws bathed with bloody foam,
And bare its true heart's core?"

As Paine says of Alexander and Charles of Sweden, the same can be applied to the vivisectors: "A good man cannot think of their actions without abhorrence, nor of their deaths without rejoicing." May Mr. Preston continue in his good work of showing to the public the awful crimes of vivisectors, and of throwing "light in dark places" is the desire of Yours respectfully, D. E. LEWIS.

SENECA FALLS, N. Y., Sept. 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot feel sorry for our crowd on account of the lashing we received by Chainey, as I cannot understand what business we can hav in mixing in any way with a class of individuals who in any way believe in supernaturalism. I cannot but regard any form of Spiritualism as a mild species of insanity; and so long as they do not furnish proof to convince us that they are infallible, there is no reason why we should be under any more obligations to accept their creeds and dogmas on their "say so" than we should those of Christianity.

While I hav a great respect for them as one of the links in the chain of evolution, it is of the same kind as that which we hav for Martin Luther and all other reformers; and I regard them only as one of the factors of civilized advancement on the road to Agnosticism. I hav not seen a list of the vice-presidents, but hope that I hav not had the honor of a re-election, as I should not like to keep up the policy of armed neutrality that the association has always labored under.

Very truly, DR. H. J. PURDY.

WILLIAMSTOWN, OHIO, Sept. 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Why could we not hav Infidels' demands printed on a nice sheet in proper form, so as to be framed? Would it not be an ornament for our offices, sitting-rooms, and parlors? If there has been anything of the kind I am not aware of it. It seems to me such might be gotten up at such a price that any one could obtain it. Would we not be proud to call attention to it? B. D. EVANS, M.D.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Baby.

Toddle, toddle, waddle, waddle,
On her little pinky toes;
Stumble, stumble, trip and tumble—
That's the way the baby goes.

Prattle, prattle, rattle, rattle,
Little shouts, and little shrieks;
Tears, with laughter coming after—
That's the way the baby speaks.

Playing, toying, still enjoying
Every sweet that nature givs;
Waking, sleeping, smiling, weeping—
That's the way the baby livs.

A Leaf from My Experience;

OR, HOW TO BE CHARITABLE.

I shall say something about charity, and point out how we can afford to be kind to those who are less fortunately situated than ourselvs, and in the end be as well off as others who cannot afford to be charitable. I think that as a general thing, a kind heart, as we call it, comes by inheritance, and we can talk of it, not as a virtue, but as a necessity of our nature; at least, I prefer to look at it in this way from what I am about to write. I think, however, that, like any other thing, it is susceptible of cultivation. The more charity you bestow upon others, the more will you be inclined to be charitable. If you hav been favored with a kind heart by nature, so that want or distress in others inclines you to assist them, and to do so sometimes to your own discomfort, I can tell you how to afford it.

Form a wise resolution to abstain from the use of alcoholic drinks as a beverage. Three drinks per day for three hundred and sixty-five days will save you thirty-six dollars and fifty cents. Use no tobacco nor cigars, as the use of three cigars a day will amount to fifty-four dollars and seventy-five cents, and few tobacco-chewers will devour less than twenty pounds a year, or from eight to ten dollars' worth, so that in this we find an amount of over one hundred dollars saved on material that, in nine times out of ten, is a positiv injury. If you giv away only one-half that sum, in ten years you can buy a home with the balance.

If you hav resolved to save for the purpose of giving it away, as necessity may require, you will be inclined to be economical in all other ways. It is much better to be the dispenser of charity than the recipient of it. Therefore be thrifty, so that you may hav something to giv. Look out for unscrupulous persons, who will try to impose on your good nature. Giv with a view to do good. It is throwing charity away to giv to the unworthy. It is your duty to satisfy yourself that the subject is deserving. Never giv a penny to get rid of a beggar. It is not prudent to giv money to those we do not know. Instead of sending money to the heathen, seek out the bare-footed in your neighborhood, and warm them. It costs too much to get your money to the heathen. If you giv five dollars, it will generally cost four of it to get it to them, and half of the balance to furnish the minister's house who preaches for them.

Professional beggars are a nuisance. They are as ingenious in inventing lies and tricks to deceive you as a man who plays legerdemain. When a beggar talks to you, look him or her square in the eye, and when they cast their eyes down you may be sure they are not innocent. I hav learned this by experience. It is almost as bad to be unjust to yourself, by giving carelessly to unworthy persons, as to take what does not belong to you. The only difference is that in the one case you rob yourself, and in the other case you rob another. I will giv a few illustrations to show what I mean.

I was at work one day, when a German came along, and seeing that I was on a scaffold and not easily to be got at, he said in his own language: "Wollen sie nicht so gute sien mere ein bense to rouse tzu werfen." That is, in English, "Will you be good enough to throw me a penny?" "What way are you traveling?" said I. "To Pottsville," said he. I noticed he had a rather red nose, which is often a sign-board for a groggery, so I said, "I fear money would do you little good," as I thought he would use it for drink. But he declared by all the holy saints that he would not spend it in that way, so I tossed him a shilling, for which he held up his hands in an attitude of devotion, calling down blessings upon my head, and immediately turned upon his heel and walked towards the village.

In a short time it occurred to me that I had been sold, and I threw down my tools and followed him. He made a bee-line for a tavern, which I saw him enter, but he got out again before I got there, as he had quite the start of me. I inquired of the bartender what he wanted.

"Why," said he, "he wanted to drink all the whisky I hav for two cents! He poured out a tumbler brimful, and took it down at a gulp."

The old fellow was up to it; he got the man to change the shilling first into pennies, so as to pay two of them for a drink. At this rate he could make six drinks out of my shilling. The regular price then, some forty years ago, was three cents a drink.

I found myself cheated by a lying hypocrit, and was getting angry at myself for being duped by him, and so I followed him out, as soon as I could, to another place, where I saw him enter, intending to giv him a good talking to; but on entering he was just getting out, having emptied the second tumbler, and paid his two cents, or, rather, my two cents. I met him just as he was coming out, as happy as a lord. He bowed politely, and smiled at me as if he was in a perfect state of bliss—"not a wave of trouble rolled across his peaceful breast," as the hymn book has it. I opened up on him by saying:

"Which way are you bound?"

"Noch Reading," said he.

"How does it come that you are now going to Reading? I thought you started out of town in the direction of Pottsville," said I.

"Well, so I did," said he, in his fluent German, "but I met a nice young man," pointing in the direction of the place, "who has changed my whole program with a shilling. It takes little to change my plans. I hav no particular object in life but to eat and drink when I can get it, and suffer and do without it when I can't get it."

There was such a careless and unconcerned look about the man, and he seemed so full of his kind of enjoyment, that I concluded not to reveal myself to him as the nice clever, young man whom he had cheated; and so he immediately changed my program for even less than a shilling.

Another incident, which occurred somewhat later in life, will illustrate what I mean by true charity bestowed upon a worthy object. I was traveling in the direction of Pittsburgh, via the Pennsylvania Railroad line. On the way, I happened to sit by the side of a stout, well-made German, with whom I engaged in conversation, and found him to be a sober and intelligent man. Among other things, he told me that he had been in the country about a year, endeavoring to find his brother and friends, and had got out of money, and was obliged to go to laboring to make his way; that he had just found out by a letter that they were in Hollidaysburg, which is a branch road some miles from Altoona, on the Pennsylvania line. The fare was twenty-five cents, and the car left that night.

"But I am a little puzzled how to manage," said he. "I hav enough to get there, but, in case I fail to find my brother, I may be obliged to wander about the place in the dark, as I shall hav no money left to pay for a lodging, and I think I will hav to use what I hav for lodging here in Altoona, and walk out to-morrow; but I would much rather go on if I were certain of finding them to-night."

The conversation turned to other matters, but I had resolved to make him a happy man. So when the car stopped at Altoona, I put my hand into my pocket and gave him a gold dollar.

"Take this," I said, "and get upon the train, and try to find your friends to-night; if you cannot, you can lodge and find them in the morning."

The man was very much astonished at this, as I had expressed no concern about his troubles.

"But," said he, "how am I to repay you for this kindness? I never saw you before."

I said to him: "The first man you meet that is in as much need of a dollar as you are now, if you hav one to spare, just hand him one, and that will square the account."

He jumped upon his feet and took me by the hand with both of his, and said: "Mine Gott, you American peoples is de beshthearted I never saw pefore! Goot night, goot night, my frendt; I never forgets you!"

I hav never been sorry for that act, because I know the object was a worthy one.

I went to New York city in the winter of 1856, and my pleasure in looking over the great city, with its fine buildings and places of resort, was much marred at the distress that met me in almost every street through which I passed. I found, however, that misery loved to congregate, so that in some localities it was much worse than in others.

The first day I put my hand into my pocket until all my small change was gone, and I resolved that I could not giv any more that day, but would provide myself with convenient change, so as to giv each object a little the next day. But as I was passing along Chatham street, my eyes met the most appalling bit of human misery I had ever beheld. It was a very sickly looking woman with scarcely enough drapery to cover her person, holding in her lap a poor, shriveled-up baby. The day was quite cold, and the whole picture struck me with a shock of misery. I was walking rapidly at the time, but took in the situation at a glance, and every step I took only increased my misery. After thinking it over for a short time, I turned upon my heel and went back, and handed the woman a dollar bill. I believe I should never hav had any comfort while in the city, if I had not done it.

The next day I provided myself with a pocketful of change, and I had no trouble in getting rid of it, but one object made an especial impression upon me. As I came along Wall street, approaching Broadway, I noticed a broker's window piled up with heaps of coins, forming curious pyramids; bankbills, etc., making a grand display of money. On the outside, on the stone steps, sat an old woman poorly clad, and a girl about thirteen years of age, rather good-looking in features. She had a small stand of cigars which she offered to sell me. I looked at her stock. She said, "O do please buy a few, won't you? mother and I need money." I found by close inspection, that the cigars were stock that had been damaged and carefully patched up so as to make them salable. I could not help noting the contrast—just inside of those huge glass windows lay wealth by the thousands, and on the outside was humanity in a starving condition! I thought, "What a pity! here is a nice-featured girl just merging into womanhood—what must be her temptations to sin in the near future, if she is compelled to follow this precarious and dangerous employment in life!" I needed no cigars; I did not smoke; but the condition of that poor mother and child brought the tears to my eyes, and I wondered why such poverty was permitted. I suppose the girl was surprised that I let several large tears drop, as I selected the largest coin in my pocket and handed it to her. She wanted me to take the best of the cigars, but when I said I did not use any tobacco, she looked a thousand thanks and said, "You are a kind, good gentleman, that you are." And I passed on as soon as possible to take in other more inviting pictures of the metropolis; but I am sure I saw enough poverty to sink a city in that one day's promenade.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,
WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

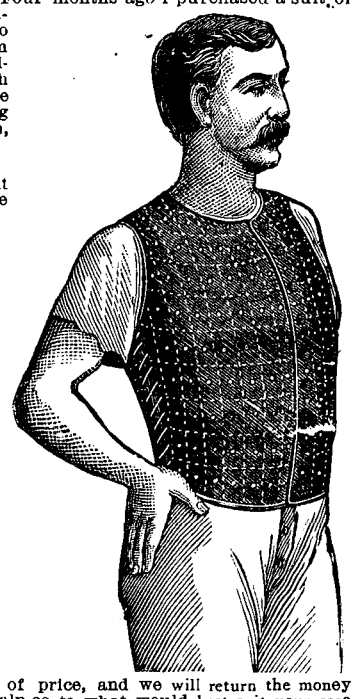
Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain
Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.



DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,
Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

CAPTAINS OF INDUSTRY; or, Men of Business Who Did Something besides Making Money. A Book for Young Americans. By James Parton. 400 pp. Price $1.25. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

This is the sort of book that one takes up with the impression that he has before him something worth reading, and lays it down under conviction, regretful only that the end has been reached. Mr. Parton is one of our great men. He is as good a historian as Bancroft, without any of Bancroft's religious cant or bias. He is as good a writer as Washington Irving—as pleasing, and, of the two, the more vigorous.

The present volume, as its title indicates, is written for the youth of this country, but will be read with profit by all. Forty-six characters in history are dealt with according to their merits, and Mr. Parton finds much to commend in all of them. Some of these men hav not before been mentioned by the historian, yet they are the men who, in the capacity in which they, by choice or chance, made themselvs great, hav to some extent altered the destiny of nations for the better. They hav set examples for others, and their labors turned the world ahead. He deals with pioneers and farmers, with engineers and mechanics, with clockmakers and bridgebuilders, with printers and editors, with philanthropists and inventors, with booksellers, housebuilders, and financiers. There is Ichabod Washburn, who showed the world how to make wire; Elihu Burritt, the learned blacksmith; Chauncey Jerome, who made it possible for every family to hav a clock; Peter Faneuil, the builder of Faneuil Hall; Edward Coles, the man who set his slaves free, and tried to make them independent; Myron Holley, gardener and gentleman; Robert Owen, the philanthropist, whose only fault before the world was that he placed the Christian superstition among the others; Gerritt Smith, the free-hearted and honest; Horace Greeley, the greatest of editors; Peter Cooper, one of the best of men; Rowland Hill, the father of cheap postage; the Marquis of Worcester (not mentioned in history), the inventor of the steam engin; and Moses Montefiore, the Jew and the benefactor of his race. The histories of all these men, and the many others, it is useful to know. It is entertaining to read them as written by Mr. Parton.

Perhaps the most touching sketch is that of Wonderful Walker, the English preacher, embalmed in verse by Wordsworth and described by him in prose. This man seems to hav been firm in the faith that his first duty was to provide for and educate his children. To this end he labored as schoolmaster, notary, conveyancer, appraiser, arbitrator, and farmer, as well as shoemaker, weaver, and spinner. Yet all these, together with the sort of preaching which he was enabled to do on Sundays, yielded him barely $120 a year. On that pay, however, he raised a fine family, gave his sons college learning, and left a handsome sum behind. When he was past ninety years, his good wife died, and was borne to the grave by three of her daughters and one granddaughter. The old man was almost blind, but, says Mr. Parton, he felt about when the corpse was lifted until he got hold of a cloth that was fastened to the coffin, and thus as one of the bearers he entered the church where she was to be buried. Though he continued preaching, he sensibly drooped after the loss of his wife. His voice faltered as he preached. Not the love of God, nor the hope of heaven, could sustain him as he looked at the seat in which she had sat, and where he had watched her kind and beautiful face for more than sixty years. He could not pass her grave without tears. "One night, in his ninety-fourth year, he tottered upon his daughter's arm, as his custom was, to the door, to look out for a moment upon the sky, 'How clear,' said he, 'the moon shines to-night.' In the course of that night he passed peacefully away. Of all the men of whom I hav ever read," concludes the biographer, "this man, I think, was the most virtuous and the most fortunate." We hav no ministers in our day like Wonderful Walker. He was out of place among the clergy of even a hundred and fifty years ago.

This book contains eight portraits, among them those of Peter Cooper, Gerritt Smith, and Myron Holley. Of the last, the Hon. Elizur Wright has written a biography, from which Mr. Parton quotes briefly. Little is known of him to general history, but he was, nevertheless, a noble and excellent man.

Characteristically of Mr. Parton's writings, "Captains of Industry" deals in perfect fairness with all, but it has no words of laudation for those misguided enthusiasts who hav grown "virtuous" in their old age and made a sacrifice to God of the devil's leavings; that is, those who hav endowed societies with money to build churches, or churches already built with funds to rear steeples upon them. These men are not the captains of industry. Men who gain money by industry do not spend it in that way.

We know of no biography written for the young which we can so unreservedly recommend to the perusal of our youthful readers as "Captains of Industry."

TRAVELS FROM FAITH TO REASON. By Captain R. C. Adams. Price, $1.25. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

When a man who was born and brought up in the atmosphere of an intense evangelical religion, on coming to the maturity of his powers, throws it all overboard, and accepts the guidance of reason and experience alone, it is interesting to learn what induced the first doubt; how he got fairly on the track of investigation, and how he progressed; passing milestone after milestone of his lonely way, until he arrived at the place of his destination, a thorough Freethinker. All this is shown by Capt. Adams, in the beautifully printed book which has lately come from the press, entitled "Travels from Faith to Reason."

Natural-born Egyptians in the world of mind, having been brought up from childhood on leeks, onions, and garlic, together with fish, cucumbers, and melons, become attached to such diet. Even the Hebrews, during their captivity in Egypt, became so used to it that, when they got into the promised land of Canaan, where manna and quails lay around at their tent doors, they longed for this food (See Num. xi, 5) as fondly as a Virginian traveling in England, and sitting down to a dinner of roast beef and mustard, turns up his nose at it, and longs for the johnny-cake of his youth, baked in the ashes by old black Susan. Yet I suspect that if a captiv Hebrew had only had a chance to taste of the grapes of Eshkol, and of fat barbecued quails, with manna from heaven as a dessert, he would hav preferred it to the fare mentioned in the passage I hav quoted from the Bible. But nature, by the environments she threw around him in the house of his bondage, made him conform his taste to his Egyptian diet, so that when he got into a country where his circumstances were bettered, he still hankered after the onions and garlic of his childhood.

In leaving the land of bondage and blind faith, and traveling towards the Palestine of freedom and of reason, Capt. Adams must needs hav made great sacrifices. He would lose caste with his former religious associates. He would be reproached for putting contempt upon the religion of his sainted father. He would be charged with adopting principles which must necessarily lead to bad morals—for this is now the trump card played by the pulpiteers in their game of deceiving the people. And his salvation would not only be imperiled by his lapse from orthodoxy, but his damnation would be irreversibly sealed. Yet, notwithstanding all these strong ties which held him where he was, such was the force of truth upon his mind, that, like an ancient glacier plowing its way through a mountain, he, slowly but surely, made his way to the land of reason. One thing, however, is certain—he has not only secured his own self-respect, which is the pearl of great price to every man, but he has secured also the secret admiration of those he has left behind him, as an honest and conscientious man. Even those who stand by the stuff of old falsehood, because it is still fashionable and profitable, secretly, but really, honor such as, at all sacrifices, follow where truth leads.

Capt. Adams's book is written so plainly, and in so kind a spirit, that it is admirably adapted to assist those in the church who are just beginning to rub their eyes open and to see some glimmering of the light of truth. His method is not the heroic one of the fiery iconoclast, who gets after the saints cum pitchforko. He does not, like Paul, catch his Christian readers with guile, but frankly, yet tenderly, leads them out of the dark in such a way as to inspire them with confidence in his guidance. Towards the close of his work, where he treats of "The Church and Its Work," and the "Decline of the Ministry," if you get near enough to the captain you may detect the smell of garlic on his breath, where he speaks so hopefully of the church of the future. One would suppose that as his childhood and his youth had been blighted by this false religion, and his manhood made a fool of for years, he would hav cursed it, as other liberated souls hav done, as a nuisance upon the earth, and a mountainous obstacle in the way of the world's civilization. But his filial feeling to the church that was once his mother abides with him still, and he entertains the pleasing hope that good may ultimately be evolved from this prolific source of evil.

Every Liberal League should hav several copies of this book in its library, to hand around among the church people who could not endure anything more pungent; for while its facts and arguments are as hard as adamant, its spirit is so gentle and nurse-like that no churchman can possibly be offended at it. And if you take but one grape from a cluster of Eshkol, and press its juice upon the lips of an intelligent churchman, so that he assuredly tastes its flavor, it will awaken in him a thirst for more that will never be quenched, till, like Capt. Adams, he migrates to the land where this delicious fruit grows in all its rich abundance. A. B. B.

"WAIFS AND WANDERINGS."

As novelist, poet, orator, philosopher, and friend, I hav long held Samuel P. Putnam in high esteem.

In the realm of fiction he has been an industrious worker. Scarcely a year rolls round without a novel from his pen. "Waifs and Wanderings" is his latest and best performance. In the conception of the plot, in the literary execution, and above all, in the unfoldment of grand moral truths, Mr. Putnam evinces in this work both genius and talent. The battle scene in which Columbus heroically strives and dies is as fine a piece of word painting as can be found in our language.

Mr. Putnam's novels ought to hav an extensiv circulation. The Americans are largely a novel-reading people, and with such works as his, Liberals can reach a class that can be reached in no other way. One of the most potent factors in the anti-slavery reform was a novel, and fiction is a factor that should not be ignored in the reforms before us. There are a thousand public libraries in our land where "Golden Throne" and "Waifs and Wanderings" could be placed with great advantage to our cause. J. E. REMSBURG.

I hav just read "Waifs and Wanderings," by Samuel P. Putnam. I am glad that amongst the Liberal writers there is one who can write so simple and wholesome a story. The very defects of the book seem to be the result of a simple frankness that scorns pretense. "Do well the duty that lies at hand, and perchance you will discover to-morrow that you are a hero," is well woven in with the fear of poor Cupples on picket duty and on battle-field; and if Mr. Putnam tends well the spark of genius within himself, it is not unlikely that the same fate may overtake him in the field of literature, or on the skirmish line of Liberal thought.

Mr. Putnam's dry fun and good-natured irony pop up on all sides, and his occasional shrewd thrusts at theology, or at worldly wisdom and selfishness, are neat and effectiv.

In the early part of the book it seemed to me a little as if Mr. Putnam dealt with woman too much upon the conventional theory that she is a convenient target at which to shoot sharp little sayings about peevishness, extravagance, and all the other frailties commonly enjoyed by vulgar humanity, but usually denominated feminin.

In fact, there were a few little passages about girl babies that struck me as truly Chinese in their tone. But the writer reformed before he got through, and quite outdid himself in his enthusiasm for Amy and her daughter. So, after all, I suppose the early thrusts were intended in a purely Pickwickian sense, and, as Narcisse might say, were "only his little irony." Be this as it may, we welcome Mr. Putnam's frank, cheery, honest little book, and trust he may giv us others as wholesome.

HELEN H. GARDENER.

St. Louis, Mo., Sept. 29, 1884.

This excellent book needs no word of recommendation to anyone who has read Mr. Putnam's "Golden Throne," or "Gottlieb's Heaven." Those who know our author's power of describing the real and the actual, precisely as it appears, will not be disappointed in this gem of history, "Waifs and Wanderings," for it is more history than romance.

Only those who hav been on the battle-field for years, and hav seen the true inwardness of slavery as it was, could so vividly portray the trials of a white slave, with a taint of black blood in her veins; a noble, true woman, lawfully married to her master's son, and yet claimed and held by that owner in spite of the husband's superior rights; how her child and his child was taken from them by law, and claimed as property by its own grandfather.

In this book you hav a whole epitome of the war, and of slavery as a divine institution, and a lawful one, too, and of the grand struggle for liberty, freedom, and equality. You witness the quondam slave and her child becoming grand, true, and noble women, and finally see the ending in happiness, peace, and a reunited family love. You see the last of slavery in the United States, and I hope and trust the last also of war and war's terrible strifes and sufferings. Surely, if ever, we should now hav reached the era where all differings can be settled by arbitration, by reason and judgment.

This book is one step—and a very important one, too—toward the coming era of the abolition of physical punishment and mental slavery. Only fifty cents is a little price for so fascinating and valuable a compendium.

ELMINA.

THE MORMON QUESTION. BY J. W. STILLMAN.

I hav just read an address by Mr. Stillman, delivered in Boston Feb. 12th, on "The Mormon Question." While I think he conclusivly shows that the Constitution confers no right upon Congress to make laws for the territories upon such a question as this, and in direct opposition to the wishes of the people of said territories, he also proves that the peculiar tenets of Mormonism should be considered as a part of their religion, and as such the government of the United States has nothing to do with it, and no right to make laws concerning it, or hindering its believers from worshiping according to the dictates of their own consciences. If a man firmly believes he is to attain to a greater spirituality by having six real wives, and sixty legitimate children, than he would by having one lawful wife and two or three lawful children, and as many other liaisons and happen-so children as he chooses, shall he not be allowed to do so, if his education, environment, and heredity impel him? If not, why do we take as a guide for our Christian government a book that sets before us such examples as David and Solomon, with their many wives and concubines? or Paul and Jesus, with their freedom from all bonds and restrictions in this line, and their probable secret relations, sexually? While recommending to you a careful perusal of Mr. Stillman's forcible address, I would say that only education and the perfect equality of woman with man everywhere will kill Mormonism, prostitution, and other sexual evils. Christians Christianize heathen by settling among them and showing them by precept and example the superiority of civilization over savagism, of education over ignorance. It is not the theology that converts, but the intellectual superiority. Outsiders, by flocking into the Mormon strongholds, and sending books and papers that Liberalize, and showing the advantages of monogamic relations, will do more and better work than lawful interference can possibly do.

How many, think you, of those men who clamor against plural wives would not to-day like to bring home some young and pretty girl as wife No. 2, if social law and custom sanctioned it? Woman must claim the same rights as man before Mormonism will become extinct. If he is free to hav four wives, she must be free to hav four husbands.

GOOD WOODS FOR ELMINA AND HER BOOK.

Mr. William Sisson, of Port Hope, Canada, says: "I hav just been reading Elmina's sketch of the great show held in the city of Snowville, beyond the mountains in Virginia. Allow me to congratulate her upon her rare tact and talent as a descriptiv writer. She tells about the dress of the wealthy, and the well-to-do, and the poor fellows that worked for the show money, and in fact about the wholy thing, more precisely than I could hav done it in two whole sheets of foolscap paper, had I been there to see it."

I hav received and read Elmina's "Darwins," and think it very good. We need a great many Darwins. J. W. COUDERY.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

He has for twenty years treated exclusively all diseases of the Sexual Organs, in which he stands pre-eminent. SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in maturer years, causing night emissions by dreams, loss of sexual power, rendering marriage improper and unhappy, etc., are cured permanently by an outside application in sixty days. NO STOMACH MEDICIN USED. It is one of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries, which is entirely unknown to the medical profession. Gems of Thought.

WHAT a mistake it is to think that God is pleased with our making ourselvs wretched, to think that he is made happy by our making ourselvs miserable, and that to secure happiness in the world to come, we must make ourselvs as unhappy as possible in this! I enroll myself as one who will be as cheerful as possible in this life, with an equal chance for good cheer in another life, if there is one. As "a bird in hand is worth two in the bush," so happiness now is far more valuable to us than the promis of it a thousand years hence, in some other place of abode. There is no better way to be always happy than to secure happiness in the present. If we take the means to be happy in the now and not defer it till the future, we may always hav happiness. Whereas, if we make ourselvs unhappy now with the expectation of being very happy in consequence at some indefinit time in the future, we hav no positiv assurance of happiness at all.—D. M. Bennett's Infidel Abroad.

THE idea of God having inspired four different men to write a history of the same transactions—or rather of many different men having undertaken to write such a history, of whom God inspired four only to write correctly, leaving the others to their own unaided resources, and giving us no test by which to distinguish the inspired from the uninspired—certainly appears self-confuting and anything but natural. If the accounts of the same transactions agree, where was the necessity for more than one? If they differ (as they notoriously do), it is certain that only one can be inspired; and which is that one?—W. R. Greg.

DID not the minds of the apostles retain some errors long after they had been gifted with supernatural powers? Did they not believe in demons occupying the bodies of men and swine? Did they not expect Christ to assume a wordly sway? Did not their master strongly rebuke the moral notions and feelings of two of them, who were for calling down fire from heaven on an offending village? It is often said that when a man's asseveration of his infallibility is combined with the support of miracles, his inspiration is satisfactorily proved; and this statement is made on the assumption that God would never confer supernatural power on one who could be guilty of a falsehood. What then are we to say respecting Judas and Peter, both of whom had been furnished with the gifts of miracle and employed them during a mission planned by Christ, and of whom, nevertheless, one became the Traitor of the garden, and the other uttered against his Lord three falsehoods in one hour?—Martineau's Rationale of Religious Inquiry.

WE hav, in the following inquiry, attempted to throw some light upon subjects from which uncertainty has, hitherto, deterred the wise, and obscurity the ignorant. Happy, if we can unite the boundaries of the different species of philosophy by reconciling profound inquiry with clearness, and truth with novelty; and still more happy if, reasoning in this easy manner, we can undermine the foundations of an abstruse philosophy, which seems, hitherto, to hav served only as a shelter to superstition, and a cover to absurdity and error.—Hume's Inquiry Concerning the Human Understanding.

IT is as natural to die as to be born; and to a little infant the one is as painful as the other. He that dies in an earnest pursuit, is like one that is wounded in hot blood; who, for the time, scarce feels the hurt; and, therefore, a mind fixed and bent upon some link that is good, doth avert the dolors of death. —Bacon's Essays. One was saying that his great-grandfather, and grandfather, and father died at sea; and said another that heard him, "An I were as you, I would never come at sea." "Why," saith he, "where did your great-grandfather, and grandfather, and father die?" He answered, "Where but in their beds?" Saith the other, "An I were as you, I would never come to bed."—Bacon's Apothegms.

OF all aprons, the must puzzling to me hitherto has been the Episcopal or Cassock. Wherein consists the usefulness of this apron? The overseer (Episcopus, or bishop) of souls, I notice, has tucked in the corner of it, as if his day's work was done; what does he shadow forth thereby, etc.?—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

NAPOLEON crossed the Alps with scarcely the loss of a man, while Hannibal left behind him nearly half his army. Yet Napoleon was not a greater man than Hannibal, nor was his enterprise conducted with greater ability. Three things we ought to learn from history; one, that we are not in ourselvs superior to our fathers; another, that we are shamefully and monstrously inferior to them, if we do not advance beyond them.—Dr. Arnold.

FOR ourselvs, we own that we do not understand the common phrase—so often applied to Charles the First—a good man but a bad king. We can as easily conceive a good man and unnatural father, or a good man and a treacherous friend. We cannot, in estimating the character of an individual, leave out of consideration his conduct in the most important of all human relations; and if, in that relation, we find him to hav been selfish, cruel, and deceitful, we shall take the liberty to call him a bad man, in spite of all his temperance at table and all his regularity at chapel.—Macaulay's Milton.

IN everything, I wot, there lies measure;
For though a man forbid all drunkenness,
He biddeth not that every creature
Be drinkless altogether, as I guess.—Chaucer.

Odds and Ends.

THE Newark Advertiser did it in this way: "Born to the wife of Amos Josephs, a daughter—twins." The inference is that full returns were not in when the first part of the notice was set up.

IT is wrong to allow one's business prejudices to get mixed up with religion. We hav just heard of a shoemaker in the northern part of the state who will not attend a church in which the clergyman does not pray on his feet, in order that his boots may sooner or later need half-soling. According to this style of preference, we imagin the summer-resort bathing-masters are all Baptists.

THE DECLINING YEAR.

October's here, the golden summer's gone,
A hazy veil hangs round the silent wood
Wherein the partridge drums upon the beech.
Among the cat-tails in the distant marsh
I hear the loon and eke the piping quail,
Whose sweet "Bob White" proclaims the autumn's here.

No more the rose is rocking
Within the quiet lea;
Our last year's tile we're blocking
To save the needed V.
The songster off the tree
The happy sportsman's knocking.

The hotel clerk, never glummer,
Put's up his diamond stud;
The beauties of the summer
Are now upon the scud;
And rapturously bud
The visions of the plumber.

Then pack away the flannel
Clothing we used to wear,
And back against the panel
Tip-tilt the easy-chair,
And we'll forget all care
Before the glowing cannel.

Sitting upon this old rail-fence, I see
That noisy pirate of the air, the crow,
Circle above the fields of ripening corn.
I also hear the laugh—the merry laugh
Of some small nutting party in the woods,
And almost hear the nuts come pattering down
Upon the ground before their eager eyes.
I see the orchard where the robins built
Their cosy nests, and sweetened all the spring
With dainty love songs on the swinging branch.
But they are gone, and withered are the nests,
And every wind sighs sadly through the limbs,
As through the halls of some deserted house.

No more the humming-bird serenely hums,
And all around the waving lily curves;
No more the grass-blade, held between his thumbs,
The urchin blows to shatter all our nerves.

No more the snowy lambkin, rapture-full,
With his hind legs the highest fence-rail hits;
No more, no more the inquisitiv Durham bull
About yon garden like a swallow flits.

No more the katydid exhausts its jaw
Among the vines where fire-flies used to flash;
No more we slap our noses till they're raw,
In hopes the d——d* musketo for to smash.

Nor more the bald head feels the buzzing fly,
No more the robin in the tree-top toots,
No more before the can the scared ki-yi
Like summer lightning down the highway scoots.

'Tis sweet to listen to the sounding flail,
'Tis sweet to listen to the woodman's ax—
I love to hear all sounds of busy life.
The hum of bees around a summer hive
Is soothing to my ear as is the brook
That ripples through the field in sunny June,
On golden mornings when the bobolink
Sings out his heart above the clover blooms.
The grapes hang thick in purple clusters now;
Outside, the apples dry upon a board,
And promis giv of many pies to come
When winter shrieks across the empty fields.
Upon the shelf—the fragrant pantry shelf—
The pumpkin pie is ripe for anxious eyes
And hungry mouths to fondly contemplate.

By the wall the sumach's nodding,
And the farmer's homeward plodding
To his tea,
And the little boy is grinning,
As he goes serenely shinning
Up the tree.

While the quail about is hopping,
And the mellow fruit is dropping
From the bough,
And the trees their leaves are shedding,
And they make delightful bedding
For the cow.

Chilly winds the rose-leaves scatter,
And the chestnuts gaily patter
On the sod,
Where Matilda's idly stretching
On the russet mosses, sketching
Golden-rod.

While the breezes sad airs waken
All around the nest forsaken
On the limb,
And the bee forgets the lily,
And the day is far too chilly
For a swim.

While the wild bird stops his singing,
And for Georgia goes a-winging
From the grove,
Let me homeward go a-footing,
And get right to work to putting
Up the stove.

The twilight's purple's melting into lead,
And on the topmost limb the turkey sleeps;
Across the darkening wold the farmer comes;
Upon the hill-top smiles the harvest moon;
The breeze sighs through the banners of the corn;
The air is sharp. Come, Vivian, let us go.

Notes and Clippings.

JOHN BOGLE went to a revival meeting, got excited, and in thirty minutes was a raving maniac. Religion will sometimes hav that effect on a man.

A TENNESSEE paper says: "Last Sunday, Nashville's pulpits thundered against the non-observance of Sunday in that city, but in the afternoon six thousand people attended a base-ball game."

DURING a recent thunder shower the spire of a Catholic cathedral was struck by lightning and the cross on top was completely shattered. He who holds the lightning in his hand must hav dropped this bolt inadvertently.

THE most recent addition to lachrymal verse is from a New Hampshire paper. Its poetical excellence is not its main feature, but its theology is probably sound. The obituary reads as follows:

"Little Johnny he has left us,
And of joy he has bereft us;
For his soul has took its fly
To upper, better worlds on high."

CATHOLIC ignorance and superstition hav rendered very difficult the task of fighting the cholera in Italy. Last month, at Pesciano, a small village in Calabria, shots were fired from the windows of some of the houses in order to keep off the supposed distributors of the cholera poison. A small body of carabineers was consequently sent there, but they were received with volleys of stones and shots, so that the men were obliged to use their firearms in self-defense.

GENTLENESS is better than godliness. "You boys ought to be kind to your little sisters," said a Western Sunday-school superintendent. "I once knew a bad boy who struck his little sister a blow over the eye. She did not resent the blow immediately, but in a short time, with the word forgivness on her lips, she rose up and hit him over the head with a rolling-pin, so that he couldn't go to Sunday-school for more than a month on account of not being able to put his best hat on."

THE silence of Col. Bob Ingersoll is surprising, but there is a reason for it. Suppose he should one of these days take a notion that he has trained long enough with the scribes and hypocrits and pharisees of the Republican party, with monopolists and hunkers and mugwumps, and should make up his mind as Butler has to take a census of his friends. We shall hav more to say about this next week. There are more presidential elections coming and we hav a curious fancy that we see Bob Ingersoll coming too.—Winsted (Conn.) Press.

MR. BEECHER'S citation of Cleveland's immorality as a "warning" to young men moves W. P. Hall to tell this story in the Chicago Tribune: "I once lived in Missouri. There was a negro preacher in our village who was brought before his congregation charged with being on more intimate terms with some of the colored sisters than was consistent with his profession. It was a clear case. The proof of his guilt was positiv, so the Rev. J. Wesley Jones took 'high moral ground' in his defense, and said that he did it as 'a wannin' to his flock; to let the sisters know that they couldn't 'flirt around dis lamb of God with impunity,' and he was acquitted."

THE timely interference of policemen this afternoon, says an October 3d dispatch from Erie, prevented a tragic result of the insane vagaries of Leo Schraeck and his wife Francisca. This couple, devout Catholics, lost all their money in the defunct Erie County Savings Bank, which was recently robbed by its officers. A friend, John Flick, who came from Bavaria, also suffered loss. The three afterward united in a season of fasting and prayer, which was continued so long as to completely destroy their reason through exhaustion and excitement. Acting on the advice of an angel, they buried all their household goods, and when found by the police Flick and Mrs. Schraeck were preparing Leo Schraeck for crucifixion after the manner of Christ's death, to which he had consented. Flick escaped, but Mr. and Mrs. Schraeck were placed in close confinement. Their household goods hav been found buried in a grave, which was prepared for Schraeck. The bittter feeling against the bank officials has been re-kindled by this episode.

ONE of the newest and latest things from "the cloth" is told by a leading Hartford divine. A parishioner, as the story goes, was nearing the end, and his friends thought he ought to see a minister. The clergyman was sent for, and promptly responded to the summons. As soon as the sick man saw him he commenced telling him of his sufferings, and the hopelessness of his getting well. "I'm all broke up," he said. "Everything's gone back on me, and I don't think I'll liv long." "But you must call on the Lord," replied the spiritual adviser. "Oh," persisted the sick man, "I'm old and feeble, and used up—all broke up, sir, and don't get out to call on anybody."

IN one of her recent lectures at Boston, Emerson being the theme, Mrs. E. D. Cheney relates the following as having come directly from Governor Andrews, of whom the words were spoken. Father Taylor was the famous sailor preacher, and was known to and appreciated by Emerson: "Mr. Emerson," said Father Taylor to Governor Andrews, "is one of the sweetest creatures God ever made. But there is a screw loose in the machinery somewhere. Where I cannot tell, for I never heard it jar. He must go to heaven when he dies; for if he went to hell the devil would not know what to do with him. But still, he knows no more of the religion of the New Testament than Balaam's ass did of the principles of the Hebrew grammar."

T. W. WEBB writes to Notes and Queries: The little church of Crasswall, in Herefordshire, close to the site of a Cistercian abbey of that name, and lying under the great wall of the Hatrel or Black Mountains, which form the western frontier of Wales, has recently been restored by the incumbent, Rev. C. L. Eagles, to whom I am indebted for the following illustration of the ancient state of ecclesiastical affairs in that very remote neighborhood: "On the north side of the church is an old cockpit; an old man who died in 1869, aged ninety-six, told me he had been at many a cock-fight there. 'People did come from all parts, and after sarvice did fight the cocks. Ah! People did come to church in them days.' There were stands of ginger-bread at the time of fighting, and people came from Clifford, Dorstone, the Hay, and even Talgarth, a little town nine miles or more distant. The pit remains as a memento of the past."

IN the Scientific American of last week an account of the recent trial at Sandy Hook of Keely's so-called "etheric force" gun is printed. The writer says of the gun that to his eye it was "nothing more than a clumsy air-gun, from which a few bullets were discharged." He says Keely's cylinder was charged with compressed air, and describes the operation of firing the gun as follows: The cylinder was connected by a small pipe with the breech of the gun; thin disks of hard and soft rubber formed a partition between the breech air-chamber and the bullet. The performance consisted first in the turning of the air faucet by Keely, then, while the air was flowing through the small pipe into the air chamber, he struck on the rear part of the gun with a mallet, by which he pretended to vibrate the "etheric vapor." By the time he got through with this juggle the air pressure had accumulated behind the disks sufficiently to burst them, and then the bullet was driven out. Keely then turned off the air, and prepared another charge. By varying the thickness of the disks the velocity of the bullets could be increased or diminished as desired to suit the credulity of the audience, and by this juggle it was pretended that the pressure of the "etheric force" increased with the discharging of the gun. Accompanying the article are sketches of the gun and of the gas checks, which latter the writer says can be made strong enough to withstand air at a pressure amply sufficient to drive a bullet with the velocity obtained in the experiments. He adds: "We estimate that Keely used an air pressure of 800 to 1,000 pounds to the square inch to break his gas checks and discharge the bullets."

AN old-time deacon, traveling, found himself one Sunday in a country town in middle Georgia, where a big revival meeting was in progress. He had a supply of fluid rations in his satchel, and by nightfall was quite liberal in his state of feelings. Hearing the shouting and singing at the church, he went down there to observe the proceedings. He was forced to find a seat near the front row of benches usually reserved for the "mourners." The meeting was growing interesting, and the preacher was fervent. Soon he called out: "All of you who want to go to heaven, please stand up!" Every one in the church stood up except the deacon, who didn't comprehend that he was a part of the "everybody" addressed. The preacher and the congregation stared at him very hard, and the former saw a chance to administer a rebuke, and when the people were again seated, he called: "Now, all of you who want to go to hell, stand up!" He stared hard at the deacon, who, dimly catching on to the formalities of the affair, stood up in view of the whole crowd. Seeing nobody standing but himself and the preacher, he solemnly waved his hand at the latter and said: "Well (hic), parson, it 'pears that you'n me iz (hic) in er hopeless minority, don't it?" The meeting was adjourned by the horrified preacher, amid the suppressed laughter of the crowd, and the deacon was helped to lodgings by the marshal.

THE Rev. Mr. Beatty is a Christian missionary in Ahmedadad, India. When Major Tucker last spring invested the place with his Salvation Army, Mr. Beatty received him with open arms, and loaned him his schoolroom for a barracks, and things went on swimmingly. White-robed Peace sang her songs of joy. But when warm weather came, Mr. Beatty took to the woods to work up a constituency, and in an evil moment Major Tucker remembered that the missionaries had a little community of converts occupying the village of Shahawadi, about three miles south of Ahmedabad, which community was their particular pride and care. Major Tucker seems to hav thought that these Christians must be in special need of salvation, for he proceeded to invade the village with tambourines, tomtoms, banners, etc., and, after a little, succeeded in converting a large portion of the village, including the patel, to the "Mukhtifauj." The news reached Mr. Beatty at Matheran that some one was poaching on his preserves, and he hastened to rescue his flock. In a state of holy anger and pious grief he reached Shahawadi, and encountered Major Tucker in full possession—banners, tambourines, tomtoms, and all. Mr. Beatty proceeded to expostulate, whereupon Major Tucker went down upon his knees and prayed audibly for the salvation of Mr. Beatty's soul. Soon afterward the dispute in the village took a practical turn, and the missionary converts would not permit the Salvationists to draw water. Hence a petition to the collector, who had to go down and make inquires. He found that there were only two wells in the village. One was public property and was usually used for watering cattle, but was then dry. The other well, on which the village depended for drinking water, was private property, belonging to a nativ Christian who was not a Salvationist, and who now, in a truly Christian spirit, refused to let the Salvationists draw water from his well. The recriminations on both sides were rather amusing. One old Salvationist lady exclaimed with much warmth, "Oh, I hav drawn water from that well all my life. Why should you break my pots if I go there now? You're not Christians!" To this an old man retorted, "Why do you disturb us and frighten our buffaloes by marching through the village with your tomtoms, and your banners, and your horrid noise?" Major Tucker is now poaching on the missionary preserves at Anand and Borsad. The quarrel seems a very pretty one as it stands. The correspondent of the India Times fears that the interference of the heathen police will hav to be invoked to keep these "harbingers of peace" from breaking one another's heads.

Bible Morals.

Considering all the heresies, the enormous crimes, the wickedness, the astounding follies, which the Bible has been made to justify, and which its indiscriminate reading has suggested; considering that it has been, indeed, the sword which our Lord said he was sending, and that not the devil himself could have invented an implement more potent to fill the hated world with lies and blood and fury, I think certainly that to send hawkers over the world loaded with copies of this book, scattering it in all places, among all persons, . . . is the most culpable folly of which it is possible for man to be guilty.—James Anthony Froude.

Catholics are condemned by Protestants for having clothed with the dogma of infallibility a man; yet Protestants do not hesitate themselves to clothe with the same dogma a book, the product of man. The Bible fills the same office in the Protestant church that the Roman pontiff does in the Catholic church. And not content are Protestants with acknowledging their allegiance to this paper pope; many of them wish to impose its authority upon their Catholic, Jewish, and Freethought neighbors. Three million Bibles, it is claimed, were printed and distributed by them last year. Millions of children, many of them the children of unbelievers, are gathered together Sunday after Sunday and taught that its words are divine. In this country there is an organization pledged to secure the recognition of this book as the basis of our civil law, and the supreme authority and rule of conduct in our public schools. From the dome of our national capitol, and from the cupola of every schoolhouse in the land, they seek to unfurl the standard of this pope's supremacy. Luther, the founder of Protestantism, protested against the authority of the pope of Rome; I am here to-day to protest against the authority of Luther's pope.

In opposing the Bible, do not suppose that I am so uncharitable as to deny to it any merit. There is much in it to be admired. The Mosaic code, crude and barbarous as it is, contains many statutes that are wise and just; the Proverbs constitute a storehouse of Oriental wisdom; Job, dressed in the rich imagery of the East, is a poem of surpassing merit; many of the psalms are gems of poesy; David's lament for Saul and Jonathan, and the words spoken over his dead Absalom, are touchingly beautiful; the Sermon on the Mount, with all its vague and impracticable teachings, is a composition that has charmed and will continue to charm thousands who reject the dogma of its author's divinity; those chapters in John which record the last hours of Jesus with his disciples are so full of pathos that in reading them we forget the Christ and hear only the sad, human voice of the "gentle Nazarene;" Paul's writings reveal a master mind, and through the clouds of his theology there bursts forth many a ray of truth.

I could dwell long and lovingly upon the beauties of this book, but duty calls me to another task, less inviting, yet not less needful. I am asked to accept this book as the revealed will of an all-wise, all-powerful, and all-merciful God, to bow down and worship it, to make a fetich of it. Among other requirements respecting it, I am asked to accept it as an infallible moral guide. I refuse to accept it as such, and now proceed to state the reasons why I thus refuse.

FALSEHOOD AND DECEPTION.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it sanctions the use of falsehood and deception.

"And the Lord said, Who shall persuade Ahab that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-gilead? And one said on this manner, and another said on that manner.

"And there came forth a spirit and stood before the Lord, and said, I will persuade him.

"And the Lord said unto him, Wherewith? And he said, I will go forth, and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And he said, Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also; go forth and do so.

"Now therefore, behold the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these, thy prophets" (1 Kings xxii, 20–23).

Four hundred prophets,

> "All of them inspired by the spirit from on high,
> And all of them a lying as fast as they can lie."

"If the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord have deceived that prophet" (Ezek. xiv, 9).

"O Lord, thou hast deceived me" (Jer. xx, 7).

"Wilt thou be altogether unto me as a liar?" (Jer. xv, 18).

"God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie" (2 Thess. ii, 11).

God says to Adam, respecting the forbidden fruit: "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen. ii, 17). This declaration proved to be untrue.

In regard to the promised land he says: "Doubtless ye shall not come into the land, concerning which I sware to make you dwell therein, . . . and ye shall know my breach of promise" (Num. xiv, 30–34).

God commands Moses to deceive Pharaoh (Ex. iii, 18); he rewards the midwives for their deception (Ex. i, 15–20); and instructs Samuel to deceive Saul (1 Sam. xvi, 2).

Thus God is represented in the Bible as continually resorting to the use of falsehood and deceit. The patriarchs all follow the example set by him. Abraham tries to deceive Pharaoh and Abimelech (Gen. xii, 13–19; xx, 2); Sarah tries to deceive the Lord himself (Gen. xviii, 13–15). Abraham becomes the parent of a liar. Isaac said of Rebecca, his wife: "She is my sister" (Gen. xxvi, 7). Rebecca in turn deceives her husband (Gen. xxvii, 6–17). Jacob sustains the reputation of the family for lying.

"And he came unto his father, and said, My father; and he said, Here am I; who art thou, my son? And Jacob said unto his father, I am Esau, thy first-born."

"And he discerned him not, so he blessed him. And he said, Art thou my very son, Esau? And he said, I am" (Gen. xxvii, 18–24).

Jacob's wives, Leah and Rachel, both used deceit. The former deceived her husband (Gen. xxix, 25); the latter deceived her father (Gen. xxxi, 34, 35). His twelve sons were all addicted to the same vice (Gen. xxxvii; xlii, 7), and these became the founders of the twelve tribes of Israel, God's chosen people.

For her treason and lying Rahab is rewarded (Josh. ii, 1–6; vi, 25). Paul canonizes her as a saint, and James says: "Was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, when she had received the messengers, and had sent them out another way?"

David, Elisha, and Jeremiah, three of God's holiest men, were deliberate liars (1 Sam. xxvii, 8–11; 2 Kings viii, 7–15).

Christ taught in parables that he might deceive the people (Mark iv, 11, 12).

Paul says, "Being crafty, I caught you with guile;" in other words, "I deceived you." Again he writes, "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?" (Rom. iii, 7.)

The primitive Christians, accepting the Bible as infallible authority, naturally regarded lying for God's glory not a vice, but a virtue. Mosheim says:

"It was an established maxim with many Christians, that it was pardonable in an advocate for religion to avail himself of fraud and deception, if it were likely they might conduce toward the attainment of any considerable good" (Eccles. His.).

"These officious lies they were wont to say were designed for a good end" (Ibid).

Bishop Fell thus writes: "In the first ages of the church, so extensiv was the license of forging, so credulous were the people in believing, that the evidence of transactions was grievously obscured."

M. Daille, one of the most distinguished of French Protestants, says: "For a good end they made no scruple to forge whole books."

Dr. Gieseler, professor of theology at Gottingen, says they "quieted their conscience respecting the forgery with the idea of their good intention."

Dr. Priestly says they "thought it innocent and commendable to lie for the sake of truth."

Scaliger says, "They distrusted the success of Christ's kingdom without the aid of lying."

Paul, the great theologian of the first century, and the real founder of Christian theology, we have seen, justifies the use of falsehood. The two most eminent Christian fathers of the second century were Justin Martyr and Irenæus. Of the former Mosheim observes, "Much of what Justin says is wholly undeserving of credit;" while Dr. Whitby affirms that Irenæus "scandalously deluded the world with fables and lying narrations."

Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome, the greatest ecclesiastical lights of the third, fourth, and fifth centuries, respectively, all sanction the use of fraud in promoting the interests of the church.

"A strict regard to truth in disputation," says Bishop Horsley, "was not one of the virtues of his [Origen's] character."

The thirty-second chapter of the Twelfth Book of Eusebius's "Evangelical Preparation" bears this significant title: "How far it may be proper to use falsehood as a medicin, and for the benefit of those who require to be deceived."

Jerome says, "I do not find fault with an error which proceeds from a hatred toward the Jews, and a pious zeal for the Christian faith."

Bishop Heliodorus affirms that "a falsehood is a good thing when it aids the speaker and does no harm to the hearers."

That is what Joseph Cook thinks; that is what Talmage thinks; that is what nearly every theologian thinks.

That the methods employed in establishing the church are still used in perpetuating its power, a glance at the so-called Christian literature of the day will suffice to show. Read the works of our sectarian publishers, examine the volumes that compose our Sunday-school libraries, peruse our religious papers and periodicals, and you will see that age has but confirmed the habit formed in infancy.

Every church dogma is a lie, and based upon lies. The church depends upon fraud for its support. The work of its ministers is not to discover and promulgate truths, but to invent and disseminate falsehoods. In the words of Isaiah, they well might say: "We have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves."

The church offers a premium upon falsehood and imposes a punishment upon truthfulness. With a bribe in one hand, and a club in the other, she has sought to prolong her sway. The allurements of the one, and the fear of the other, have filled the world with hypocrisy. In our halls of Congress, in the editorial sanctum, in the professor's chair, behind the counter, in the work-shop, at the fireside, everywhere, we find men professing to believe what they know to be false, or wearing the seal of silence on their lips while rank imposture stalks abroad and truth is trampled in the mire before them.

Every truth seeker is taunted and ridiculed, every truth teller persecuted and defamed. The scientist and philosopher are discouraged and opposed, the heretic and Infidel calumniated and maligned. In proof of this, witness the abuse heaped upon the living Huxleys and Ingersolls, see the countless calumnies circulated against the dead Darwins and Paines.

CHEATING.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it sanctions cheating and the use of dishonorable methods in obtaining wealth and power.

"And Jacob sod [boiled] pottage; and Esau came from the fields, and he was faint; and Esau said to Jacob, Feed me, I pray thee, with that same red pottage; for I am faint. . . . And Jacob said, Sell me this day thy birthright. And Esau said, Behold, I am at the point to die; and what profit shall this birthright do to me? And Jacob said, Swear to me this day; and he sware unto him; and he sold his birthright unto Jacob. Then Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage of lentiles; and he did eat and rose up and went away" (Gen. xxv, 29–34).

This transaction, one of the basest ever recorded, receives the sanction of the Bible God. Jacob subsequently entered into a co-partnership with God to cheat Laban out of his cattle. His cheating his brother out of his father's blessing has been alluded to. Thus by defrauding his uncle, his famishing brother, and his blind and aged father, this God-beloved patriarch stands forth the prince of cheats—the patron saint of rogues.

The Israelites obtain the Egyptians' property by false pretenses.

"And I [God] will give this people favor in the sight of the Egyptians; and it shall come to pass that when ye go, ye shall not go empty; but every woman shall borrow of her neighbor, and of her that sojourneth in her house, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment; and ye shall put them upon your sons, and upon your daughters; and ye shall spoil the Egyptians" (Ex. iii, 21, 22).

"And the Lord said unto Moses, . . . Speak now in the ears of the people, and let every man borrow of his neighbor, and every woman of her neighbor, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold" (Ex. xi, 1, 2).

"And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses; and they borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment; and the Lord gave the people favor in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they lent unto them such things as they required; and they spoiled the Egyptians" (Ex. xii, 35, 36).

Here obtaining goods under false pretenses, and embezzlement, are commended by God himself. It may be claimed that the Egyptians had wronged the Israelites. Suppose they had; could God secure justice for them only by treachery and fraud? Suppose your son worked for a farmer, and that farmer defrauded him of his wages; would you advise your son to borrow a horse of his employer and decamp with it in order to obtain redress, especially when you had the power to obtain redress by lawful means? Instead of encouraging these slaves in an act that would eventually lead them to become a race of thieves and robbers, an honest God would have taken their masters by the collar and said, "You have received the labor of these men and women; pay them for it!"

In the Mosaic law we find the following beautiful statute:

"Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself; thou shalt give it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien" (Deut. xiv, 21).

Out West, a family, good Christians, had a hog to die of some disease. What did they do with it? Eat it? No, their Bible told them this would be wrong. They dressed it nicely, took it into an adjoining neighborhood, and sold it to strangers. Was this right? The Bible says it was.

With the widespread influence of a book inculcating such lessons in dishonesty, what must be the inevitable result? Men distrust their fellow-men; along our business thoroughfares Fraud drives with brazen front; in almost every article of merchandise we buy, we find a lie enshrined; at every corner sits some Jacob slyly whittling spotted sticks to win his neighbor's flocks.

THEFT AND ROBBERY.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it sanctions theft and robbery.

Its pages teem with accounts of robberies, and in many instances God is said to have planned them and shared in the spoils. He instructs Moses to send a marauding expedition against the Midianites. They put the inhabitants to the sword, and return with 800,000 cattle. Of this booty God exacts 800 head for himself, and 8,000 head for his priests. The remainder he causes to be divided between the soldiers and citizens. So elated are the Israelites with their success, so grateful to God for his assistance, that they make him a gift of 16,000 shekels of stolen gold (Num. xxxi).

When Joshua took Jericho, "they burnt the city with fire, and all that was therein; only the silver, and the gold, and the vessels of brass and of iron they put into the treasure of the Lord" (Josh. vi, 19–24).

When he captured Ai, "the cattle and the spoils of that city Israel took for a prey unto themselves, according unto the word of the Lord which he commanded Joshua" (Josh. viii, 27).

Jehovah gets the spoils of Jericho, and Israel those of Ai.

David, a modest shepherd lad, is placed under the tutelage of Jehovah, only to become the cruelest robber of his time. On one occasion, purely for plunder, he despoiled three nations, and "saved neither man nor woman alive to bring tidings to Gath, saying, Lest they should tell on us" (1 Sam. xxvii, 8–12).

It is said that the Italian bandit never plans a robbery without invoking a divine blessing upon his undertaking, doubtless believing that the God of David, of Moses, and of Joshua still reigns.

Jacob's wives, Leah and Rachel, were both thieves. Leah appropriated the property of her son; Rachel stole her father's jewels. Neither act was condemned.

Christ enjoined submission to robbery: "Of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again" (Luke vi, 30).

ADULTERY AND PROSTITUTION.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it sanctions adultery and prostitution.

Adultery is made prominent by the recital of the numerous adulteries of Abraham, Lot, Jacob, Judah, Samson, David, and other Bible saints; and sanctified by the approved adulteries of Abraham and Jacob.

Both Abraham and Isaac were willing to sell the virtue of their wives to save themselves from harm.

Two instances are recorded of fathers having offered their own daughters to gratify the lust of a sensual mob, and these abominable acts are represented as especially meritorious. Read the nineteenth chapter of Genesis, and the nineteenth chapter of Judges; dwell upon the eighth verse of the former, and the twenty-fourth verse of the latter; and then if you can indorse the spirit of these narratives, you are unfit to be the parent of a daughter.

The Mosaic law authorizes a father to sell his daughter for a concubine or mistress (euphemistically translated "maid servant"). God's instructions respecting the thirty-two thousand captive Midianite maidens, impliedly sanction concubinage and prostitution.

Luther, drawing his morality from the Bible, gave concubinage his indorsement:

"There is nothing unusual in princes keeping concubines; and although the lower orders may not perceive the excuses of the thing, the more intelligent know how to make allowance" (Consilium).

God instructs his prophet Hosea to marry a prostitute. He subsequently commands him to love and hire an adultress (Hosea i, 2, 3; iii, 1, 2).

Christ forgave the woman taken in adultery, while his favorite female companion was a reformed (?) prostitute. Referring to his female ancestors, Dr. Alexander Walker, a Christian, says:

"It is remarkable that in the genealogy of Christ, only four women hav been named: Tamar, who seduced the father of her late husband; Rachab, a common prostitute; Ruth, who, instead of marrying one of her cousins, went to bed with another of them; and Bethsheba, an adultress, who espoused David, the murderer of her first husband" (Woman, p. 330).

It is an indisputable fact that the most notorious adulterers are those whose professions make them most familiar with the teachings of the Bible, and compel them to accept its teachings as divine. During the past seven years the secular press of this country has reported a total of no less than 849 sexual crimes committed against women by the clergy. In many instances these lecherous priests had cited scripture to their victims to aid them in their infamous designs.

MURDER.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it sanctions murder.

It is true the Sixth Commandment says, "Thou shalt not kill;" but this law is practically annulled by innumerable commands from the same source, like the following, to kill:

"Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor" (Ex. xxxii, 27).

"Spare them not, but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling" (1 Sam. xv, 3).

"Slay utterly old and young, both maids and little children" (Ezek. ix, 6).

"Cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood" (Jer. xlviii, 10).

For the leader and legislator of his chosen people, God selects a murderer. The first recorded act of Moses was premeditated murder. "He looked this way and that way, and when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptian, and hid him in the sand" (Ex. ii, 12).

For committing a murder, Phinehas is rewarded by Jehovah with "the covenant of an everlasting priesthood" (Num. xxv, 6–13).

Samuel "hewed Agag," a captive king, "in pieces before the Lord" (1 Sam. xv, 32, 33).

Jehu murders all the house of Ahab.

"And Joram turned his hands and fled, and said to Ahaziah, There is treachery, O Ahaziah. And Jehu drew a bow with his full strength, and smote Jehoram between his arms, and the arrow went out at his heart and he sunk down in his chariot.

"But when Ahaziah, the king of Judah, saw this, he fled by the way of the garden house. And Jehu followed after him, and said, Smite him also in the chariot. And they did so.

"And when Jehu was come to Jezreel, Jezebel heard of it, and she painted her face, and tired her head, and looked out at a window. And as Jehu entered in at the gate she said, Had Zimri peace who slew his master? And he lifted up his face to the window, and said, Who is on my side? Who? And there looked out to him two or three eunuchs. And he said, Throw her down. So they threw her down, and some of her blood was sprinkled on the wall, and on the horses; and he trode her under foot. And when he was come in, he did eat and drink, and said, Go, see now this cursed woman, and bury her; for she is a king's daughter. And they went to bury her: but they found no more of her than the skull, and the feet, and the palms of her hands."

The dogs had devoured her.

"And Ahab had seventy sons in Samaria. And Jehu wrote letters and sent to Samaria. . . . And it came to pass when the letter came to them, that they took the king's sons, and slew seventy persons, and put their heads in baskets, and sent him them to Jezreel."

"So Jehu slew all that remained of the house of Ahab in Jezreel, and all his great men, and his kinsfolks, and his priests, until he left him none remaining."

"And the Lord said unto Jehu, Because thou hast done well in executing that which is right in mine eyes, and hast done unto the house of Ahab according to all that was in mine heart, thy children of the fourth generation shall sit on the throne of Israel" (2 Kings ix, 23, 24, 27, 30–35; x, 1, 7, 11, 30).

The assassination of Eglon by Ehud was characterized by the basest treachery and brutality. Eglon was king of Israel. Ehud carried a present to him, and after he had delivered the present he told the king that he had a private message for him. Eglon ordered his attendants to retire, and when alone Ehud drew a large dagger from beneath his cloak and thrust it through the body of the king. And the Bible tells us that God raised up Ehud expressly for this work (Jud. iii, 15–23).

The warmest eulogy in the Bible is bestowed upon a murderess. Sisera is a fugitive from battle. He reaches in safety the tent of Heber, his friend. Heber is absent, but Jael, his wife, receives the fugitive, and bids him welcome. She gives him food, spreads a soft couch for him, and covers him with her mantle. Wearied with his retreat, and unconscious of impending danger, Sisera soon sinks into a profound slumber. With a tent nail in one hand, and a hammer in the other, Jael approaches the bedside of her sleeping guest. She bends over him, listens to assure herself that he is asleep, then places the nail against his temple, and with a blow drives it through his head. A struggle, and Sisera is dead, a victim of one of the most damnable deeds ever committed.

In honor of this assassination, God's favorite prophetess, Deborah, sings:

"Blessed above women shall Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, be; blessed shall she be above women in the tent. He asked water, and she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish. She put her hand to the nail, and her right hand to the workmen's hammer; and with the hammer she smote Sisera, she smote off his head, when she had pierced and stricken through his temples. At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down; at her feet he bowed, he fell: where he bowed, there he fell down dead. The mother of Sisera looked out at a window, and cried through the lattice, Why is his chariot so long in coming? Why tarry the wheels of his chariot?" (Jud. v, 24–28).

We had a Kansas girl who followed in the footsteps of this "blessed woman." Years ago, across the prairies of southern Kansas stretched a lonely road. By its side, far from other habitations, stood an unpretentious dwelling, inhabited by four persons —father, mother, son, and daughter. But the daughter was the ruling spirit there. Their only volume, we are told, was a Bible, and this the daughter read. The house contains two rooms besides the cellar. The rooms are separated simply by a curtain. In the front room is kept a small stock of groceries. Here, too, with its back against the curtain, and fastened to the floor, stands a chair. Above the door is a sign with this inviting word, "Provisions." A traveler enters and makes some purchases, displaying a well-filled purse. He is treated hospitably, and invited to remain awhile and rest. Wearied, he drops into the chair, his head pressing against the curtain. Armed with a hammer, this follower of Jael now approaches from the rear. One well-directed blow, and the tired traveler sinks into eternal rest. His pockets are rifled, and his body thrown into the cellar, to be taken out at night and buried in the little garden behind the dwelling. Time rolls on; the traveler does not return. Day after day, his wife at home, with anxious heart, peers through the window and sighs, "Why don't he come?" At length suspicion rests upon this den of infamy. A search is instituted, and the garden is found to be a cemetery, filled with the bodies of murdered travelers—one a little child. In the mean time this female monster with her kin has fled. Detectives are still searching for her. They'll never find her. Where is she? In heaven with Jael. Now let some modern Deborah sing, "Blessed above maidens shall Kate Bender be!"

WARS OF CONQUEST AND EXTERMINATION.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it sanctions wars of conquest and extermination.

The Old Testament is largely a record of wars and massacres. God is represented as "a man of war." At his command whole nations are exterminated.

"Ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you, . . . and ye shall dispossess the inhabitants of the land, and dwell therein" (Num. xxxiii, 52, 53).

"Of the cities of these people, which the Lord thy God doth giv thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth: but thou shalt utterly destroy them" (Deut. xx, 16, 17).

"And they warred against the Midianites, as the Lord commanded Moses; and they slew all the males. . . . And the children of Israel took all the women of Midian captives, and their little ones, and took the spoil of all their cattle, and all their flocks, and all their goods. And they burnt all their cities wherein they dwelt, and all their goodly castles with fire" (Num. xxxi, 7–10).

Moses is angry because the women and children have been saved, and from this fiendish conqueror comes the mandate: "Kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man."

The mourning remnants of twenty thousand families are thus to be destroyed. The fathers, far away, lie still in death beside the smouldering ruins of their once fair homes; and now their wives and little ones are doomed to die. The signal is sounded, and the massacre begins. The mothers, on bended knees, with tearful eyes and pleading lips, are ruthlessly cut down. Their prattling babes, in unsuspecting innocence, smile on the uplifted sword as if it were a glittering toy, and the next moment feel it speeding through their little frames. The daughters only are spared—spared to be the wretched slaves of those whose hands are red with the life-blood of their dear ones.

And this is but a prelude to the sanguinary scenes that are to follow.

"Rise ye up, take your journey, and pass over the river Arnon; behold I have given into thine hand Sihon the Amorite, king of Heshbon, and his land: begin to possess it, and contend with him in battle. This day will I begin to put the dread of thee and the fear of thee upon the nations that are under the whole heaven, who shall hear report of thee, and shall tremble, and be in anguish because of thee."

"And we took all his cities at that time, and utterly destroyed the men, and the women, and the little ones of every city, we left none to remain" (Deut. ii, 24, 25, 34).

"The Lord our God delivered into our hands Og also, the king of Bashan, and all his people: and we smote him until none was left to him remaining. And we took all his cities at that time, there was not a city which we took not from them, threescore cities. . . . And we utterly destroyed them as we did unto Sihon king of Heshbon, utterly destroying the men, women, and children of every city" (Deut. iii, 3–6).

Moses dies, and Joshua next leads Jehovah's troops.

"And the Lord said unto Joshua, See, I have given into thine hand Jericho. . . . And they utterly destroyed all that was in that city, both man and woman, young and old" (Josh. vi, 2, 21).

"And the Lord said unto Joshua, Stretch out the spear that is in thy hand toward Ai; for I will give it

Common-Law Marriages.

The Blaine marriage, and the attitude of the church against impure candidates for office, giv prominence to the question whether a marriage in Kentucky in 1850 in the presence of two witnesses, without license or minister, and without public acknowledgment, was valid. As your readers may be interested in knowing what is a valid common-law marriage, I quote from the opinions of the Supreme Court of that state.

April 24, 1821, the court decided the case of Dumaresly vs. Fishly, 3 A. K., Marshall, 369.

The plaintiff set up a marriage in Indiana, under a Kentucky license, and by a Kentucky priest, and averred that the defendant had deserted her, and never consummated the marriage, and sued for slanderous words uttered against her.

The Circuit Court held the marriage valid. The court on appeal held: "As the marriage was entered into in the state of Indiana, the question in relation to its validity must, no doubt, be decided by the laws of that state. Whether, however, we consider the question with reference to the laws of Indiana, or this country, the result will be the same. For the statute of that state regulating marriages, which was read on the trial in the Circuit Court, and made a part of the record by the bill of exceptions, appears as to the point now in controversy, not to differ materially from the statute of this country upon the same subject, and the common law is in force in that as well as in this country, so far as it has not been altered or repealed by statute. It is obvious that the marriage between the parties in this case was not celebrated according to the provisions of the statute of either country. . . . But neither the statute of Indiana, nor of this state, avoids a marriage not celebrated according to its provisions. . . . In short, the legislature of either state has done nothing more than substitute a statutory mode of solemnizing the rites of matrimony, instead of the common-law mode of doing it in facie ecclesiae, and it was necessary to do this, because there was in this country no church established by law, and consequently none that had authority to solemnize the rites of matrimony. The effect, therefore, of the statutory mode of solemnizing matrimony must be precisely the same with respect to the validity of a marriage in this country as the common-law mode with respect to the validity of a marriage in England.

"Marriage is nothing but a contract, and to render it valid it is only necessary upon the principles of natural law that the parties should be able to contract, willing to contract, and should actually contract. A marriage thus made, without further ceremony, was, according to the simplicity of the ancient common law, deemed valid to all purposes; and such continued to be the law of England until the time of Pope Innocent III. [1198], when the ceremony of celebrating matrimony in facie ecclesiae was first introduced into that country. That ceremony, however, though introduced by the usurpation of the church, was afterward recognized to a certain extent by the common law; and it would hav been idle for the law to hav recognized the ceremony without attaching to it any legal consequence. It was therefore held that to constitute a marriage de jure, and render it valid to every purpose, it must be celebrated in the church. But a marriage contracted without the ceremony was, nevertheless, a marriage in fact, and was still deemed valid to most purposes."

"In fine, in every shape in which the question has been presented to the courts of common law in personal actions, or in relation to personal matters, a marriage in fact has been deemed valid. A contrary doctrin in this country would be attended with the most mischievous consequences. The statute prescribing the mode of celebrating the rites of matrimony requires that when either party is under the age of twenty-one, the consent of the parent or guardian shall be given in person or in writing; that bond and security shall be given before license shall be issued; that license shall be issued only by the clerk of the county where the female party resides; and that no clergyman who has not previously obtained testimonials for that purpose from the county court shall celebrate the rite of matrimony. A compliance with the whole of these particulars is necessary to render the marriage conformable to the statute; and a failure to comply with any one of them would render it but a marriage in fact; and if a marriage in fact be void, many of the marriages of the country would be so, for there are many in which there has been a failure, either intentionally or otherwise, to comply with some one or more of the formalities presented by the statute. A doctrin which would thus tend to vitiate a great proportion of the marriages of the country would result in incalculable evils, and cannot be admitted to be correct."

This was the law in 1850, when Blaine, then twenty years of age, was united in marriage, in the presence of family friends, to Miss Stanwood. It was not a marriage in the statutory mode, and he does not aver that it was solemnized according to the rites of any church; but it was a valid marriage according to the laws of Kentucky.

The dissenting opinion of Judge Mills states the common law more clearly than the majority opinion. He says: "I concur with the majority of the court in deciding that the marriage in this case was unauthorized on the part of the clergyman, and that it would hav been as valid if celebrated by any other individual as by him. I also agree that the case presents itself in the same attitude under the laws of Indiana as it does under our own."

After reviewing the English common law, he says: "Thus far I hav considered the case as if the English common law was in force. But I by no means admit that it ought to govern the question. It is not conceded as a historical fact, that marriage, anterior to Pope Innocent III., was allowed valid when made by the naked contract per verba presenti. It then consisted rather of acts than words. The husband attended the residence of the bride, and took her home in procession to his residence, and commenced cohabitation. Then, and not until then, she was said to be nupta, that is, married. This, however, as well as almost all testimony on the subject, is of pagan origin, and cannot hav much influence on the question, Certain it is that Pope Innocent III., claiming a commission from heaven, not only to disciple, but to marry, all nations, claimed and seized the power to marry, as belonging not to the civil government, but to the church exclusivly. After that time marriage, with all its rights and incidents, became a matter of ecclesiastical cognizance. What was and what was not marriage, was adjudged by the ecclesiastical courts, and to them the civil courts yielded this question. England became subject to the same doctrin, and her ecclesiastical courts to this day are incorporated with her government, as part of its organization. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction then ruled this question. The cases in Selkeld, 437, 438, 3 Mod. 165, 6 Mod. 155, are instances where the most eminent functionaries of the common law yielded the supremacy to ecclesiastical authority. , . . The power of this court was strong indeed. Disobedience to its determination resulted in the writ de excommunicato capiendo, by which the offender was immediately imprisoned until he submitted to the church. . . . It was, then, no wonder, under such a government as that, that rules and principles from the canon should incorporate themselvs into the common law; that thoughtless expressions, such as, 'I marry you,' or 'take you to be my wife,' spoken in a moment of unguarded feeling, should be deemed irrevocable, and seized upon by the craving and voracious disposition of a corrupt hierarchy as constituting a valid marriage, or rather what they would reduce by their sentence and jurisdiction to a valid marriage. . . . Assuming, then, the fact that such a rule was incorporated into the common from the canon law, it was one of the effects produced by corrupt religious establishments of the same character with the principle that a marriage by the priest could never be dissolved by human authority. When we adopted the common law of England, it was only so far as it suited our local situation and was compatible with the genius and spirit of our government. I would, then, select from it the most sound and liberal principles, and cast away not only all the maxims of ecclesiastical establishments, but doubt, and also reject, such parts as were tainted by canonical mixtures. In a word, I would say that the common law on this point was corrupted by too long a subjection to spiritual usurpation, and that we did not adopt it into our code, and that it is not in this respect obligatory on the court. I would take this case as one prima impressionis in this country, and subject it to the rules of all other contracts."

There is nothing in the dissenting opinion which holds a marriage by verbal contract to be void.

Another branch of the same case was heard in chancery, on bill for divorce and alimony (Fishli vs. Fishli, 2 Littell, 338). The court granted divorce and alimony to the wife.

In 1834 the Supreme Court of Kentucky again refused to follow the common law rule of Coke and the courts of his day. They held that the statute of 32 Henry 8, which declared that "no prohibition, God's law except, shall impeach any marriage without the Levitical degrees," meant that an idiot might lawfully marry. The Kentucky court says: "But this unreasonable doctrin has been supplanted by one that is more just and rational, and which is altogether consistent with the harmony and dignity of the law as a whole and as a science. Marriage is now deemed in all respects a civil union, depending on contract, express or implied, and requiring the exercise of reason." Jenkins vs. Jenkins' Heir. 2 Dana 104. The decision was rendered in 1834.

In 1835, in Stover vs. Boswell's Heir et al, 3 Dana, 233, a case of cohabitation between free negroes, it was contended there was no marriage. The court held: "Though no marriage is proven, she was for many years recognized and generally reputed to be his wife, and he cohabited with her as such. Cohabitation, copulation, acknowledgment of the parties, and living together as man and wife are sufficient, generally, in all cases, except in cases of prosecutions for bigamy, and in actions of crim. con., to establish a marriage between free white persons, 4 Johnson, 53. And we cannot perceive any good or valid reason why the same rules may not be made to apply to free colored persons." Affirmed in Taylor vs. Shemwell, 4 B. Monroe, 577.

Donnelly vs. Donnelly's Heirs, 8 B. Monroe, 113, is a case in which the validity of the first marriage, which took place in Alexandria, D. C., was involved. The proof was acknowledgment, cohabitation, and admissions of the marriage, and of the children as his by the father. This marriage was held to be "conclusivly established so far as it can be done by proof of cohabitation and recognition, and the doctrin is well settled that such testimony is competent to prove a marriage in a civil suit, or in a controversy of this kind." Hence it was held that the second marriage, which took place in Tennessee, was void. But the court held that the second wife had believed herself to be a lawful wife, and after the death of the Maryland wife, Donnelly and herself lived together and cohabited as man and wife, recognized that relation as subsisting between them, with the general reputation and understanding that they were such, for near twenty years. That their children at the death of their father had been held legitimate by the county court, and their mother, entitled as his lawful wife, to dower. "These facts authorize, we think, the presumption of a marriage after the death of the first wife, and justify the conclusion that the defendant was the lawful wife of Donnelly at his death." This decision was rendered in 1847–8, and was the law in 1850.

How any well-read Kentucky lawyer could hav held the marriage of Blaine in 1850, made before witnesses, but without license or priest, void, seems incredible. It would hav been sustained in the courts as a valid marriage. It was not a statutory marriage, but it was legal.

W. S. Bush.

A Challenge to Mr. Charles Watts.

To Charles Watts, Esq., Dear Sir: I hav just read your reply to my lecture in last week's Truth Seeker. Allow me to say that I reciprocate all the good feelings and kindly memories of the past therein expressed. Nor do I feel that we are altogether parted as public laborers for the public good in the unfenced fields of liberty and truth. But, in all good feeling, I cannot admit on your bare assertion that I hav been guilty of the three errors you charge against me, namely, glaring inaccuracy, reckless imputation, and an utter lack of reasoning. Will you kindly say in what I hav been inaccurate, point out the reckless imputation, and show me anything I hav said for which I cannot giv a score of good reasons, and also mention any individual deserving the greatest respect and highest confidence whom I hav attacked in an unjustifiable manner? I accused no man. I spoke of certain tendencies and facts that had come under my own observation that I stand ready to prove as absolutely true before any jury of unprejudiced judges. It would not be well for you and the cause you so ably represent and champion, to call for all the proofs. My aim was not to say as much, but as little, as I could to illustrate and establish the principles I was aiming to teach in the form of an allegory. It is not my fault if realistic minds transpose poetry into matter of fact, and convert a figure of speech into a live, grunting hog. Surely you know, also, that the heart has a reason of its own, and that the highest and grandest truths can only be expressed in parable, painted in pictures colored with all the blending hues of comparison, metaphor, and carved in rhyme and rhythm.

Shakspere's historical dramas are fiction, but what truth of logic or science is truer? There are the truths of conscience, of love and hate, of hope and despair, backed with the great lessons of history, and moral law in all its wondrous potency and grandeur. The stage, like the platform, is to-day prostituted to base uses. But the stage, in the service of true art, would be as much beyond the platform, as an inspiring and elevating influence, as the platform is above the dreary, futil partisan controversy one hears today on politics in every hotel lobby or railroad waiting-room.

You do me injustice in representing me as sending forth a dreary wail of blighted ambition and failure. In the sense in which you mean it, you know full well that I hav not failed, any more than you hav. As a Liberal lecturer, no man save Col. Ingersoll has drawn larger audiences or received more money for his work in the same time than I hav. My financial failure is entirely due to my publishing enterprise. That would hav been successful if my subscribers had paid their honest debts, so that I in turn might hav paid mine. You and others seem determined to misunderstand my hostility to controversy. Of course all affirmation of truth is at war with error. What I object to is the personal and irresponsible method of controversy, when the influence of a good lecture is entirely dissipated by a free discussion over it on the part of those who really hav nothing to say and don't know how to say even that. Such controversy as Martin Luther dealt in when he shook the world by nailing his thesis to the church door in Wittenberg has always done much to help widen the skirts of light and make the struggle with darkness narrower. But I must confess that, while warmly admiring your wonderful skill and genius as a debater, I still think some of your methods questionable. Most of your arguments against me at Cassadaga were entirely based on a very clever distortion of my words, so as to make them say something I never dreamed of saying. You were also guilty of one personality of at least bad taste when you seemingly gave countenance to the idle, silly, and slanderous rumor that my conversion to Spiritualism was the work of a woman. The excitement was high. Many felt offended, and looked to you as their champion, and you, I fear, cared more for the appearance of victory than any permanent service to the truth. I may possibly hav been slightly inaccurate in some of my statements. We are none of us infallible. You in this present article class Spiritualism as a speculativ doctrin, when you know that this to us is not speculation, but absolute knowledge. If anything is known at all, many thousands—yea, millions—know Spiritualism in its essential claims to be true. You also are inaccurate in representing me as putting the heart before the head. I did this when I was in the church. My farewell sermon to the church was entitled, "Heads and Hearts," in which I put heads first. One mistake generally follows another. The pendulum pushed to the extreme end of the arc must rebound before it recovers its equilibrium. I hav found my perfect poise. I hav married and blended the two into one. I exacted no pledge of obedience from either. This is not a church, but a Liberal marriage. If you like to hear in the sweet accord of wedding bells at the marriage of wisdom and love the jarring discord of marital infelicity, it's none of my funeral. I shall continue to dance at this wedding though you do play a dirge.

In one of the Liberal papers I am falsely and in a most ungentlemanly way reported as promising to, minister-like, reply to you after you were hundreds of miles away. Did I do so? You do not think me a coward. Was I ever known to lack the courage of my convictions?

I am quite willing to acknowledge that I am not a ready debater. I cannot reply on the spur of the moment and do justice to myself. I need time to think over what has been said, sift the true from the false in the calm and quiet of my study, before presenting my reply.

Under conditions providing for this characteristic of mine, and penalty of forfeit of all right of recompense by the one indulging in any personality, I hereby vindicate my honor and the truth I hold most dear by challenging you to a four days' debate in Boston, to be conducted in the following order:

First night.—Charles Watts: Secularism; its aims and objects, and superiority to Christianity and Spiritualism as a philosophy to satisfy all the needs of life.

Second night.—George Chainey: Spiritualism; its phenomena—their rationality; its religion and superiority to both Secularism and Christianity.

Third night.—Reply of Charles Watts to George Chainey.

Fourth night.—Reply of George Chainey to Charles Watts. My reply to be confined to your opening night.

The debate to take place in Boston at such place and under such terms of admission as we may hereafter determin.

I hereby commit myself to your tender mercy, and faithfully promis you that, though I am helped with an entire legion of angels, we will show you only kindness and gentle courtesy.

Yours for the truth in love, always and afterwards,

GEORGE CHAINEY.

Cleveland, Ohio, Oct. 6, 1884.

Deed and not Creed.

Even De Witt Talmage has been called back from the contemplation of a hell hereafter, to the hell of ruin of fortune and of character around him. In a recent sermon on the revelations of Wall street, he says:

"Oh," some one will say, "better preach the gospel and let business matters alone." I reply, if your gospel do not inspire common honesty in the dealings of men the sooner you close up your gospel and pitch it into the depths of the Atlantic Ocean the better. An orthodox swindler is worse than a heterodox swindler. The recitation of all the catechisms and creeds ever written, and drink from all the communion chalices that ever glittered in the churches of Christendom, will never save your soul unless your business character corresponds with your religious profession. Some of the worst scoundrels in America hav been members of churches, and they got fat on sermons about heaven when they most needed to hav the pulpits preach that which would either bring them to repentance, or thunder them out of the holy communions, where their presence was a sacrilege and an infamy.

Religion is not, as many suppose, a matter of church delectation, a sort of confectionary, a spiritual caramel, or holy gum-drop, or sanctified peppermint, or theological anesthetic, but an omnipotent principle, all-prevailing, all-controling, all-conquering. With something short of that you may deceive yourself, but you can't deceive God, and you can't deceive the world. The keen man of the world puts on his spectacles, and looks clean through the back of your head and knows whether your religion is a fiction or a fact.

Listen, friends, to the news: California wheels into line and keeps step to the music of the Union. Who will giv the next $50 from that golden state? Duluth, however, is not behind, and sends her generous gift. Our good and famous Judge Krekel givs a most encouraging word, and everywhere noble friends are rallying to our cause. The one-dollar bills are welcome, I assure you; for they come laden with the bright wishes of many an honest heart. Almost $1,500 raised! Let it be $2,000 by the first of November. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM,

Secretary of the National Liberal League,
55 East 9th street, New York City.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Oct. 7, 1884.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, ESQ., Dear Sir: Yours, with inclosed circular, came to hand. The program meets with my approval, and I hav the utmost confidence in yourself and Mr. Watts carrying it out. Mrs. Krekel is the activ worker, myself being in a measure restrained. The time will soon come, however, when I shall be free. In Kansas City we will try and organize a League, and as soon as accomplished, will invite you and Mr. Watts to visit us. Should you come West before such invitation, please advise me, as we may be able to avail ourselvs of our opportunity.

Am much pleased with the spirit of your address. A move forward is needed. Let the old gods take care of themselvs, and our energies be employed in doing men's work.

Truly yours, A. KREKEL.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, ESQ., Dear Sir: Inclosed find money-order for $50—twenty-five for life membership in National Liberal League, and twenty-five for Campaign Fund.

The League now stands in a position where all true Secularists can support it, and I believe it to be the duty of every true Secularist to come forward and assist in rearing the grand Temple of Universal Mental Liberty.

Col. Ingersoll is doing a good work in removing the orthodox rubbish from the fallen temple of Christianity. He delivered his lecture on "Orthodoxy" here last week to a good audience. I hope our friends will come forward with the sinews of war, and not only giv you $5,000 but five times that amount. Yours truly, W. H. PEPPER.

A. M. MILLER, Duluth, Minn.: Your communication in Investigator and Ironclad Age noted. Inclosed please find check for $50.

J. P. HOFMAN, Pottsville, Pa.: I feel like helping the cause and I inclose you $1 in assistance of the work, trusting that thousands of other Liberal friends will contribute a like or greater sum in its support.

MRS. S. J. LENONT, Northfield, Minn.: I want to do all I can to spread the truths of Liberalism, and am ready and willing to put my shoulder to the wheel. I will say $10, and more if I can, hoping that all will do their best.

JAMES VINCENT, Sr., Editor of the Nonconformist: I hope to begin thorough work in furtherance of the doctrins settled upon to be speedily advocated by the Congress at Cassadaga. I shall do my best to co-operate with you.

OTTO WETTSTEIN, Rochelle, Ill.: I was glad to hear from you. No one in the world is more anxious to help the cause than I. I will surely remit you an X if I possibly can. I am longing for the time to come when I can retire from an activ business career and giv my whole time and income to Liberal work.

W. S. BAILEY, Editor of the Liberal, Nashville, Tenn.: The aggressiv policy I like. I will do all I can in this cause while I liv. If you and Mr. Watts will come here and lecture I will raise money for you. We need a "preacher" outside of what is written. Nashville is overrun with preachers of the other sort, and they should be shamed into a more honorable calling.

JOHN P. GUILD, Milwaukee, Wis.: By the inadvertency of the printer or of myself, the name of Brother George M. Hare, vice-president of Veteran Liberal League, Soldiers' Home, Milwaukee, was omitted from the last published quarterly report. I mention it for the reason that he is now a "brother in bonds," and should hav all the honors that a worthy martyr to liberty has earned. He has been the chief spoke in the wheel of progress in the Home.

EDGAR C. BEALL, Cincinnati, O.: I hav been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER with great interest, and hav been particularly pleased with some features of the present outlook. We need unity of action, and must leave out the side issues. I feel hopeful of good results. We hav many Liberals here in Cincinnati, but no organization. I wish you would arrange to lecture here the coming winter and giv us a start. Every city ought to hav a regular society with a lecturer who would giv a humanitarian sermon every week. I shall be happy to do anything in my power to advance our cause.

THE NEWARK LEAGUE.

The Liberal League of Newark, New Jersey, hav regular Sunday services in the afternoon and evening at their place of meeting, No. 177 Halsey street. Their hall, though not very large, is light, sunny, and well furnished, having some pictures on the walls and containing a handsome upright organ.

This League has been somewhat persecuted by the religious bigots of Newark—persons who forget that the United States government was founded on liberty of conscience. But its officers and members are earnest men stirred to a new zeal by opposition. They hav now settled permanently in their bright little home in Halsey street; hav no debts, and a surplus in the treasury.

The League is interested in progression and practical measures for the welfare of mankind; such as good government, co-operation, scientific instruction, etc.; in a word, things the church would do well to take up and mingle with its more spiritual exercises.

Mme. Henri Delescluze spoke with great approval before the League on Sunday, Oct. 5th. The substance of her discourse was that the great wealth and material splendor of nations tended to their destruction and extinction, and that constructiv power dwelt in personal character and a high ideal.

It was unanimously resolved by the League to invite Mme. Delescluze to address its members again at her "earliest convenience."

THE LIBERALS.

From the Worthington Advance.

We acknowledge the receipt of a circular from Samuel P. Putnam, secretary of the National Liberal League, which givs the resolutions adopted at the eighth annual Congress of the League, recently held at Cassadaga Lake, N. Y. Also the demands of Liberalism and the address of the secretary to the Liberals of the country.

The Liberal movement seems finally to hav settled down to the one main issue of the secularization of the state. On this issue all Liberals can agree and work together,

We earnestly believe that the greatest danger now threatening the republic is the one which the Liberal League is designed to offset. It may not enter into the present political campaign as any issue, but the church-and-state party is working persistently; and every Liberal, whether a believer in church theology or not, should say a word and strike a blow for the complete secularization of the government. This is the only safe and just policy. The government should giv freedom to all religions and indorse none.

GOING TO WORK AS NEVER BEFORE.

From the New Thought.

Samuel P. Putnam, the present secretary of the National Liberal League, sends out a document containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism, an address to the Liberals of America, and the resolutions passed at the eighth annual Congress of the National Liberal League. From the tone of the address and from other sources, it is evident that the Liberals are going to work now as never before. This address says: "We shall allow the enemy no resting spell. From the Atlantic to the Pacific the fires of Liberalism shall be kindled, societies organized, not simply upon a negativ, but upon a constructiv basis." Among the things they hope to be instrumental in bringing about, is that "every worker shall hav a home, and every child born upon this planet a place to liv and a right to nature's bounty." Mr. Putnam and Mr. Charles Watts are to go everywhere, when opportunity affords, and lecture and organize Leagues. We would advise our readers to send to S. P. Putnam, 55 East 9th street, New York, and get this document.

A GOOD SUGGESTION.

From the Liberal, Mo., Liberal.

THE TRUTH SEEKER and others think the League in a shape to do some good work in the future. We hope so, but hav not much faith so long as constructiv work is not followed as the chief duty. There must be something to interest the women and children if a permanent organization is maintained.

THE TRUTH SEEKER suggests that the League combat the National Reform movement. We think this will be the source from which will come the greatest danger of the Liberal cause, and that if the claims of that party can be properly brought before the people in the present predominance of Christian sentiment, it will succeed in fixing them on the statutes, when business will commence in earnest. Then whoever violates a Christian usage or custom is as much subject to prosecution as he now is if he commits murder. And if any think such laws would not be enforced, let them remember the fate of the Mormon missionaries in Lewis county, Tenn. That slaughter shows the Christian spirit of to-day when it has the power. Let no true Liberal close his eyes on these facts, for the chains are being forged, and his vigilance only will keep them from his limbs and of his children.

CASSADAGA CONGRESS.

From the American Nonconformist.

The Congress held by the Liberals of the United States at Cassadaga last month, is regarded by those who hav been conversant with these meeting as one of the most important, and the most successful in the direction of real progress, that has ever been held. One thing has been resolved upon that has long been needed, namely, systematic missionary work, and two of the most gifted men of that order in the country hav been selected to make it their sole business to canvass the United States, and inform the people what Liberalism and Freethought doctrins mean. This has been left to the volunteer services of orthodox preachers, who hav ignorantly undertaken to expound what they know nothing at all about. Hereafter Liberalists will be heard in their own behalf, and the people will be astonished when they come to hear the two lecturers whose business it is to explain the doctrins of Liberalism, to find how maliciously this most intellectual, and patriotic, and truly humane class of thinkers and actors hav been misrepresented. Samuel P. Putnam and Mr. Watts are the appointees of the Congress to enter the lecture field, and we greatly mistake if these gentlemen will be able to fill half or a fourth of the engagements that will be required of them. Times are not as they used to be; never were men's minds more stirred up to a determination to ferret out the truth in all directions as they are now, nor is it possible any longer for ecclesiasticism to say to the human mind, as hitherto, "to our rut may it come, but no further."

These eminent speakers, one of whom, if we mistake not, Mr. Putnam, was formerly a Christian minister, may be addressed at No. 55 E. 9th street, New York city, N. Y. The Congress resolved to raise $5,000 to carry on this work, twelve hundred and fifty-one dollars being contributed on the spot.

It is to be hoped that the liberality that there and then was manifested will be supplemented by the Liberal element all over the country, so that the treasurer shall hav to report not $5,000 received, but twice that amount. S. P. Putnam is secretary of the League, and Courtlandt Palmer, treasurer.

The Nonconformist adds:

"One of the outcomes of the Congress which we personally deplore is that Man, the organ of the League hereto, is discontinued or merged in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Those having a clearer insight into what is most needed, should know better than we do, but to us it appears like that most valuable paper should hav been continued, and built up on a solid foundation to do its own work. The former editors, Messrs. Leland and Wakeman, are men of rare ability as thinkers and as writers, and as speakers. Very, very much of the progress made by the Freethought principles is due to their untiring and magnificent efforts. But they cannot be silent, and their former readers will be glad to know that they will be heard from often through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. This is a most noble journal, doing a noble work, and we bespeak for it a much wider field of usefulness since the Cassadaga Congress than ever before. Price is $3 a year, edited by E. M. Macdonald. Orders should be sent C. P. Somerby, business manager, 33 Clinton Place, New York City, N. Y."

Man would hav been continued had there been a demand for it by the people sufficient to hav enabled its publishers to pay expenses. The fault for its discontinuance must not be laid to its editors nor to the League.

into thine hand. . . . And so it was, that all that fell that day, both of men and women, were twelve thousand. . . . And Joshua burnt Ai, and made it a heap forever" (Josh. viii, 18, 25, 28).

"And Joshua passed from Libnah, and all Israel with him, unto Lachish, and encamped against it, and fought against it. And the Lord delivered Lachish into the hand of Israel, which took it on the second day, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein" (Josh. x, 31, 32).

"And from Lachish Joshua passed unto Eglon, and all Israel with him; and they encamped against it, and fought against it. And they took it on that day, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein he utterly destroyed that day" (Josh. x, 34, 35).

Thus city after city falls, and nation after nation is vanquished, until thirty-one kingdoms have been destroyed. And still there "remaineth much land to be possessed," and many millions more of unoffending people to be slain to please this God of War.

Christ came heralded as the "prince of peace." But he "came not to send peace, but a sword"—a sword his own arm was too weak to wield, but which his followers have used with dire effect. Expunge from the history of Christendom the record of its thousand wars and little will remain. From the time that Constantine inscribed the emblem of the cross upon his banner to the present hour, the church of Christ has been upheld by the sword. Five million troops maintain its political supremacy in Europe to-day. To "express our national acknowledgment of Almighty God as the source of all authority in civil government; of the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler of nations, and of his revealed will as of supreme authority;" in short, to make this a "Christian nation," as Bible moralists demand, means a standing army in this country of five hundred thousand men.

The Bible has inspired more wars than all else combined. It is a fountain of blood, and the crimson rivers that have flowed from it would float the navies of the world.

DESPOTISM.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it enjoins submission to tyrants.

"Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man, . . . whether it be to kings as supreme; or unto governors" (1 Pet. ii, 13).

"Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation" (Rom. xiii, 1, 2).

And these sentiments were uttered when a Nero sat upon the throne—when Palestine was being crushed beneath the iron heel of despotism—when brave and patriotic men were struggling for freedom.

The Bible has ever been the bulwark of tyranny. When the oppressed millions of France were endeavoring to throw off their yoke—when the Washingtons, the Franklins, the Paines, and the Jeffersons were contending for American liberty—craven priests stood up in the pulpit, opened this book, and gravely read: "The powers that be are ordained of God; they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation."

INTOLERANCE AND PERSECUTION.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because its teachings have filled the world with intolerance and persecution.

"If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods. . . Namely, of the gods of the people which are round about you. . . Thou shalt not consent unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him; neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him; but thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hand of all the people" (Deut. xiii, 6–9).

If you believe the Bible to be infallible, you must believe it to be your duty to put to death the unbelieving brother that attempts to alienate you from your faith. If you are a Catholic, and your children become Protestants and endeavor to convince you that Protestantism is the true religion, you should kill them. If you are a Protestant, and your wife embraces the Catholic faith and desires you to accept it, let her die.

"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi, 16).

"Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire" (Matt. xxv, 41).

"These shall go away into everlasting punishment" (Matt. xxv, 46).

"Cast into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched" (Mark ix, 45).

These passages ought to consign to everlasting abhorrence the being who uttered them, the book containing them, and the church indorsing them. This dogma of endless punishment is the dogma of fiends. I had rather trace my descent to the tiger or hyena than to the creation of a God who dooms his creatures to eternal pain; and the time will come when the remembrance of the theologians who have taught this hideous lie will provoke more shame and pity than the ancestral apes do now.

"If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house" (2 John i, 10).

Amid the storms of a winter night, a traveler, perishing with cold and hunger, knocks at your door and begs for food and shelter. You interrogate him as to his religious belief, and finding that he is not a member of your church, you forbid him to enter. In the morning when you discover his lifeless body by the roadside, how impressed you will be with the transcendent beauty of Bible morals!

Paul preached a sermon upon charity, and then wrote to the Gallatians as follows:

"If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed (Gal. i, 9).

From the same pen came this sneaking, infamous hint:

"I would they were even cut off which trouble you" (Gal. v, 12).

What ghastly fruits these teachings have produced! We see earth covered with the yellow bones of murdered heretics and scholars; we see the persecutions and butcheries of Constantine, of Theodosius, of Clovis, of Justinian, and of Charlemagne; we see the Crusades, in which nearly twenty millions perish; we see the followers of Godfrey in Jerusalem—see the indiscriminate massacre of men, women, and children—see the mosques piled seven deep with murdered Saracens—the Jews burnt in their synagogues; we see Cœur de Lion slaughter in cold blood thousands of captive Infidels; we see the Franks in Constantinople, plundering, ravishing, murdering; we see the Moors expelled from Spain; we see the murder of the Huguenots and Waldenses—the slaughter of German peasants—the desolation of Ireland—Holland covered with blood; we witness Smithfield and Bartholomew; we see the Inquisition with its countless instruments of fiendish cruelty; we see the Auto-da-fé, where heretics clad in mockery are led to torture and to death; we see men stretched upon the rack, disjointed, and torn limb from limb; we see them flayed alive—their bleeding bodies seared with red-hot irons; we see them covered with pitch and oil and set on fire; we see them hurled headlong from towers to the stony streets below; we see them buried alive; we see them hanged and quartered; we see their eyes bored out with heated augers—their tongues torn out—their bones broken with hammers—their bodies pierced with a thousand needles; we see aged women tied to the heels of fiery steeds—see their mangled and bleeding bodies dragged with lightning speed over the frozen earth; we see newborn babes flung into the flames to perish with their mothers, or with their mothers sewed in sacks and sunk into the sea; in short, on every hand, we see hate, torture, death!

But, thanks to the brave Infidels that have gone before, you, Bible moralists, can use these instruments of cruelty to silence heretics to Christianity no more.

"Where are the hands which once for this foul creed,
'Mid flame and torture made an Atheist bleed?
Gone—like the powers your fathers used so well
To send souls heavenward through the flames of hell.
And you, poor palsied creatures! you ere long,
With them thrice cursed shall swell Gehenna's throng.
Your God is dead; your heaven a hope bewrayed;
Your hell a by-word, and your creed a trade,
Your vengeance—what? A mere polluting touch—
A cripple striking with a broken crutch!"

—Lara.

INJUSTICE TO WOMEN.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it has degraded woman.

The holy offices of wife and mother it covers with reproach. Its teachings carried out, as they were during centuries of Christian rule, leave women but two paths in which to tread—the one leading into slavery, the other into exile. Servitude in the house of a husband, or self-banishment to a convent: these are the sad alternatives presented for her choice.

"Thy desire shall be to thy husband and he shall rule over thee" (Gen. iii, 16).

"Wives, submit yourselves to your own husbands" (Col. iii, 18).

"As the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything" (Eph. v, 24).

"Let your women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home; for it is a shame for a woman to speak in the church" (1 Cor. xiv, 34, 35.)

"Ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands. . . For after this manner in the old time the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection to their own husbands; even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord" (1 Peter iii, 1–6).

"Let woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. For Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression" (1 Tim. ii, 11–14).

Oh! the unspeakable outrage that woman has suffered because of that old Jewish fable!

The teachings of the Bible respecting marriage are an insult to every married woman. Christ discouraged marriage (Matt. xix, 10–12); while a more despicable dissertation on marrige than Paul gives in the seventh chapter of 1 Corinthians was never penned.

In contracting matrimonial alliances, woman's rights and choice are not consulted. The father does his daughter's courting, and sells or gives her to whom he pleases. A father is even allowed to sell his daughter for a slave (Ex. xxi, 7). In the Decalogue, the wife is classed with slaves and cattle as a mere chattel.

Kidnapping is commanded for the purpose of obtaining wives.

"Therefore they [God's priests] commanded the children of Benjamin, saying, Go and lie in wait in the vineyards; and see, and, behold, if the daughters of Shiloh come out to dance in dances, then come ye out of the vineyards, and catch you every man his wife of the daughters of Shiloh, and go to the land of Benjamin. . . And the children of Benjamin did so, and took them wives according to their number of them that danced whom they caught" (Jud. xxi, 20–23).

The Levitical law makes motherhood a sin that can be expiated only by offering a sin offering at the birth of every child. The degree of sinfulness depends upon the sex of the child; giving birth to a daughter being esteemed a greater sin than giving birth to a son" (Lev. xii).

The laws of the Bible in regard to divorce are most unjust. A husband is permitted to divorce his wife if she displease him, while a wife is not allowed to obtain a divorce for any cause whatever.

"When a man hath taken a wife, and marries her, and it come to pass that she find no favor in his eyes, . . . then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house" (Deut. xxiv, 1).

"When thou goest forth to war against thine enemies, and the Lord thy God hath delivered them into thine hands, and thou hast taken them captive, and seest among the captives a beautiful woman, and hast a desire unto her that thou wouldst have her to thy wife; then thou shalt bring her home to thine house. . . . And it shall be, if thou have no delight in her, then thou shalt let her go whither she will" (Deut. xxi, 10–14).

Wives are compelled to suffer outrage for the sins of their husbands.

"Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and I will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbor, and he shall lie with thy wives in the sight of this sun" (2 Sam. xii, 11).

"Their houses shall be spoiled and their wives ravished" (Is. xiii, 16).

"I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle; and the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished" (Zech. xiv, 2).

"Let their wives be bereaved of their children and be widows" (Jer. xviii, 21).

The teachings of the Bible have been used by the church to keep woman in a subordinate position. "There is not a more cruel chapter in history," says the Rev. Moncure D. Conway, "than that which records the arrest by Christianity of the natural growth of European civilization regarding woman. In Germany it found woman participating in the legislative assembly, and sharing the interests and counsels of man, and drove her out and away. . . . Even more fatal was the overthrow of woman's position in Rome. Read the terrible facts as stated by Gibbon, by Milman, and Sir Henry Maine, read and ponder them, and you will see the tremendous wrong that Christianity did to woman."

In this country, while the most illiterate and depraved man is clothed with the rights of a sovereign, the noblest women is a slave; and from the Bible, priests and politicians have procured the chains that hold her in subjection.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

Theosophy.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: You hav a curious article about Theosophy. It is a good advertisment for a number of queer books, but as they lie beyond the reach of many of us, perhaps you and Mr. Brown might consent to giv us a few extracts from the most interesting.

Without reference to anything in your issue of Aug. 30th, I copy for the benefit of some of your contributors a paragraph from "Josephine," of Liberty:

"Thinking men, imbued with the idea that society, composed of good and bad men, could not exist except as a mass of warring people, without majority rule, set down as impossible [the art of social harmony with individual liberty.] These men kept on fighting religious superstition after it was dead. They delighted in creating imaginary dragons and other terrible monsters, and then sallying forth lance in hand and riding at them full tilt. Their most pleasant pastime was in stuffing the skin of a dead belief with straw and then kicking the straw out of the skin all over the country. They became so engrossed in this seed-bag fox hunting, that the real live fox [the political fox, the banking fox, the land-grabbing fox, the Uncle Sam Fox] was stealing and eating their poultry under their very noses. To them, the Anarchists were good, able, well-meaning men, but very deluded—very cranky; they had pity for them—pity that so much brain should go to waste, when it might be devoted to devising new means whereby old-time and long-since-dead monsters, might be revivified and then slain." EDGEWORTH.

Ingersoll on Parties and Other Matters.

The San Francisco Post sent its reporter to interview Col. Ingersoll as soon as he arrived in San Francisco. Among other points discussed are the following:

Q. Are you going to take any part in the campaign?

A. It is not my intention to make any political speeches. I hav made a good many in the past, and, in my judgment, hav done my part. I hav no other interest in politics than every citizen should hav. I want that party to triumph which, in my judgment, represents the best interests of the country. I hav no doubt about the issue of the election. I believe that Mr. Blaine will be the next president. But there are plenty of talkers, and I really think that I hav earned a vacation.

Q. What do you think Cleveland's chances are in New York?

A. At this distance it is hard to say. The recent action of Tammany complicates matters somewhat. But my opinion is that Blaine will carry the state. I had a letter yesterday from that state giving the opinion of a gentleman well informed, that Blaine would carry New York state by not less than 50,000 majority.

Q. What figure will Butler cut in the campaign?

A. I hardly think that Butler will hav many followers on the 4th of November. His forces will gradually go to one side or the other. It is only when some really great principle is at stake that thousands of men are willing to vote with a known minority.

Q. But what about the Prohibitionists?

A. They hav a very large following. They are fighting for something they believe to be of almost infinit consequence, and I can readily understand how a Prohibitionist is willing to be in the minority. It may be well enough for me to say here that my course politically is not determined by my likes or dislikes of individuals. I want to be governed by principles, not persons. If I really thought that in this campaign a real principle was at stake, I should take part. The only great question now is protection, and I am satisfied that it is in no possible danger.

Q. Not even in case of a Democratic victory?

A. Not even in the event of a Democratic victory. No state in the Union is for free trade. Every free trader has an exception. Louisiana says, "Free trade, except sugar." Missouri says, "Protect lead." Kentucky follows with hemp; Michigan with lumber and salt, and Ohio with wool. And so I might make a tour of the states. These exceptions combined control the tariff legislation of this country, and if the Democrats were in power to-day with the control of the House and Senate and executiv, the exceptions would combine and protect protection. As long as the federal government collects taxes or revenue on imports, just so long these revenues will be arranged to protect home manufacturers.

Q. You said that if there was a great principle at stake you would take part in the campaign. You think, then, that there is no great principle involved?

A. If it were a matter of personal liberty, I should take part. If the Republican party had stood by the Civil Rights bill I should hav taken part in the present campaign.

Q. Still, I suppose we can count on you as a Republican?

A. Certainly; I am a Republican.

INGERSOLL IN CALIFORNIA.

The San Franciscan of Sept. 13th called upon the clergy to reply to Ingersoll. An Oakland clergyman responded in part as follows: "First, you speak of him truly, as 'a wit, a rhetorician, a poet, and an orator.' I hav not a doubt that he is the greatest orator, and the finest rhetorician, that speaks the English language. It will be admitted by all, I think, that as a rhetorical wit he has no equal, and that in the poetry of his language, the richness of his imagery, and the beauty of his word-painting, he stands pre-eminent. Now, when you ask any man to meet him in the field of his wit, his rhetoric, and his oratory, 'foot to foot, and overthrow him,' you ask that which no man living is able to do."

He also admits that the man who would charge the same admission as Ingersoll does "to hear a refutation would speak to empty benches."

The Jewish Times says:

"Casting all religious differences to the winds, we rejoice that Col. Ingersoll spoke his honest thoughts, and we rejoice that he found an audience brave enough to applaud him to the echo. The Jew is always in favor of free speech, and he claims that every human being has a right to express himself freely, fully, and publicly on matters earthly or heavenly. If Col. Ingersoll or any other man be wrong, combat him with truths and not with clubs."

Rev. Dr. Jackson, Unitarian, preached on "Atheism," on the 21st. He said that "to believe simply because one had been taught to believe, did not show much merit, although it was very well in its way; but to believe from conviction, and to hav the courage to express an unpopular opinion, was true merit. This world had seen very few stanch Atheists, and they were far from being fools. He referred to Ingersoll, John Stuart Mill, Harriet Martineau, and others of their types, world-renowned for intelligence and learning. There were two classes of what might be called Atheists—those who believed in a God and lived as though there was none, and those who believed there was no God, but who lived as though there was one. There are Godless Theists—the church is full of them—as well as Godless Atheists. A man is not necessarily worse morally for being an Atheist. . . . Intelligence and faith are usually at variance, and between men who are half Theists and half Atheists, there is no choice."

INGERSOLL AT VICTORIA.

In an interview in the San Francisco Post, Col. Ingersoll stated the facts about his lecture at Victoria, as follows:

"The published accounts as circulated by the Associated Press were greatly exaggerated. The affair was simply this: The authorities endeavored to prevent the lecture. They refused the license, on the ground that the theater was unsafe, although it was on the ground floor, had many exists and entrances, not counting the windows. The theater was changed to meet the objections of the Fire Commissioner, and the authorities expressed their satisfaction and issued the license. Afterward further objection was raised, and on the night of the lecture, when the building was about two-thirds full, the police appeared and said that the lecture would not be allowed to be delivered, because the house was unsafe. After a good deal of talk, the policeman in authority said that there should be another door, whereupon my friends, in a few minutes, made another door with ax and saw, the crowd was admitted, and the lecture was delivered. The audience was well behaved, intelligent, and appreciativ. Beyond some talking in the hall, and the natural indignation of those who had purchased tickets and were refused admittance, there was no disturbance. I understand that those who opposed the lecture are now heartily ashamed of the course pursued."

FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

MOUNT FOREST, CANADA, Oct. 5, 1884.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A friend of mine has just handed me a letter which he received from a brother of his living in Victoria, British Columbia, and which I think is too good to be lost. It should be published so that the Freethinkers who sit with their arms folded and cry, "Peace, peace!" saying that things are going on smooth, may know that affairs are not as quiet as some suppose. WM. LEWIS.

Following is the letter referred to:

VICTORIA, B. C., Sept. 1, 1884.

DEAR BROTHER: I went to hear Ingersoll, and the racket we had is too good to keep until I hear from you again. In the first place, the religious people tried all they could to prevent Bob's procuring a hall. There are two opera halls in Victoria—a large and small one—but the large one was taken by an opera troupe. Bob also tried to hire the City Hall, but was refused, so he had to resort to the small hall, which he got readily, the owner of it being a regular Ingersoll, who need not take a back seat to Bob as a public speaker. When the small hall was about three parts full of men and women, the police came bounding to the door to prevent any further admittance. When the proprietor asked the cause of the trouble, he was told there were not proper fire escapes. What do you think—the building being one story high, and the floor about one foot from the ground, the front doorway about eight feet wide, with door opening outward, and two back doors; besides, there are eight or ten large windows, all raised! Some of the city councilmen tried to force their way past the police, but they drew their batons. The crowd cried, "Strike, if you dare!" amid cries of "Put out the cops!" Then the police whistled for re-enforcements, which arrived in a few minutes. The crowd then got enraged, and bounded through the back doors and through the windows, and past the police at the front door, until the hall was filled to excess. But the police would not allow Bob to speak unless the front doors were taken off. The owner would not allow even this most absurd demand to stop the lecture, so he went to the end of the hall next to the street, and with fifty others tore the end clear out of the hall, which made a grand fire escape, and gave about one hundred more an opportunity of hearing Bob. All this time Bob was standing outside pleading with the people not to harm the police, for I can tell you the crowd was at the riot point.

The trouble originated by the clergy getting their heads together, going to the chief of police, and putting him up to this little dodge. They had better let sleeping dogs alone. But worst of all, when the trouble was at fever heat, some of the sky-larks raised the cry of fire, thinking to create a stampede similar to that of the Brooklyn Bridge, but both ladies and gentlemen stood it like a breeze.

When Bob stepped on the stage, the cheers were deafening for about ten minutes. The lecture surpassed anything I ever heard. He is a mild and fluent speaker. He never alluded to his reception in any way, but treated them like "never mind, for they know no better." If Frazer [a Presbyterian minister] had a hand in the pie, he will hav reason to regret it.

MR. FELL PROSECUTED FOR BLASPHEMY.

VICTORIA, B. C., Sept. 27, 1884.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Our townsman, Mr. Fell, informs me that he has reecived a communication from you requesting an account of the attempt to stop Ingersoll's lecture here a few weeks ago. Mr. Fell has requested me to perform this act for him. Briefly, it was as follows:

The announcement that Ingersoll intended to lecture in Victoria filled the church people with dismay. A lot of criminals could not evince greater dread of exposure. The only way they could see open to them to prevent the catastrophe was to close all the halls and theaters against him, and in this they would hav succeeded, excepting a very small one owned by a Liberal.

The old theater was procured, solely because the Liberals owned the seats, and threatened otherwise to remove them. The fire-warden had meantime raised objections on account of deficient means of exit, and carpenters were employed to obviate this difficulty, and no further trouble was anticipated. But at the hour appointed, and when about half the audience had assembled, a squad of police came up, and planting themselvs in the door, stopped further ingress. This produced intense excitement and some attempts to pass in in spite of the police. After some time, however, the excuse for the getting out an injunction becoming known, it was resolved to remove it. It seems the fire-warden had reported that the building was still defectiv as to means of exit, and it was on this ground that a church parasite procured the mandamus to stop the meeting. It was soon recollected that the clapboards had been put over an old doorway opening into the street. The crowd made short work of tearing these down, and no further cause for the presence of the police being apparent, they went away, and the lecture was proceeded with.

But Mr. Ingersoll went aboard the Sound boat immediately after the lecture, no doubt to escape an action for blasphemy. This fate (a prosecution for blasphemy) has befallen Mr. Fell, in response to an action commenced by him against a local paper for slander.

But these events hav proven fortunate. The Liberals are forming a Liberal League. Its constitution and by-laws are upon four pages of foolscap under this letter, the ink scarcely dry. It is proposed to read one or two of Ingersoll's lectures as a commencement.

One article of our constitution, in ennumerating the objects of the society, reads thus:

"To remove or make odious the last remnant of the inquisition known as boycotting."

It is this influence exercised by the church which prevents union among all the Liberals and universal liberty.

E. STEVENSON, M.D.

INGERSOLL'S APATHY EXPLAINED.

Col. Ingersoll was interviewed on the 13th of September by the reporter of the San Francisco Examiner, who handed him an abstract of the New York Sun's dispatch of Sept. 12th. The abstract stated that Ingersoll sought recognition of Hayes and Garfield, and failed, when Ingersoll withdrew from politics, and swore he would never take any part for any person or party; and quotes the conclusion of the dispatch which reports a friend of Blaine as saying:

"Under what obligation is Blaine to do anything for Ingersoll? The account is more than even between them. The name of Blaine gave Ingersoll the opportunity to lift himself from obscurity into national notice. That notice has given him the great success of the day as a lecturer. If Ingersoll had not continued the war upon the church after the nation had discovered him at Cincinnati, he might hav became a prominent favorit in politics, but he preferred to follow up the part that had given him local fame in Illinois. If he is sincere, he should be satisfied. Blaine fully appreciates Bob Ingersoll, but he is too good a churchman to ever publicly recognize the greatest Agnostic of the day."

Col. Ingersoll handed the reporter the following reply:

"I saw the item in the Bulletin. There is no truth in it. I never asked any recognition of President Hayes. Never asked him for the Berlin mission. Never spoke to any one on the subject. Never spoke to one of his cabinet except Secretary Evarts. I called on Mr. Evarts, and told him that I would not accept any appointment from the administration. I never asked any appointment of General Garfied. Never authorized any one to ask anything for me. Never authorized any one to ask anything for me from Mr. Hayes. I never asked anything from Mr. Arthur, nor authorized any one else to do so. I never sought recognition from Hayes, Garfield, or Arthur, and never asked a political favor for myself from Mr. Blaine.

"Of course I do not know what Evarts said to Hayes, or what Hayes said to Evarts, and do not care. All that I know is that I never asked any recognition from Hayes, Garfield Arthur, or Blaine, and there never was any place within their gift that I would hav accepted. I did not withdraw from politics on account of what Garfield and Blaine did or failed to do. I am under no political obligation to Mr. Blaine, and was under none to General Garfield or Hayes. My action has not been affected by anything that General Garfield did or failed to do, or that Mr. Blaine has done or failed to do. I hav not felt called upon to take any activ part in this campaign. Of course I want the Republican party to succeed, and believe that it will. As to the last part of the Bulletin article, in which it is said that Mr. Blaine is too good a churchman to publicly recognize me, I am not advised and cannot say. I am not in need of public recognition at present."

Take Him into the Fold.

The following letter from our esteemed Theistic friend was read at the late state Convention:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Sept. 4, 1884.

To the New York Freethinkers' Association, in Convention:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: But for my annual hay-fever infirmity, now upon me, I should be with you to protest against being advertised as "orthodox," and to try to shed some light upon subjects of greater importance. So far from having any sympathy with orthodox theology (which I hav no difficulty in tracing to pagan mythology, and it to a more ancient typology), I hav already found it necessary to protest against an orthodox Liberalism! I object to the assumed right of any man to prescribe what I am to believe or to formulate the conclusions to which I must subscribe, before I can be recognized as a Freethinker "in good and regular standing!" I concede the right of any one to be an Atheist, and some of the best men I hav ever known hav called themselvs by that name, though Auguste Comte and Charles Darwin were not Atheists. I would not place any disability, political, civil, or social, upon any one on account of his belief or disbelief. I go, literally, for free thought and free speech, and hate proscription among Liberals jus as cordially as I do among orthodox religionists. I hold that a Theist may be as good a Freethinker as a Materialist, and that Spiritualists are not necessarily idiots and lunatics. Indeed I never could understand why a man should be so proud, and imagin himself almost a god, when he thinks he has succeeded in proving himself a brute! There is a natural religion as really as there is a natural philosophy and a natural science. I detest the *un*natural, and hav little or no faith in the *super*natural. The word supersensuous better describes what is not commonly cognized in nature. I am in fellowship with all honest Freethinkers, whether I agree with them in everything or not. There can be no true morality without absolute freedom. The truth is generally found between rude extremes, and but few final conclusions hav, as yet, been reached upon any subject. The work of evolution is not completed. Let us labor and wait. Let us not be illiberal in our advocacy of Liberalism, nor intolerant in contending for toleration. Let us be valiant, but charitable. R. B. WESTBROOK.

☞ The weekly crowding of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S columns with interesting reading matter, precludes the advertising of many books to which we would like to call the attention of friends, and of which, we hav no doubt, they would like to know. To make amends for this we hav issued a Catalog of our publications and books that we hav for sale, and this Catalog will be sent free to all applicants.

"WHY do you not return East and work for Blaine?" Judge Ryan, of the Treasury Department at San Francisco, asked Col. Ingersoll the other day. And this was the answer of the man who eight years ago dubbed Blaine the plumed knight. Hear him: "While I havn't eulogized the gods as much as some, I hav never and never will defend the devil."—Ex.

Woman Suffrage.

A curious change of sentiment, if true, is depicted by Elizabeth Cady Stanton in a recent Index. She asserts that the Liberals in religion are afraid of the woman's rights people. The movement for extending suffrage has arrived, she says, "at the point where it was supposed that success would be assured. . . . Our leading journals generally treat the question with respect. Popular reviews and magazines entertain it quite hospitably in their pages. Scientists write voluminously on the difference of sex. Judges and lawyers hav come to discuss our political demand as one of constitutional law, and the clefgy are giving us new interpretations of scripture in harmony with the spirit of the age."

But "now . . . our Liberals come to a dead stand. They say they are in favor of woman suffrage per se, but they are afraid of the practical working of the principle. They say women are naturally so conservativ, so entirely under the control of their priests and bishops, that, if the right of suffrage were conceded, they would use their political power to destroy the secular nature of our government. The objection to woman's enfranchisment is made alike in America, England, and France."

Mrs. Stanton has "spoken out in meeting," and we hope the truths she has told will make the Free Religionists—whom she particularly mentions—reconsider their attitude. We hav also heard the same objections urged by stanch Freethinkers, and there would appear to be good reason for their timidity about extending the franchise were expediency the only object, and were it right to deny a natural privilege that temporary evil might be averted.

In the election at Seattle, Washington Territory, the ministers undertook to run the town in the interests of what they call morality. The women of that territory were enfranchised last winter, and constituted a powerful element in politics. The notion that they would vote as their husbands directed received its quietus in that place on this occasion. Of some 680 registered female voters, about 600 followed the lead of the ministers. Their ticket was beaten, nevertheless. It is reported that numerous family jars grew out of the occurrence, and altogether the result was not a good argument with which to combat the expediency people.

But the objection to female suffrage so often advanced by the old fogies of the church, that going to the polls would tend to demoralize the women and make them less ladies, was also exploded. The correspondent of the Chicago Tribune says that all the female suffragists had claimed for the influence of women at the polls, so far as producing order is concerned, was borne out by the election in Washington Territory. The balloting proceeded everywhere in the most respectable and dignified fashion. The ladies were treated as considerately as though they had been at church. For their part, they handed in their tickets quietly and went home. In some towns they voted very generally; in others only a small fraction of them appeared at the polls.

Perhaps the most serious difficulty encountered in this Washington Territory experiment is connected with the courts. We are told that the serving upon juries is regarded by the women with dislike approaching rebellion toward the phase of the citizen's duty. In most counties the sheriffs put the names of women into the jury-box; in some, where they neglected to do so, the judges had the error rectified. The women had voted; now they must take their chances with the men, and not shirk the burdens of citizenship. The conspicuous women advocates of the new suffrage law urged heroism upon the victims of the panel, but most of them pleaded to be excused from serving. Two of the territorial judges were quite lenient, and accepted any kind of an excuse; but the third, Judge Green, insisted on the women serving unless they had the strongest reasons for staying at home. In one county, where by accident no names of women had been drawn, he set aside the entire panel, had the names of female citizens put into a box by themselvs, and required the sheriff to draw every alternate name from that box. The difficulties of mixed juries of the two sexes became painfully apparent when cases came to be tried of certain classes not uncommon in courts where evidence is given unfit for ladies' ears.

These drawbacks can doubtless be avoided by summoning only men in the cases last mentioned, but if the following be true the upholders of expediency hav a strong plea. It is said that in the grand jury room the women showed tendency to jump to conclusions and trust to intuition rather than evidence. They wanted to indict people on general principles. Especially was this the case where liquor selling or the social evil was involved. If they could hav had their way unhindered they would hav hustled hundreds of people off to jail without law or testimony.

In Mrs. Stanton's paper she allows for these and other alleged peculiarities of women, and admits, by way of argument, "that women in general are narrow, bigoted, and timid; that their influence would be uniformly against every step in progress; that if they had political power they would use it invariably to reinforce the conservativ party," and attributes it to the fact that women hav been oppressed and kept under by theology and man's love of authority. But, she asks, if woman's narrowness is shown in her direct influence, is it not the same in its indirect influence? In pursuing this thought she finds the question answered in the affirmativ. "Whether for good or ill, the influence of woman is ever insidiously doing its work—either drawing man upward to the sublimer hights where he can behold all things in their true relations, or holding him down in the valley of humiliation, where the narrow horizon bounds every outlook. The bigotry and superstition of the mothers are sedulously infused into the minds of the children, reappearing in every legislativ assembly, and in every ecclesiastical council generation after generation, wasting the time and patience of our Liberal thinkers in combating the old, worn-out systems of political economy and theology in the men believing what their mothers taught them. How seldom you meet a man whose ideas on all subjects are clear and consistent, in harmony with one another, and resting on some grand principle, so that his opinion on one question givs you the key to his opinions on all. His manly endeavors in the world of thought are blocked at every turn by the prejudices and superstitions of his mother, wife, and sister. His honest inquiries when a boy into the soul of things were never answered. Instead of instructing him in those things he could understand pertaining to his life, his mind is bewildered with fears of the mysterious life beyond, of which his teacher knows nothing. In later years, the social code of morals teaches him to echo popular opinions and not combat the evils of his day and generation, if he would insure personal success and family aggrandizement. Policy, expediency, manœuvring, stratagem, are the weapons of oppressed classes in life's battle; and these are the weapons our mothers are compelled to use at the fireside, and in such tactics they drill their sires and sons."

This condition is the result, in Mrs. Stanton's opinion, of human laws and customs which we hav the right to modify and change altogether. Instead of being the "patient, hopeless slave she is," woman must be educated out of her bondage, not only for her own sake but that she may evolve a higher type of manhood in her sons. "Seeing that her indirect influence is generally acknowledged to be all-powerful for good or for evil, there is only one road to safety; and that is to accord to woman all the advantages and opportunities for higher development, and thus enlarge her sympathies, clear her vision, and strengthen her judgment, that the race may be lifted up a few degrees."

That is our opinion. Notwithstanding the drawbacks encountered in Washington Territory, we still say that, no matter how they use it, women hav as much right to a voice in the government as men. The American "sovereigns" often vote against their own best interests, but they do not disfranchise themselvs for it. The present gross injustice against women should not be perpetuated because temporary evil may result from the correction. The principle at stake is clear, and should be maintained.

Mr. Applebee Aroused.

We hav received the following note from the Rev. James Kay Applebee, aspirer, of Parker Memorial, Boston:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav one or two things to say respecting the article which appeared in your last issue entitled 'A Remarkable Sermon.'

"Referring to the motto, proposed by Mr. Andrews for the Liberal League, you say:

"'The reverend gentleman did not even quote Mr. Andrews aright; the accurate statement of the motto is, "In things proven, unity; in whatsoever can be doubted, free diversity; in things not trenching upon others' right, liberty; in all things, charity."'

"You add that I 'perverted' this motto, and further on you say that I hav been guilty of 'a dishonest attempt to impute to Mr. Andrews and the League purposes and desires which never entered the thought of either, nor were ever expressed by even the shadow of implication.' You further say that I 'owe the man and the organization an apology,' and you ask, 'Is he gentleman enough to make it?'

"I neither owe an apology to Mr. Andrews nor to the League. Instead of proving that I hav been guilty of a dishonest attempt, you only succeed in proving that you yourself are either ignorant or false. In quoting the motto I used the exact words of Mr. Andrews. You hav ignorantly or wilfully confounded the motto Mr. Andrews was good enough to frame for the Liberal League with the motto he, years afterward, framed for 'the Colloquium.' At the centennial Congress of the League held at Philadelphia, Mr. Andrews submitted a resolution as follows:-

"'WHEREAS, The Evangelical Alliance has presented to the world, as the platform of a possible co-operativ unity among elements characterized by diversity, the following epitome of thought: In essentials, unity; in non-essentials, liberty; in all things, charity; therefore,

"'Resolved, That we adopt and promulgate as the true scientific basis of organization the following motto or epitomized statement: In things demonstrated and certain, unity; in whatsoever can be doubted, free diversity; in all things, chariry.'—Official Report, p. 156.

"I still think, and for reasons urged in my 'remarkable sermon'—reasons which you hav not ventured to touch—that the first clause of this motto is 'supreme nonsense.' The fact that Mr. Andrews amended the motto for 'the Colloquium' would seem to indicate that he himself, by a remarkably slow process, came to consider it imperfect. Instead of myself owing an apology to Mr. Andrews and the League, it is you who owe an apology to me. Are you gentlemen enough to make it?

"In the course of your article, you say of me, 'It is the more shame to him that he was once a subscriber to the Investigator.' I confess I never regarded the matter exactly in that light. On reflection, however, I am inclined to think you are correct. I admit it to be 'a shame to me' that I was once a subscriber to the Investigator. This one thing, I venture to say, should be put down to my credit—I speedily discovered the utter worthlessness of the Investigator, and did not renew my subscription. I suspect this is just where your dear brother Seaver finds the shoe to pinch!

"I might reasonably complain of your assertions that I am 'dishonest,' that I indulge in 'uncalled-for attacks on individuals,' that I am 'ignorant of my subject,' 'that I revel in the discussion of obscenity,' that I indulge in 'rant stolen from the religious press,' that I hav said what was 'infamously false,' that I 'borrowed' portions of my discourse and 'forgot to giv credit,' and so forth and so forth. I suppose this sort of slander-slinging pleases you; it certainly does not hurt me. I also suppose it to be your usual method of manifesting the sweet sanity of that 'Liberalism' in which you are daily accustomed to revel.

"Except when, as in the present case, my honesty and honor are directly impeached, I hav made it, through life, my rule to abstain from answering any editorial comments on anything I may utter. Editors, like most other old women, are fond of having the last word, and their position enables them to get it. Yours truly, JAMES KAY APPLEBEE.

Boston, Oct. 6, 1884.

We are always glad to get these pleasant letters from the clergy, and when one contains so full and complete a correction of errors as this one does, we are particularly elated! Mr. Applebee is such a gentleman, and such a close reader—never omitting a single point for the edification and enlightenment of the "old women" who endeavor to set him right—and, withal, is so genial and courteous, that we are tempted to double-lead his communication.

There are "one or two things," though, that, perhaps, it is incumbent on us to say, seriously.

First, as to the perversion of Mr. Andrews's motto. When Mr. Andrews first saw Mr. Applebee's sermon, he said that the motto was not quoted correctly, and handed us the version we gave. Referring to him now, he says that the motto was in the constitution of the Universal Freethinkers' Association formed in 1874; that at Philadelphia, where he has forgotten that he introduced the resolution, he must hav restated it momentarily from memory, and that subsequently the matter was restated in the record of the Colloquium, which is a matter of some three year's standing.

The original form, as put forth in the preamble to the constitution of the Universal Freethinkers' Association, was: "In all things not trenching on others' rights, liberty; in things proven, unity; in what can be doubted, free diversity; in all things, charity."

We cheerfully aquit Mr. Applebee of perverting the motto, but the amendments he says Mr. Andrews has made are not amendments. The motto adopted by the League was not the one put forth two years earlier, and since used as perfected on Colloquium documents, but a hastily-written and imperfect statement. Mr. Applebee will see that his remarks about "a remarkably slow process" are pointless. The original and the final versions are substantially alike, and nothing that Mr. Applebee has said turns the edge of our criticism of his words. In any form the motto has been stated his urged objections are futil, and a careful reperusal of his paragraph fails to discover any "reason" we did not touch.

Next, Mr. Applebee says we accused him of "a dishonest attempt to impute to Mr. Andrews and the League purposes and desires which never entered the thoughts of either," etc. Now, we did nothing of the kind. In Mr. Applebee's remarks he said, commenting upon the motto: "What is doubtful to me may be a firm certainty to my neighbor. Shall he be allowed to restrain me in the utterance of my doubts because he happens to be without doubt at all?" Any one reading this latter sentence would unquestionably gather that in the proposition dissented from by Mr. Applebee there was some command to restrain people from thinking a certain way. And we said that "IF his [Mr. Applebee's] query is a dishonest attempt to impute to Mr. Andrews and the League purposes and desires which never entered the thoughts of either, . . . Mr. Applebee owes the man and the organization an apology." And we think so still. Any one who imputes to another intentions, motivs, desires, or purposes, which the person or persons distinctly repudiate, is dishonest. And the time has passed when ministers are exempt from this criticism. We further asked, "Is he gentleman enough to make it?" It seems not.

Mr. Applebee sets his opinion of the value of the Investigator above that of thousands who hav read it for years. We fancy that Brother Seaver is not especially solicitous about the renewal. The "eleven obstinate jurymen" will probably continue to hold their opinions.

For the gross distortions of what we said in the next to the closing paragraph of Mr. Applebee's cheerful note we care nothing. He would hav the reader infer that he said nothing "dishonest" or "infamously false," and that he was not "ignorant of his subject." Perhaps not; but no man can say of such a body of individuals as compose the League that "every subsequent act of the League [since 1876] only tended to sink the cause of religious Liberalism into infamy and disgrace," and not be dishonest, ignorant, and infamously false. We entertain the utmost contempt for ministers who, from their pulpits, beslime people in all respects their superiors, and then cry "slander" when exposed. Many of Mr. Applebee's congregation undoubtedly think the Leaguers are all "filthy rascals," and unfit to associate with decent men and women. For this the preacher is responsible, and his responsibility ought to be known that men may accurately measure him.

That is all we hav to say at present, unless we may be allowed to quote a remark of a Democratic attendant at a state convention in Iowa, to wit: "For family-dividing, soul-destroying, damnable lying, commend me to a minister." Amen and Amen!

Editorial Notes.

THE sardonic Saladin, of the Secular Review, is deeply affected by George Chainey's adoption of a "new gospel." He prefaces a long quotation from the first of Mr. Chainey's Cassadaga speeches printed in these columns with these sentences:

"The head and front of celebrity in the Cassadaga Convention of American Freethinkers is the epoch-marking speech of Mr. George Chainey, whom many of our readers will recognize as a gifted, but somewhat inflated and unequal, contributor to this journal. Years ago I recognized in the editor of This World a man made of no common clay. His faults and offenses, literary and ratiocinativ, were such as Mr. J. Smith could never commit. His intellect was evidently plastic to the molding of the fierce, hot fingers of his temperament, and his waking life tinged with the shadow of his dreams. 'But,' exclaimed I, 'but for the merciless rigidity of mental disciplin to which the school system of Scotland subjected me, I should hav had all the unsystematic enthusiasm and incoherent poetry of George Chainey.' And I did not thus exclaim with a pharisaical consciousness that I was wiser and holier than he. I seriously questioned whether enthusiasm gained by being systematic, and whether the worth of poetry was enhanced by coherence. Although I never saw him, although I never exchanged even an epistolary note with him in my life, long ago my heart traversed the width of the Atlantic to hail him as a kindred spirit, but one not so sternly trained, one possessing more of the freedom and sweeping outline of nature, and less of the athletic cult of the agonistis and gymnast. And behold in the following the result of the dominance of the emotional over the intellectual."

And closes as follows:

"I should as soon expect to find malodor in the rose as dishonesty in a nature like that of Mr. Chainey. No 'spirit-love, Lilly Dove,' is ever likely to pass her gentle hand over my grim brow. But, if she did, I should acknowledge her presence, amid the sneers and gibes of the world. There is no absolute world, per se, to any of us. Our world is, to each and all of us, what we make it. For me, it only remains to see that no rust of inaction be permitted to dim the fierce gleam of my blade, that no voice of siren be permitted to blend with the merciless ring of my battle-cry. Down with the church! Let me see that it stand not as loftily over my grave as it did over my cradle. Under the debris from its minarets which I hav already pulled down my Lilly Dove lies slain; but I hav more sympathy than sneer for the spirit-love of a man like George Chainey. The self-sufficient Atheist may laugh; the reverent Agnostic pauses to study and wonder."

"THE Christian Sunday," the Rev. Carlos Martyn thinks, "is the old Jewish Sabbath transferred by the authority of inspired prophets to the first day of the week. Now, possessing such a day, are we willing to surrender it or change its character? The assault upon it is being made by two different but co-operating classes. The one is that portion of our population, which has been cradled under a civilization antagonistic to ours, and taught to consider Sunday as a working holiday. The other class is composed of recreant Americans of high social position and much wealth, who ape French manners. They desire to introduce here the Parisian Sunday. They fancy that they hav found a grand warcry in the demand that museums and libraries be thrown open to the public, and a band tootle in Central Park on Sundays. They ask, 'What is the objection to this?' I answer: 'In the first place, the fourth commandment forbids it; second, it is against immemorial usage, our observance of Sunday being as distinctivly American as the public school and the ballot-box; third, the experiment has been tried and has failed, as was seen in the case of the Mercantile and Cooper Union libraries, which were opened two years ago on Sundays, but were speedily closed because it was discovered that the reading rooms had become lounging places for bummers and tramps, and fourth, because it is unnecessary, sufficient opportunity being furnished to all to inspect the museums and libraries on other holidays and on Saturday evenings." Mr. Martyn makes a few mistakes. The Mercantile Library was not opened on Sundays. The Cooper Union reading-room was opened, and is open now on Sundays, and is crowded with respectable people. The Rev. Carlos should go to sleep again. He has awoke too early.

AT the evening session of the Episcopal congress at Detroit, Oct. 9th, the topic was, "Is our civilization just to workingmen?" Henry George, of New York, was the chief reader. The Rev. Dr. R. Heber Newton, of New York, said labor's complaint is poverty. Poverty is the fault neither of the laborer nor of nature. The state crosses the path of the workingman and prevents him from making a fair fight. Labor fails to get favorable legislation and capital secures all it asks. He believed the laborer to be entitled to a just share of the wealth he creates, and impartial action should be taken. The only court for the workingman to appeal to is justice. The Rev. C. R. Baker, of Brooklyn, believed that the gains of the world always came from the poor; never from the rich. He favored war against capital. The Rev. Henry Mott believed that rich and poor both suffer from ignorance, and argued that education was the thing needed. It is an encouraging sign that ministers are subordinating the life in the sky to the one here. But a peculiar feature of this is, that only the heretical preachers are taking up these subjects. The orthodox ones are content to let the majority of the people liv in hell here and hereafter.

THE Volks Zeitung of September 27th contains the following: "A citizen of Plawen had a gravestone erected for his wife, who died last year, with the following inscription: 'Resurrection is a fable; your child alone will continue to blossom.' The surveyors asked the police authorities to remove the stone from the graveyard, as being a public annoyance, at the same time taking legal proceedings against the Infidel husband and the sculptor for bringing religion into disrepute. The public prosecutor prosecuted, and the case was heard at the 'Landesgericht,' the court being crowded by the public, eagerly waiting for the judgment. The principal defendant said that when his wife was lying on her death-bed he tried to console her by saying, 'We shall meet again,' to which she answered, 'There is no meeting again; the old branches fall off, but we survive in our children.' This caused him to hav the inscription engraved on her stone. The prosecutor maintained the charge, but the court discharged the prisoners."

THE method practiced by the New Zealand Christians for preventing Freethought lectures on Sunday, is to enforce the act prohibiting meetings at which admission is charged, this being the means used by the Rationalists to pay expenses. At the meeting of the Auckland Rationalistic Association recently, it was resolved to start a defense fund, and to communicate with the kindred societies in New Zealand with the view of securing their co-operation and assistance in testing the matter.

THE following is the wording of the 463d section of the Criminal Amendment act, New South Wales: "No person shall be liable to prosecution in respect of any publication by him, orally or otherwise, of words or matter charged as blasphemous, where the same is by way of argument or statement—and not for the purpose of scoffing or reviling—nor of violating public decency, nor in any manner tending to a breach of the peace."

THIS is the way the Evening Telegram, of Portland, Oregon, describes the taking off of a San Francisco murderer: "Hutchings, the strangler, shriven by the priest, clasping in his hands and kissing the crucifix and murmuring his love for Jesus, was, yesterday, dropped six feet seven inches from a platform built for that purpose in the jail yard at San Francisco, and his body was duly placed in a coffin and buried in the Catholic cemetery. The idea intended to be conveyed by the ceremonies attendant upon his execution is that he went straight to paradise, being duly provided with a permit which would be recognized as genuin by St. Peter at the gates thereof, and that he has now entered upon a season of everlasting bliss."

THE New York Tribune says: "There are 1,500 Chinese children, who will probably hav to grow up without the blessings of Christian civilization. The state superintendent of public schools in California has just declared 'that Chinese children cannot become pupils of the public schools, public education being intended under the constitution of the state only for those who can become citizens.'" The clergy are shouting themselvs hoarse for Blaine, who was nominated because of his position on the exclusion of the "heathen Chinee," and the Tribune is their organ.

"THEOLOGIANS," says Beecher, "hav thought out God, and what a miserable mess they hav made of it! The creeds and catechisms that represent God are very much like the children's efforts at art. They giv to their representations of animals stiff, wooden arms and legs. The God of the creeds is very much a wooden god." No man, continues Mr. Beecher, can form an adequate conception of God who is not godlike. All right living, and all high and noble dispositions in one's self and among men are the materials that are upon the palette for the imaging of God.

FRIEND PUTNAM'S "Waifs and Wanderings," the Communist thinks, "is a very interesting narrativ, and written in a very entertaining manner, showing much originality and independence of character as well as freedom of thought and progressiv ideas in connection with the events narrated. The wanderings of the waifs are through some of the scenes of our Civil war, and would be read with great interest by all." The Missouri Liberal says the "book is high in tone, true to nature, and written in that extraordinary style for which the author is noted."

THE defense of the Lord against the mighty in San Francisco seems to rest with the Catholics. The Monitor, of the 1st inst., devotes two pages to "answering" Ingersoll, and the publishers of the paper are circulating several thousand extra copies of it. The "answers" are soundly orthodox and especially Romish in their sophistry, but few people in this day and generation will be deceived by writers who maintain that Genesis is a scientific account of the world's formation.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH'S case on appeal comes up next month. He will not be able to get his seat in the present Parliament, but when a new election is ordered, which will undoubtedly be within a year, he will probably be re-elected, and can swear himself in before a quorum is present to prevent. The appeal to be argued next month is to reverse the verdict against him for "illegally" voting in the House of Commons."

MGR. CAPEL has just reprinted, with preface from his own pen, "The Faith of Catholics Confirmed by Scripture and Attested by the Fathers of the First Five Centuries." The work was written in the early part of this century and was edited five and twenty years ago by the Rev. James Waterworth. This is undoubtedly designed to be an authoritativ exposition of the Catholic creed.

THE cardinal vicar of Rome has denounced as heretical the St. Paul Catholic American church there. His reasons are that it uses the Italian language in its church services, doubts the infallibility of the pope, disbelieves in the real presence, etc. Major excommunication is denounced against all who join or persuade others to join the church.

THE Independent is growing senile, and the weakening of mind incident to advanced age is painfully apparent in its "dissection" of Mr. Putnam's circular. Should the secretary of the League meet with no more vigorous opposition than Mr. Bowen's paper presents, he will hav an easy task.

THE excellent article published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 4th inst., under the title of "The New Republic," was a synopsis of Mrs. Severance's lecture at the Cassadaga Freethinkers' Convention, and should hav been so designated.

"SOCIETY," said Mr. Beecher, Sunday before last, "and largely public sentiment, is Infidel, is Atheistic." Mr. Beecher has exceptional advantages for feeling the public pulse.

JUDGE CALDWELL, a Federal judge in Arkansas, has decided that a contract made on Sunday is valid.

MR. CHARLES WATTS'S lecture engagements for the next month are as follows: Sunday, Oct. 12th, Toronto; Monday and Tuesday, 13th and 14th, Hamilton; Wednesday, 15th, Welland; Thursday, 16th, Dunnville; Friday, 17th, Seaforth; Sunday, 19th, Toronto; Monday, 20th, Meaford; Tuesday, 21st, Owen Sound; during the following week a tour through north of Canada; Sunday, 26th, and following week, Hamilton and the west; Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday, Nov. 2d, 3d, and 4th, Montreal. Mr. Watts will arrive in New York November 6th.

A WELL-DRESSED stranger at Erie said his prayers and then drowned himself. It is singular, remarks a contemporary, that a Christian about to die should take the trouble to pray when he knows that he is soon to go where he can make his communication direct.

A MINISTER having preached the same discourse to his people three times, one of his constant hearers said to him after service: "Doctor, the sermon you gave us this morning having had several readings, I move that it now be passed."

Letters from Friends.

GOLD HILL, COL., Sept. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. John R. Kelso, in a letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 6th, invited a definition of "marriage," its institution, authority, etc., and affirms "it must hav been established by nature, by man, or by some deity superior to either." Perhaps the works of Messrs. Fowler & Wells giv as much information upon this subject, from a natural standpoint, as any other popular publications in our language; also, the statutes of all civilized lands define its legal status, and specify in what degrees of consanguinity marriage may not be entered into, and how it may be abrogated. These statutes are all based upon, or copied from, the Mosaic law upon the subject, found in the eighteenth chapter of Leviticus. The Hebrews were there forbidden to copy after the people of Egypt or Palestine in contracting marriages, "lest the land spew you out also, as it spewed out the nations that were before you, for the souls that trangress shall be cut off from among the people."

But the authority for a union of the sexes of men runs back to the history of the first pair, as found in the first two chapters of Genesis, close up to six thousand years ago by the best chronology we hav. It is there stated that on the sixth day man was "created in God's image, male and female, who were told to multiply and increase, and replenish the earth and subdue it." The woman is there called a "wife." Sixteen hundred years after, in Noah's time, previous to the flood, we are told in Genesis vi, 2, that "the sons of God took wives of the daughters of men of all that they chose;" but Noah and his sons had but one wife each, nor, so far as history relates, did the patriarchs of the first thousand years. There is no other authority, religious, moral, or civil, relating to the subject of marriage until we come down to nearly the time of Abraham, who had one wife, some concubines as plural wives, and one of whose decendents married two sisters, while his wife was a half sister. Adam's sons and grandsons must hav married their near relativs from necessity, a measure that Moses forbade, as tending to deteriorate the race, though cousins were allowed to intermarry.

The above is sufficient for our purpose, to explain the origin and authority of the union of the sexes. The woman was made for a "help-meet for the man," because it was "not good for him to dwell alone" without companionship, nor was it possible for him to replenish or subdue the earth without help. This populating the earth was a prime necessity of nature, as well as law, originally divine, and afterward continued by human enactments to the present time.

The statistics of all peoples, in all ages, show about an equal number of male and female births, which is a conclusiv argument against either sex having more than one partner in the family relation, the obvious object being to hav children cared for while growing up, and properly educated to fill their places in society worthily, and for that end and purpose all civilized laws are framed and adjusted. Neither sex could generally succeed in rearing children for good citizens outside of a marriage compact as exhibited in the family union. The miserable way in which Mormon wives of poor men are treated and their children are reared, ought to forever stamp plural marriages with infamy, and be legally estopped speedily; if any one doubts, let them read Mrs. Stenhouse's exposition of its workings in Utah.

But there is another view of marriage of great import, viz., its ordinary practice inside of law and custom. Probably more than half the husbands in America do not, in practice, treat their wives as companions, much less as equals; to hav their food prepared, and their desires gratified, is the utmost they care for conjugal welfare. This stricture is true of nearly all immoral men; while, on the hand, the wealthy women too often resort to criminality to limit their families. Wealthy women, who could raise children with little cost, hav few or none, while the poor, ignorant, and brutal are overburdened with family cares, with no means to rear them above want and ignorance, on account of the ignorance, wickedness, and brutality of these women's husbands. Should we call these alliances marriages? A true marriage is a home for the cultivation of the affections, where passion is kept in abeyance by the will; where the woman is never overburdened with family cares and maternity, or compelled to work more hours than necessary; where she trains her children aright; is careful of either's (their joint) earnings; a home which the man prizes, though but a shed, and where he spends his leisure time in his wife's society in preference to other associations. Such homes and such marriages are fast disappearing, because of exacting usury, rents, mortgages, and competitiv work and wages consequent upon labor-saving inventions, which capitalists absorb all the profits of, instead of dividing such profits with labor, thus constantly making the poor poorer until they are reduced to serfdom and slavery, while the wealthy know not how to take care of or use properly their unjust accumulations. It is these latter things that destroy families, produce divorces, pervert society, and make a misnomer of marriage altogether.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of our enterprising town hav established a Sabbath-school for the purpose of feeling the liberty of a free discussion of the demerits as well as the merits of the so-called word of God.

Lesson for next Sabbath, Matthew, 4th chapter:

In the close of the last week's lesson, we find that after Christ was baptized of John, the spirit of God descended and lighted upon his son. Now we find the same spirit (as no other has been spoken of) leading his son into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. It seems that at this time Jesus was about thirty years old, and certainly with all the advantages which he seemed to hav possessed, ought to hav known something of where to find the devil, or at least to hav known more about him than he here seems to be represented. It seems that as soon as God got his son off into the devil's country, he went off and left him without anything to eat for forty days and forty nights. It would seem at first thought that this was very cruel in God to leave the poor child, only thirty years old, all alone to starve; but when we consider that it was necessary for God to know what kind of a boy he had in order to show his love for the world and not get fooled out of his great plan of redemption, it shows forth what a loving father he is to the rest of us.

We must remember, too, that God had at this time been in business a long time, and had failed so many times in his undertakings he was sharp enough to prove, to his own satisfaction, that this boy was no humbug, but was the veritable Jesus which the angel had told Joseph that the Holy Ghost was the father of. The statement that Jesus went forty days and nights without anything to eat has been a great point for Infidels to bring up as against the truth of the Bible, from the supposed fact of it being impossible. But we hav demonstrated by Mr. Tanner, of New York, that it is possible, thereby proving, or rather disproving, at least, one strong Infidel point as against the truth of the great book of books. And again. Jesus has clearly shown forth his divinity in not getting hungry till after the forty days. You may naturally ask, If he could go forty days without getting hungry, why couldn't he go forever without getting hungry? He could, and would probably, if it had not been for that devil coming to him to talk about his having something to eat. Then, and not until then, his human nature asserted itself, and he got hungry. What a cruel fellow that devil must hav been to come to Jesus and call his attention to having something to eat and not giv the poor boy something, that he might satisfy his hunger! What a poor consolation it must hav been to Jesus, while in his craving desire for food, to hav that devil talk to him about making bread out of those stones. If that devil should ever become a tramp, and should call at my door with a brickbat in his hand asking for a little butter to spread on that brickbat that it might be more palatable, I would slam the door in his face, and tell him to eat it as it was—good enough for him.

But here again we notice the great contrast between the forgiving meekness of Jesus and the revengeful passion of man. While we hate the devil and would kill him, Jesus loved him and chose him as his boon companion; and more than that we see in the fifth verse that Jesus accepted the devil as his superior. "Then the devil took him up into the city, and sat him on a pinnacle of the temple." What a beautiful spirit is here manifested! Even though Jesus came into the world to drive the devil out, and while we hav the positiv evidence that Jesus had no other object in life than to fight the devil, we here find him accepting him as his guide.

While this shows clearly the divinity of Christ, whose teachings we must follow or be forever lost, we should also remember the power of the devil, and shun him as we would our grandmother's ghost. May the Lord hav mercy.

OAK POINT, WASH. TER., Sept. 23, 284.

MR. EDITOR: With your kind permission I will say a few words in reply to Brother Tompkins in your issue of Sept. 6th. I deem it my duty to let our southern brother know that his sentiments are rarely indorsed by THE TRUTH SEEKER family of the North.

Friend Tompkins, you say you hope Brother Collier will see that the black people ought to own every foot of the slave states. They made the South all it is, and it should hav been confiscated for their use. If this is your belief, it is well for humanity that you hav but little influence in our national affairs. Such an act would hav worked great injustice and caused untold suffering. It smacks too much of Bible justice to be practiced in this age and country. With all your professed love for the black people, you seem to hav forgotten the dictates of humanity for your own race. There are many people in the slave states who did not own slaves, but you would rob them all and drive them penniless—and, so far as you seem concerned, friendless—into the wilderness. History rarely furnishes a parallel to such an outrage. The negroes hav not made the slave states all they are, and would not hav done as much as they hav toward subduing and improving them had they not been guided by the superior intelligence of their masters. You also say, "Do as much to educate and elevate the black race as you hav to degrade them," etc. Now, I do not wish to defend slavery in any form, but facts are stubborn things, and in the case of the negroes of the Southern states, they hav been improved and elevated while in captivity by their contact with white people and civilization, and are now far in advance of their barbarian relativs in Africa. They hav justly been emancipated, and although an ignorant and inferior race, enfranchised and admitted to full citizenship, in one of the most enlightened nations of the world; and, to use your own expression, they may thank their stars that it is as well with them as it is. I cannot see what cause is served by such rash arguments. Besides, the case has already been decided, and there is no hope of an appeal, nor any need of one. We should be more magnanimous with our conquered brothers. We met them in battle, and found them well worthy our steel; and now that we are the victors, and our cause won, we should not giv them cause to think we wish to impose upon them. Instead of keeping up sectional strife, we should allow the wounds caused by the war to heal. We may then harmonize the Freethought element more easily and bring about the so-much-needed organization. In union there is strength. There are many questions which urgently demand our attention, the foremost of which is the separation of church and state. The church is slowly but surely encroaching upon our blood-bought liberties. Let us, then, forget our late unpleasantness, organize, and to the rescue.

D. F. HOWARD.

NEW YORK, Sept. 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of to-day has an article of a Mr. H. Willis, of Battle Creek, Mich., to which I wish to reply. Mr. Willis writes: "I hav no patience with such scribblers, who chime in with such howlers as Higginson, Schurz, & Co." Well, Mr. Willis, it happens the same to us; but whether we like it or not, we are compelled to drag you along all the same until you get more light, and are willing and desire to see and work for truth and honesty, or go under. It is with you the same as with the Catholics or Protestants. Show them the follies and contradictions of the Bible, or some crimes committed by their priests and ministers, all the proofs and evidences submitted to them will not convince them; they will not believe it; they will not see it, because they do not like it; they will not confess to be wrong.

Now about the parties. I do not care a snap for the Republican party to-day, nor for the Democratic either; they are both as corrupt and rotten as they well can be; but the Republicans are now in power these twenty-four years, and the immense government patronage at their dispensation has so degraded and degenerated it that it is no more the same as of old, when a Sumner, Greeley, Stevens, Schurz, Higginson, Stanton, etc., were its leaders. These men had lots of enemies, but you never heard their honesty and patriotism impugned by the least breath of suspicion.

Healthy politics, and governments, needs changes as times advances and progresses. We hav now before us three men as candidates for the presidency to vote for—Cleveland, Blaine, and Butler. Cleveland and Blaine both hav in their earlier lives sown their wild oats, as has been found out; but who has not? Blaine has been in office for a long time and has grown very rich, but the worst is mostly through his legislativ influence, as he himself givs ample proofs and evidences to convince any one unbiased enough and willing to see the truth. On the other side stands Cleveland as present governor of New York, and since in office without a blemish of his character and honesty.

Butler, in his long public life, has shown the most common good sense in his acts; he is a fearless, bold man, and, I think, means well. I respect an open, outspoken man, but I still take him for a demagog, and think he will hav no chance to succeed.

In contemplation of all circumstances, I think it best to vote for honesty—for Cleveland, a Democrat but not a Catholic Democrat. His success, and four years of Democratic government, would purge—if it is possible—the Republican party, and inspire it with new principles and life; or, better still, start an entirely new party, for instance, a "Liberal National League" party, which would then hav a better chance and would prove for the best of us all.

Yours for progress, FREDERICK KOEZLY.

PRINCETON, MASS., Oct. 4, Y. L., 12.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to see that you extend a "fraternal hand" to the Rev. Mr. Applebee, in your issue of to-day. Among other "private griefs" he speaks of (in Boston Commonwealth, September 21st, I think), is that copies of the Word were sent him, for which he sentenced me to two years' imprisonment for the first offense, six for the second, and to be hung for the third! Please allow me to say how the Word happened to be sent to him. One of his own parishioners, interested to develop him, labor-and-social-reform-wise, asked me to send Mr. Applebee the paper, and paid for it! Under the statute, as you know, publishers are permitted, invited indeed, to send specimen copies to whosoever they please; if the paper is not wanted receivers hav simply to say so to carriers, and it then becomes the legal duty of the postmaster to notify the publisher that the paper is refused, misdirected, or otherwise abortiv.

Mr. Applebee's heated attack on me, Mr. Andrews, and others favoring repeal of Comstock's "laws," recalls the bigots who in Park Street church, Boston, in 1857, prayed God to put a hook in Theodore Parker's jaws, and haul him into hell-fire! Mr. Applebee, claiming to be St. Theodore's successor, "deals damnation" round town in lots like what came from "Brimstone Corner," as Park Street church was called, only the jail and the gallows are the hell he givs us. As Bennett, Lant, Train, Foote, and the rest of us got our several shares of hell, will not the Rev. Mr. Applebee be so kind as to take Elizur Wright, Horace Seaver, T. B. Wakeman, T. C. Leland, the pantarch, or your Infidel self this time? Besides, I am a "preferred" criminal; I hav committed the "third" offense, for which I "got off;" more than that, according to the rulings of Judges Pitman, Nelson, Lowell, and Treat, the "obscene" persons above mentioned were unjustly punished, and the Rev. Mr. Applebee "hangs" himself up to distinguished derision in being ten years behind such orthodox priests on mental-liberty issues. Wishing success to your generous purpose to lift him from "sloughs of despond," and take him through to "the good time coming," I am yours to go there also on the surest train running that way. E. H. HEYWOOD.

AUSTIN, Mo., Aug. 16, E.M. 284.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find account of a "Modern Miracle," which I would like you to notice editorially. I believe it to be one of those huge frauds that the clergy hav to resort to in order to bolster up their dying cause.

If there is any truth in that case I think it about time God was calling around this way to perform similar acts of mercy; for in this vicinity livs an estimable lady, a devout Christian, a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus, who has been confined to her bed for over twenty years with spinal affection. She is no better now than twenty years ago, and during all those long years of suffering, she has been offering up daily prayers to the great and merciful God for relief, but none comes. She bears her affliction patiently, and says, "God's will be done."

Is God a partial God, that, having the power to relieve distress, and seeing the world full of it, he selects isolated cases in obscure corners of the earth, upon which to manifest his unbounded mercy, and leaves the great bulk of humanity to suffer on? Is God (if there be a God) a respecter of persons, to manifest his loving kindness in small and trivial things, and wholly ignore great and noble deeds?

If God is as loving, kind, and merciful as the clergy represent him to be, why did he show such a great unconcern about the suffering and distress of his dear children, when the Greely expedition was wrecked in the Arctic ocean, and the men reduced to such straits as to hav to eat the remains of their dead comrades, and the amputated limbs of men then living? God neglects many opportunities when he could aid the distressed; and the bones of the few survivors would now be floating on an iceberg in the Polar Sea if it had not been for the noble efforts of man.

How much more worthy would it hav been for God to hav sent relief to those noble men, than to sit with folded hands and watch sparrows fall.

Success to the great TRUTH SEEKER. R. A. SMILEY.

[The account is an "ordinary" faith cure, but with no authentication beyond the newspaper report. It purports to hav taken place in Norcross, Ga. If any of our Southern readers hav knowledge of the case they will oblige by exposing the humbug.—ED. T. S.]

HATBORO, PA., Sept. 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot see the consistency of such men as Mr. Willis calling themselvs Liberals, objecting to such simple trash as the Atonement, and then believing that men who fought against their country's flag, which was wrong, having to go to the Republican party for redemption—a party that has clung to power the last four years by the most damnable frauds ever perpetrated on a free people.

I voted for the Republican party when I was compelled to shut my eyes and hold my nose while voting, "knowing that it had in its early days done much for the country," but God forbid that I shall vote with it again until it shows signs of reform. It has shouldered every ism that came along for years —anything to make a vote. We need reform in politics, as well as in religion. There has been much hum by some of our leading Liberals about the Catholic church. Many of them are led in that direction, no doubt, on account of the Catholics being followers of the Democratic party. If we get away with the bigoted Protestants—and there are plenty of them—the Catholics will be easily managed. We want law in this country that will make the Christan understand that church and state shall be separate, not in form, but in reality. We can't hav this as long as the orthodox Protestants' boast is good that no one but their member can be elected to the presidency. The Baptist church hav here to-day what they call an Association. Quite a number are here from a distance by railroad, and will be compelled to remain over night. The committee hav visited nearly every private house in the town, to hav them entertained free of charge. We, being called on, asked the question, "Why not go to the hotels? There are two good ones, able to accommodate all;" and were told, "Oh, they do not go to hotels." It is safe to bet the last dollar nine out of every ten of these men vote the Republican ticket. How long would it take to make good Liberals of such people? Mr. Remsburg and Mr. Willis can remain in their own and among Protestants and find lots of missionary work to do. We hav many Liberals doing good work, but giv me Mr. Ingersoll among them all yet. He strikes all the churches alike. He knows they are "all smeared with the same stick," and "they know he knows it." A. J. READING.

FOREST GROVE, OREGON, Oct. 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of Forest Grove had the pleasure of listening to Col. R. G. Ingersoll on the 18th of August. His subject was "Orthodoxy," and the lecture was delivered in the usual masterly manner of the silver-tongued orator. It was a grand treat—something we can never expect to hear again, as this is too small a place to attract such speakers very often. In fact, there is but one Ingersoll, and he was so annoyed by the hoodlum element that we cannot reasonably hope to ever hear him here again. We heard quite recently that there was a man in Forest Grove that could answer Ingersoll, and I should not wonder if after the colonel gets down in Mexico, this man should just go to work and annihilate him. It reminds me of a little joke of the colonel's. When here, he said that he had been told he was "fighting men of straw," and, with his jolly laugh, he said that from the style of answers he was getting, he guessed he was.

And he is. It is simply laughable to hear some of the preachers in this country, with their seven-by-nine brain, attempt to answer Col. Ingersoll.

Inclosed please find $2.50 for Col. Ingersoll's "Prose Poems," and fifty cents for Lithograph of the Bennett Monument. We hav a large picture of the colonel handsomely framed, and all of his lectures. Now I want his "Prose Poems." I intend to send for Paine's complete works as soon as possible. Then our list of Liberal works will be large enough for a private library.

I see by the papers there is soon to be another wife murderer hung who has perfect faith in Christ. "Giv him a harp."

Friend Macdonald, did you ever think what a pleasant place hell is going to be if it is to be filled with such men as Paine, Bennett, and Ingersoll? What a sharp contrast compared with the wife murderers and other scum they are constantly sending to heaven! They can take my wings for a feather duster. I prefer to stay with "our folks."

Yours for universal mental liberty, SARAH C. TODD.

ROCKFORD, ILL., Sept. 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $2. Please put to my credit for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Richard Oglesby is our candidate for governor, and pretty sure of election. W. Lathrop is one of our best lawyers, a Liberal and intelligent man. Inclosed I send you an anecdote worth printing. GEO. TULLOCK.

OGLESBY'S STORY ABOUT LATHROP.

Ex-Governor Oglesby and Hon. William Lathrop are great friends, and hav been ever since they were in Washington together. Oglesby was in the Senate and Lathrop in the House. They roomed in the same building, and consequently saw considerable of each other. Yesterday the governor got Lathrop in a crowd, which he was entertaining in his characteristic manner, and told the following good one on our ex-congressman: "Lathrop was such a sanctimonious, sober, solemn-looking cuss that I used to squirm and wriggle every time he came round. He always seemed to be wrapped up in religious reflections, so that I thought he was one of those awful pious Illinois deacons, and I was uneasy for fear I would rip out something or other that would shock him. It went on that way for some months. I kept growing more miserable, and began to think I should hav to move. I liked him, too; he was a man of ideas and had a good head, and if he hadn't acted so blamed pious I would hav considered him a choice spirit. One day Lathrop came into my room all perspiration and out of wind and said: 'I've got 'em all off at last; had to address them all myself, paid $2 for a dray to cart 'em to the depot.' 'What are you talking about, man?' I said. 'Why, those damn seeds,' he said. I tell you, gentlemen," continued the general, "I felt as if I had got religion, I breathed so free and easy. I couldn't hav been more surprised if I had been struck by lightning. Lathrop and I hav been bosom friends ever since." The reader must know that every member of the House has a large amount of seeds and documents which he is expected to ship to his constituents, and it was that uncongenial labor at which Mr. Lathrop had been engaged all day, and which called out the vigorous ejaculations which made him and Uncle Dick friends for life.—Rockford Register, Sept. 5, 1884.

WAUSHIP, UTAH, Oct. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Will anyone believe me if I say that the God of the Bible has accepted two human sacrifices in this village in the last week—two girls aged respectivly fourteen and twenty years? Yet such is a fact. He did not hav them roasted, as he did Jephtha's daughter, nor hung and dried as he did seven children (see 2 Sam. xxi), nor killed by his soldiers the way he had hundreds of thousands (see the entire book of Joshua). But still sacrificed in almost, if not quite, as cruel a manner. These girls were refused medical attendance, their parents and friends relying upon the command of God, "If ye hav any sick among you, send for the elders." The last one that died was made an especial subject, the entire county praying earnestly and believingly, with a prayer circle around her bed nearly night and day for ten days. The most heart-rending appeals were uttered for her recovery. I do not think that there exists a human being that would hav been monster enough to refuse such supplications to spare the life of an innocent maiden who, with her friends, had the utmost faith in his magnanimity and ability to do so. Of course she died, a sacrifice to the pernicious doctrin that God hears and answers prayers. Does such indisputable evidence of the fallacy of superstition convince its victims? How do they escape the fact that God cannot or will not do as they ask him? At the funeral of this girl to-day they were on their knees thanking the myth for his goodness, that he had restored the gospel, with all the "gifts" that follow the true saint, and deprecating weak mortals' inability to comprehend his "mercy."

Truly, the Liberal Leagues hav a work of mercy to perform, a herculean task, that merits the aid of all whose minds are not clouded by such a horrible superstition.

Fraternally yours, S. D. L.

MR. EDITOR: The Christians are about letting up on us for this season; the harvest of the camp-ground is about cribbed, and the preachers are preparing for conference and grand convocations of sky-pilots in general. The thermometer is cooling down; so is the Holy Ghost excitement—but the religious craze did not run as high in this vicinity as it once did, which is very easily accounted for, after one finds out that about 150 copies of the Independent Pulpit hav been distributed around among the young folks, as well as a few TRUTH SEEKERS. I find it much easier to induce young people to read Liberal books and papers than older ones, for it is about as Mr. J. D. Shaw said in one of his lectures to the young folks at our schoolhouse, "You can't teach an old dog new tricks." It is really amusing to see how times hav changed among the people. Instead of the religious zealots going around among their unconverted friends persuading them to go to the anxious seat and be prayed for and get religion, the unconverted are carrying around a pocketful of Liberal books and papers trying to induce their Christian friends to read them and come out on the side of common sense and rationalism. But there is a wide difference in the way they receive each other's solicitations. The unbelievers when approached by the Christians are friendly and sociable, and are not at all offended, but see the Christian approached by the Liberal—whew! he flares up like "all mad," and ten to one he will insult his Liberal friend outright. But "the tables are on the turn."

MR. EDITOR: I see a strong inclination on the part of some Liberals to use THE TRUTH SEEKER for their political organ. I would rather see politics keep out, especially after I hav a benefit.

How any reformer of shams, any Liberal man, can cherish and vote for Democracy is a mystery to me not excelled by the gods. Many good reformers hav come out of the Democratic party; but it is not a reform party. It is largely composed to-day of the dregs of all other parties—the moss-backed, unprogressiv element bequeathed to this government from its beginning. It embraces all the old slave-holding fire-eaters of the South, who think more of Democracy than of reform. It is supported by every man, so to speak, who ever raised arm or voice against our flag, and lived over it. It is supported by thousands of men who are too utterly ignorant to know more than to vote for a few drinks of whisky, and too illiterate to ever reform themselvs or help reform this country. Wherever you find an Irish Catholic, you find a Democrat and jug of whisky. I hav spoken of rules, and not of exceptions.

I do not like the orthodoxy of Blaine and his party. But we hav no candidate. We cannot elect a Freethinker, and I hope we will not elect a Democrat. Between the evils, I shall vote for J. G. Blaine. Republicanism is a reform product of the nineteenth century; Democracy is of the eighteenth, and has so far disgraced itself and our flag that it deserves to sink into oblivion with its wars, flags, chains, and fetters. Liberals, think of it. J. THOS. KENNEDY.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., Oct. 4, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Friend H. R. Jones, of Burton, Texas, seems to think that we of the North only chronicle the acts of the Ku Klux during presidential campaigns. I assure him that we get our information from Southern papers. And of course those papers would not dare to publish such murders if not true. There may be some excuse for friend Jones if he is a resident of Texas, a state that seems to tolerate the use of the rifle, revolver, dirk, and bowie-knife; but I ask him to show a single instance where a Democrat has paid the penalty of his crime of murder of whites or blacks, merely because they were Republicans. I deny that those infamous murders hav only come to light once in four years, while it is evident that not a single year has passed since the war but men hav been murdered and women and children driven from their homes by the midnight murderers. I further say, for friend Jones's information, that the South has murdered more men for opinion's sake than were killed by British bullets of Americans during the War of 1812. I challenge friend Jones to name a single Democrat who has been hung in all the South for the murders they committed. Come, friend Jones, toe the mark. I know we hav many robbers and murderers in the North, but few of them escape the punishment due for crimes committed.

H. WILLIS.

NEW YORK, Sept. 23, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am well pleased with your most excellent paper, which I hav been taking a few weeks.

I am happy to say that I am a pronounced Infidel and Freethinker, also an ardent admirer of Robert G. Ingersoll. I derive more solid comfort and consolation from reading his works than I ever did from reading the so-called Holy Bible. I noticed many discrepancies in the "book of books," but my faith was so profound that I thought those things were possible. I am thankful that I hav lived long enough to find the grand truth.

I place more confidence in Darwin's, Haeckel's, and Spencer's writings than in any inspired work ever given to man.

I hope your paper and the Liberal cause may succeed beyond the most sanguin expectations, and may be the means of bringing many out into the light of day, who are groping in the darkness of superstition, and convert them to the truth; not in the common acceptation of the term converting, but by being thoroughly educated up to the standard of Liberalism in its most abstruse truths, where backsliding cannot and will not occur. It is better to hav one thoroughly convinced than ninety-nine overcome by emotional caprices.

Yours truly, J. W. CHISM.

WALTON, IND., Oct. 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I see that Mr. Willis, of Battle Creek, has been "scribbling in THE TRUTH SEEKER." There must be something that is hurting him very much. He defies you to find a greater tyrant than Butler. If Willis will go to the looking-glass he will see a greater one, but standing in much smaller boots. He says if Butler should be president, he has no doubt that Butler would hav every slave that was set free to be paid for by the government. Do you see what ails Willis, of Battle (pugnacious) Creek? Yes; he holds a government office, like a little post-office or weather-cock. Willis further says that Butler lies about his forty years' work for the laboring man. Willis don't tell any lies about the solid Democratic South, with a solid Democratic North. Oh, no! no lie here; it is all soap. You can see plainly that Willis is in great pain, because, if the Democrats or Butler should gain the day, well, he knows that his position scoots from under him. Well, he can take the "salary grab."

I wonder if the Ku Klux didn't hav hold of Willis? I think so from the blood-stained language that he used.

WHAT CHEER, IOWA, Sept. 5, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you some names for the petition. I should like for you to inform me in how many states church property is taxed, for this reason: I took the petition to a lawyer to get his signature. I heard him say he was a Liberal. He read it, and then he asked me what the damned fools wanted. He told me that there was not a state in the country but what taxed church property, and he would not sign it. He is a namesake of yours in this town. If you will inform me through your paper I will take him THE TRUTH SEEKER and let him see it. ALEX. L. WALKER.

[We are afraid our legal namesake is not competent to practice in all the states. California is the only state that does tax church property in its entirety. Many states tax all the real estate belonging to religious corporations not used as places of worship; one (New Hampshire) ostensibly taxes all church values aver $10,000 (but the taxes are rebated, in most towns, by the assessors); the rest exempt churches and charitable institutions, and New York exempts ministers' personal property to the extent of $1,500.—ED. T. S.]

CAWKER CITY, KAN., Sept. 19, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I hav learned much from the comparativly little politics found in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is better than that found in other papers, because the writers are realists. They do not write to sustain a party or for selfish motivs, but to teach and to be taught. The country is now agitated with the questions of free trade and protection, woman's rights, and prohibition. Now, there is one branch of the political subject that I wish some of our best informed writers would take up, and completely exhaust. It is this: Would it be better for the nation and the individual that the government should be supported by a direct tax on the persons, not the property, and that all adult persons should be taxed the same sum? This is so far-reaching and vital a question that I should be pleased to see all the arguments, pro and con, collected and printed in pamphlet or book form. We are just now going through a complete revolution of government, and to me it seems that we must land just there; but I do not wish at present to giv my reasons. I prefer rather to be instructed, and think the writers in THE TRUTH SEEKER to be the best I know of to do it.

Elmina in Boston.

DEAR FRIENDS: I am still in Boston, and doing all that I can to find the "shadow of a shade"—a spirit, or any ear-marks of one. My last day was an abortiv one. I met with kindness and courtesy, and help and advice, at the Banner of Light office, and one friend there was so good as to escort me himself to a blind medium, and introduce me, and told him my mission. But the medium only gave me a lecture, advising me to sit and develop myself into a medium. He said I was a true clairvoyant. I said, "Do you tell all your sitters this? I hav had it told me by every clairvoyant I've been to." He got indignant and said, "My medium [meaning himself] tells you nothing; it is the spirit talking through him that speaks." Then he reprimanded me for discourtesy to one of these higher beings who was so kind as to come and talk to me. I apologized, and said I spoke to him as a man, and not to a spirit. He continued his address, saying I was not in the right condition—was too Materialistic to receive any tests from spirits. I told him I was not satisfied, but paid my dollar and left. Then I went to another medium, who hurled a long prayer—invocation, he called it—at me, and made another preachment, not even so good as the blind man's, and charged me two dollars. I was so disgusted I felt as if he ought to be prosecuted. He is preparing to giv seances of illuminated spirits—those that show in the dark. This is the latest craze.

I was glad to get home at Mr. Mendum's, with his kind and lovely family, at Melrose. I am just delighted with them all, and only regret that I hav not known them personally much sooner than this. There are three interesting daughters and one son at home, and a sister of Mr. Mendum's, and a more genial, affectionate, and loving family I never met with. I wish all real Liberals could know them, and see their beautiful home life. Mr. Mendum seems to be almost an idol with his children, and indeed to know him must be to love him.

I hav been up in Mr. Seaver's sanctum, fifth story of the handsome Paine Memorial, several times, and always find him busy over articles for his pet paper. No two brothers could love or appreciate each other more than these two men who hav worked side by side for over forty years for freedom and Liberalism.

The good old Investigator well deserves to be the banner paper of Liberalism, considering all it has done in making our cause popular, respected, and beloved.

Later.—Well, I hav just been to see Dr. W. M. Keeler (wonder if all the mediums are doctors). He is in 46 Dover street; is a spirit-photographer, "indorsed by all the highest authority on spiritual matters." I was pleased with him and his wife. I got nothing on the first plate but my own picture; but on the second plate were three spirit (?) faces, and some hands pointing from above to my head.

This was pronounced excellent by the photographer, and should it prove worth while, I may hav it duplicated for friends. I shall wait and see how it finishes up. It is better than the three or four last visits I hav made. I called on Miss Rhind yesterday; got a few tests; had a pleasant seance and an agreeable one. But thus far I hav seen or heard nothing convincing; nothing that shows anything beyond human powers.

I am getting numerous personal reminiscences from wiser and better posted people than myself upon this vexed subject, and they all work into my own experience as helps towards reaching the real truth.

NO PROOF YET.

DEAR FRIENDS: I am visiting mediums in Boston; went to Jo Caffray's and got two slates full of what purported to be communications from three dead friends. I do not express any opinion, but will wait till all the evidence is in. Then I'll giv you all I got. I hav been at the Banner of Light office to-day, and a friend there has brought me to see Mr. Coxe, a blind medium at No. 30 Worcester square.

I want you to feel that I am doing all I can. I am talking and getting private experiences when not visiting mediums. I am in excellent health and spirits, and find plenty of good friends. ELMINA.

WE can imagin the man who "denies his soul immortal" replying: "It is quite possible that you would be a knave, and love yourself alone, if it were not for your belief in immortality; but you are not to force upon me what would result from your own utter want of moral emotion. I am just and honest, not because I expect to liv in another world, but because, having felt the pain of injustice and dishonesty toward myself, I hav a fellow-feeling with other men, who would suffer the same pain if I were unjust or dishonest toward them. Why should I giv my neighbor short weight in this world, because there is not another world in which I should hav nothing to weigh out to him? I am honest, because I do not like to inflict evil on others in this life, not because I am afraid of evil to myself in another. The fact is, I do not love myself alone, whatever logical necessity there may be for that conclusion in your mind. I hav a tender love for my wife, and children, and friends, and through that love I sympathize with like affections in other men. It is a pang to me to witness the suffering of a fellow-being; and I feel his suffering the more acutely because he is mortal, because his life is so short, and I would hav it, if possible, filled with happiness and not misery. Through my union and fellowship with the men and women I hav seen, I feel a like though a fainter sympathy with those I hav not seen; I am able so to liv in imagination with the generations to come that their good is not alien to me, and is a stimulus to me to labor for ends which may not benefit myself, but will benefit them. It is possible that you might prefer to 'liv the brute,' to sell your country, or to slay your father, if you were not afraid of some disagreeable consequences from the criminal laws of another world; but, even if I could conceive no motiv but my own worldly interest or the gratification of my animal desires, I hav not observed that beastliness, treachery, and parricide are the direct way to happiness and comfort on earth."—Christian Union.

To the Freethinkers of Canada.

The constitution of the Freethought Association of Canada declares that an annual convention of Canadian Freethinkers shall be held at Toronto, on the second Saturday in December, and following days. In accordance with this declaration, the central executiv of the said association hereby earnestly invites all Freethinkers throughout the dominion to attend our next convention, to be held in Toronto, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, December 13th, 14th, and 15th of the present year.

We hav every reason to believe that this Convention will surpass any of its predecessors in its importance and its general influence. Never was Freethought so advanced as it is to-day, and never were its adherents so numerous. It is, therefore, our imperativ duty to be extra vigilant in the organization of the increased and increasing elements at our command. Freethought having won such an extensiv public recognition, it devolves upon us to enforce the truth, in a methodical manner, that it is only through acting up to its principles that mental freedom can become a reality.

We hav Mr. Charles Watts with us, who is a gentleman not only able to expound our principles, but who is also equally capable of defending them from the attacks and misrepresentations of their opponents. He, with Mr. S. P. Putnam, of New York, secretary of the National Liberal League, will be present at the Convention, and both gentlemen will take an activ part in the proceedings. Efforts are now being made to induce America's greatest orator, Robert G. Ingersoll, who is the president of the National Liberal League, and other great American Freethinkers to attend. We hope, therefore, that every Freethinker in Canada will do his and her best to be present at this important gathering.

The Executiv wish it to be distinctly understood that this appeal is made to all Freethinkers of the various provinces, whether they belong to any local organization or not.

Intimation from friends intending to be present, and all communications relating to the Convention, should be sent direct to the Corresponding Secretary J. A. Risser, 9 Grand Opera House, Toronto, Canada.

The officers of the Freethought Association of Canada are: J. Ick Evans, president; R. B. Butland, treasurer; J. A. Risser, corresponding secretary. Central Executiv Committee: G. Piddington, J. Taylor, A. Earsman, W. B. Cooke, W. Dillon, F. Strange.

Bitter Confessions by a Protestant.

The Rev. D. L. Leonard, of Salt Lake City, publishes in the Independent a somewhat striking article on the "Sources of Supply for Mormon Recruits." In the course of the communication these facts are set forth:

"But not only must Protestantism bear the reproach of giving birth and growth to Mormonism, the shame and curse is also American. The assertion is often made that the monstrosity is an exotic, an importation from the old world, and especially that the pollutions of polygamy may justly be charged to the English, Swedes, and Danes. But not so. Facts compel a conclusion far less flattering. Smith and his system are essentially a New World product. More disgusting still, we hav here an obnoxious plant which sprang from Puritan seed, though it first took root in the Empire state, and, by a strange coincidence, in a region lying between the birthplace of the Rochester rappings and the seat of the Oneida Community. And, worst of all, Mormonism is to be reckoned as the monstrous outcome of that series of most powerful revivals which prevailed from Utica westward during the first decades of the century. It had also much in common with the great Campbellite movement, which antedated it only by five or ten years, and from which it received a large number of important accessions. When Sidney Rigdon joined his fortunes to those of Joseph Smith, and became at once the Corypheus of the organization, he was only an advanced disciple of Alexander Campbell. Millerism and Shakerism were also near relativs and neighbors. Probably between seventy and eighty per cent of the converts gathered during the first ten years (1830–'40) were baptized in the Eastern states, New York, or the Western Reserve Ohio; and at least ninety per cent were of New England descent. In 1853, a reliable authority stated that, in Salt Lake City, about one-third and in the territory one-fourth, were American born; but that these held all the power, all the offices in state and church; and another declared that the principal men were from New York and New England, chiefly from western New York, though their parents were from east of the Hudson. In 1860, out of a population in Utah of some 70,000, it is affirmed that 10,000 were born in New York and 20,000 in New England; while in the legislature of thirty-six members, thirteen were born in New York, six in Massachusetts, and five in Vermont. In a recent editorial, the official church paper states that 'of twenty-eight men constituting the general authorities of the church, twenty-four were born in the United States, and eighteen were of New England birth or origin. Of twenty-seven 'Stakes of Zion,' twenty hav presidents born under the Stars and Stripes, and a large majority of New England parentage. The founders were mostly descendants of the Pilgrim fathers; the leading minds are nearly all of Puritan blood.'"

Toronto Notes.

On Sunday morning last Charles Watts addressed the members of the Toronto Secular Society on the necessity of Secular organization, the best methods for accomplishing this purpose, and the imperativ necessity for an accompanying rectitude of conduct. Human nature is infinit in the variety of its development. Secularism must provide for its many-sided aspects. Classes for the study of the sciences are paramount in importance, for science is the rock on which Secularism is based. Recreativ amusements constitute the graces and pleasures of human existence—Secularists must cultivate them—for Secularism is the science of a useful and pleasurable human life, socially, physically, morally, and intellectually. Classes for music, dancing, elocution, and the drama, etc., etc., are all necessary, and pleasant, and useful in a variety of ways. But all these must be subsidiary to science, which is the ground work of Secularism, as these are the amusements. It is well to follow the example of the good Freethinker of old, the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, and, before retiring to rest at night, devote a few minutes to self-examination as to rectitude of conduct, or otherwise, during the past day, and regulate our actions of to-morrow by the moral failures and successes of to-day, for excellence of moral conduct is the great end and aim of Secularism.

On Friday, October 4th, Mr. Watts lectured at Simcoe; this week he lectures at Oshawa, on Monday; Lindsay, on Tuesday; Welland and other places during the week.

The Toronto daily World very aptly remarks: "Doctors differ, doctors of divinity as well as doctors of medicin. Dr. Talmage of Brooklyn says that no sane man who is not an Infidel commits suicide. Mgr. Capel holds that three-fourths of the persons killing themselvs are morally and mentally responsible for the dreadful act. Consequently the suicides are all sane Infidels."

Now, if three-fourth of the suicides daily occurring are the acts of sane Infidels—Infidelity must be making terrible progress. And we submit that the responsibility rests upon teachers and preachers like Talmage and Capel, whose lives and talents are supposed to be devoted to resisting the progress of Infidelity.

On Sunday night last Charles Watts lectured in Albert Hall. The audience swarmed into the auditorium and crowded every part of it—hungering and thirsting after scientific Materialism. Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters—come to the perennial streams of scientific knowledge—yea, come buy wisdom (which is the outcome of observation, experience, and reflection) without money, and without price. All ye that love light rather than darkness, leave the night of Christian bigotry, ignorance, and superstition—come to the benign light of scientific investigation and demonstration. Come unto reason and knowledge, all ye that are weary and heavy laden (by priestcraft and intolerance), and you shall find that they will giv you rest.

The daily Toronto World says that Charles Watts and a delegation from the Toronto Secular Society visited Alton on Saturday to assist at the funeral of the late Mathew Algie A large number of neighbors and friends from a distance assembled to pay their last respects to the deceased. The ceremony took place at the grave, and was conducted wholly in accordance with the principles of the Secular faith. It was deceased's last request that his brother William would say a few words over his dead body. William Algie delivered an address that deeply touched the hearts of all present, and made impressions that will be long remembered. Charles Watts followed with a few feeling and impressiv remarks. The "Foresters," who marched in a body to the grave, then concluded the ceremony by reading a part of the burial service contained in their ritual.

The burden of the theme of the apostle of Albert Hall on Sunday night was: Scientific knowledge is the civilizer of Christianity. The Christian faith without scientific knowledge is barbarism. Christianity represents ignorance; civilization represents knowledge. Mankind, when in a state of gross and benighted ignorance, may accept and submit to the tomfooleries of Christianity, but if the light of scientific investigation and demonstration break in on their Christian darkness, then the shams, the delusions, the frauds, and the trash of orthodoxy can no longer blind them.

The Hamilton Palladium says in a sermon last Sunday, the Rev. John Burken, Congregational minister of Toronto, dealt with the subject of land reform, and enjoined the view that the land belongs to the whole people. The essential difference between land and any other kind of property is that land, like air, is absolutely essential to life. Deprive a man of the product of land, and he dies. Personal property, when honorably attained, is accumulated labor, but land must in some sense be regarded as the direct heritage of every man. No power could giv sustenance to man except such as was derived from the earth. The inference is inevitable that every man has an inviolable right to some share of the earth as well as the air he breathes. It is the hypocrisy of the church on such questions, and its evident leaning to the side of wealth and power and authority that has disgusted and driven off many thinking persons. It is largely felt that the poor are not wanted in our fashionable churches, that their presence is regarded as an intrusion, and that the whole spirit of the modern form of Christianity is against democracy and the rights of the laboring and producing classes of the community. Secularism is in the fullest sympathy with the masses on all questions of social reform, which Christianity endeavors to strangle. The Christian church in our day is a time-server, the hireling of monopolists, the privileged classes, and plutocracy in general.

The Oshawa Vindicator in speaking of Mr. Watts's lecture in that town, says: "Those who attended had reason to be delighted with the speaker's ability and eloquence. Mr. Watts is a fluent, systematic, and logical speaker, presenting his opinions and arguments in a very interesting manner, and in the strongest possible light. His utterances against Christianity were frequently applauded by that part of the audience in sympathy with his views. Mr. C. J. Arthur, the chairman, in introducing Mr. Watts, said he was not in accord with the views of Charles Watts, but was a firm believer in Christianity. At the close of the lecture, a debate took place between Charles Watts and the Rev. Mr. Sharey. The debate was most interesting, both gentlemen doing themselvs great credit by their kindly manners, and the entire absence of all personal feeling."

The Toronto clergy hav many faults, but they possess one cardinal virtue—that is, a motherly care for the personal welfare of their God; knowing him to be constitutionally weak in the back, they nervously keep him off the platform where, unprotected, he would hav to toe the scratch in front of the burley, muscular athlete, Charles Watts, who, if they fought by the Marquis of Queensberry's rules, would probably knock their ricksty god out of time. Children's Corner.

Poor Bess.

ATCHISON, KAN.

MISS WIXON: The TRUTH SEEKER boys and girls, I know, greatly admire the poem sent by Elliott Preston, entitled, "Only a Dog." I inclose a companion-piece eulogistic of that other faithful friend of man, the horse.

J. E. REMSBURG.

"Yesterday we buried my pretty brown mare under the wild cherry-tree. End of poor Bess."

When a human being dies,
Seeming scarce so good or wise,
Scarce so high in scale of mind
As the horse he leaves behind,
"Lo!" we cry, "the fleeting spirit
Doth a newer garb inherit;
Through eternity doth soar,
Growing, greatening evermore."

But our beautiful dumb creatures
Yield their gentle, generous natures,
With their mute appealing eyes,
Haunted by earth's mysteries,
Wistfully upon us cast,
Loving, trusting to the last;
And we arrogantly say,
"They hav lived their little day;
Nothing of them but was clay."

Has all perished? Was no mind
In that graceful form enshrined?
Can the love that filled those eyes
With most eloquent replies,
When the glossy head, close pressing,
Grateful met your hand's caressing;
Can the mute intelligence,
Baffling oft our human sense
With strange wisdom, buried be
Under the wild cherry-tree?
Are these elements that can spring
In a daisy's blossoming?
Or in long dark grasses wave
Plume-like o'er your favorit's grave?
Can they liv in us and fade
In all else that hath been made?
Is there aught of harm, believing
That, some newer form receiving,
They may find a wider sphere,
Liv a larger life than here?
That the meek, appealing eyes,
Haunted by strange mysteries,
Find a more extended field,
To new destinies unsealed;
Or that in the ripened prime
Of some far-off summer-time,
Ranging that unknown domain,
We may find our pets again?

HELEN BARRON BOSTWICK.

An Incident.

People in the country hav no idea of the cramping, makeshift, and pinching times that many in large cities hav to be put up with in order to get along from day to day. The squalid poverty that infests garrets, damp cellars, filthy courts and alleys, is beyond description, but that is not seen by most persons; we see only the street poverty, which is bad enough.

There are plenty of little boys and girls that are obliged to liv on one meal a day, and sometimes a stray bit, maybe, picked up, in the shape of decayed fruit. Many hav nothing else to do but to look around fruit stands, and when they see a black-coated banana will say, "Mister, won't you giv me that banana?" If the banana is pretty poor, and the proprietor is not hungry himself, the boy may get it.

I chanced to go into a restaurant one time in company with a gentleman whom I soon found to be a strict church-member. He believed in prayer. Everything he put into his body must first be blessed by calling the Lord's attention to the fact that he was about to eat, and wanted to thank him for it.

We sat at the same table, and ordered our fare, and quite naturally got into a general conversation while waiting to hav it served. By this means I soon took his theological measure.

While sitting thus, a boy seated himself on the top step of the basement stairs, and remained there while we ate our meal. I saw that the lad enjoyed the savory smell which was passing up and out of the room, and remarked that he must be hungry; but my pious neighbor paid no attention to the remark. I suppose he took it as an invitation to him to offer the boy something to eat, and that is just what I meant. I wanted to see how much faith he had in his own prayer. The lad still sat there, and we proceeded with our meal. At last, I said to myself, "My man, I will hit you a little harder this time." And I remarked, "What a pity there are so many poor hungry children in the city! They seem almost God-forsaken; no one to provide for them and no one to care for them." He was getting uneasy at this, and remarked, "Well, if you were to giv that boy a square meal, he would not thank you for it!" "That may be," said I, "and I would not care whether he did or not; I would not giv it to him merely to be thanked." By this time I was beginning to think less and less of the man. I thought, "You may be a professing and praying Christian, but you are a selfish and unfeeling man, and I will show you that you are not right."

Just then another boy came by and grabbed the first boy's cap and threw it away so that he had to rise up to get it. At this he became much enraged, and uttered a spanking big oath. His anger was occasioned because he was enjoying the good smell and was thus rudely disturbed by the other and larger boy.

"There!" said my pious neighbor, "hear that! Is it any wonder that God lets such hunger and thirst? What profanity! it is shocking!" "No," continued he, "I would not giv food to encourage such unthankful lads as that—he is not deserving of a mouthful."

"My friend, you are altogether wrong; he deserves our sympathy, and I am going to giv him one good meal, at any rate, right or wrong," said I. I rapped on my table and beckoned the boy to hav a seat at the next table. I told the waiter to giv the boy anything he wanted—"Giv him as much as he can eat," said I.

I noted the effect on the man of God. He never spoke another word to me, but gobbled up, in a great hurry, the balance of his meal, and sat like a mean, sneaking, greedy, and selfish man that he was; and when he got through, picked up his hat and left me to enjoy my new-made acquaintance, without saying good-bye. I hope my rebuke went deep into his cowardly heart, so that he felt as meanly as he had acted.

People who can enjoy food while hungry ones are standing close by, are in a very low state, and need the touch of poverty to make them appreciate the wants of others.

A religion that does not take humanity for humanity's sake, and without asking any questions, is not worth having. We should feed the hungry and clothe the naked, not those who are religious. It is a bad time to discuss religion with a man that is drowning. The one central principle of life should be to cultivate a love for universal humanity.

"I'm Coming, Mother."

In San Jose, California, not many days ago, one Mrs. William Kennedy was making anxious search for her little four-year-old, curly-headed son, who had disappeared for the moment from the family door yard. Hurrying through the streets, looking and inquiring for the little runaway, her attention was directed to a crowd of people who were gazing, white and silent with awe, at a huge windmill tank, against which a long ladder was leaning. The eyes of the woman followed the gaze of the crowd, and this is what she saw: Eighty feet from the ground, holding on by his chubby legs and one arm, could be seen the little fellow, extending his free hand toward some pigeons that were perched almost within his reach. His awful peril had stunned and stilled the helpless group beneath, which now parted as the mother came swiftly toward the scene. Then her firm, quiet voice was heard raised that the child might hear: "Come down, Carl, and mamma will giv you a peach." The child heard, and looking over his shoulder perceived his mother. Instantly he began to descend, carefully, clinging, round by round, and as he neared the last, he smiled at the upturned face of his mother and said, "I'm coming, mother," and in another moment was in her arms. And then that crowd separated into small parties of one each, and melted into the distance, leaving behind them only an indistinct memory of moistened eyes and fluttering pocket handkerchiefs.—*N. Y. Correspondence.

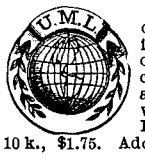
BEAR LAKE, MANISTEE CO., MICH., Sept. 28, 1884.



DEAR MISS WIXON: . . You will like to know something of my new home. Bear Lake is in the northwestern part of Manistee Co. It is pleasant little village on a lake of the same name. When you leave Detroit you go on the Flint and Pere Marquette railroad to Manistee. At the last-named place you take a steamer and sail about two hours on Lake Michigan, until you reach Pierport, where the cars meet you and carry you to Bear Lake, only about four or five miles. It is delightful here, and the people are as wideawake as they can be. It seems so different from the East. It is decidedly a Butler place, but everyone turns out to hear Democrats or Republicans. About thirty women hav joined the Butler Club. The women express their opinions fearlessly, and engage in debates and discussions with the gentlemen. There is a literary club, a temperance society called the "Red Ribbon Club," the Good Templars, and last, but not least, a Woman's Suffrage society, which meet once in two weeks. The people read and are very intelligent. The country in this region is the grand hunting-ground of the state. We had some very nice venison for dinner yesterday. It seemed quite a luxury to me. The plums are truly wonderful, so many varieties and so luscious. I never had such a feast before. Apples, potatoes, and grapes abound, but corn, beans, and small vegetables do not do well, the summer is so short. I never saw such little, spindling corn eaten at home as you hav offered you here. The State Agricultural Fair for Manistee Co. was held here last week.

I think I shall like very much. I am a little surprised to think I should hav been led among such pleasant people.

With much love, I remain,
Your friend, H.

Communications.

A Transferred Discussion.

To the Public: The readers of the Walton county News will remember the religious discussion of recent date between the Rev. Mr. Straton and myself. The subjoined article was prepared as a reply to Mr. Straton's last communication, under the expectation that the News would giv it a place in its columns. For some reason unknown to me, that paper declined its publication. To remain passiv after reading Mr. Straton's argument and exhortation, might be considered by some as an acquiescence in his conclusions, and a confession of error. I am unwilling for the gentleman to felicitate himself on a fancied triumph, and more reluctant still for those familiar with the controversy to regard me as vanquished. This is my reply. A. A. Bell.

Madison, Ga.

To the Editor of the Walton "News," Sir: I see by a late issue of your paper that Mr. Straton has seen fit to read me a sermon, which he styles a "rejoinder" to my reply to his letter brushing away some of his caricatures. I am sorry he thought it proper to bring in so much irrelevant matter, and, as I think, unjustly.

I wish to say, once for all, that I never intended anything I hav written as a defense for sending him papers through the mail. I trust it has not come to this, that a disciple of Roger Williams in this century is filled with such popish ideas that a censorship has to be exercised over the reading matter sent to his address.

In his rejoinder he takes pains to inform me "that he is not a disciple of the Darwin, Spencer, or Huxley school." It was useless to giv this piece of information to me, or the intelligent readers of the News, as I never suspected him of having such attainments, nor did I accuse him in this way. I did not send him anything that they had written, or mention their names in my card. While Mr. Straton is so careful to inform the public that he is not a disciple of Darwin, as though there was odium attached to it, Professor Woodrow, of Columbia, S. C., is out in a paper, in the Presbyterian Review, in defense of the Darwin-theory of evolution. The world moves!

Again, he says: "If I believed as he does, I would probably find in the writings of Hume, Gibbon, and Tom Paine, that alleviation for my restlessness and mental distress which perhaps he experiences in setting these authors up as the object of his adoration." This paragraph exhibits the clerical habit of flying at an individual's supposed mental distress, without any reason for it. He may hav mental distress; I hav none. But if by implication he wishes to convey the idea that those noble authors in any way justify wrong actions, or laxity in morals or in integrity of character, it is an imputation unworthy his position, and is not a very fit illustration of "writing only in the interest of truth, for the defense of the gospel," as he claims. Adam Smith, author of the "Wealth of Nations," pays a high tribute to the memory of Hume. He says he lived above the vices of the men of his time. He spent a useful life, and died in tranquility. Gibbon was the idol of society. His motto ought to be woven in the hat crown of every youth in this bright land of promis. I will transcribe it for their benefit:

"The first and indispensable requisit of happiness is a clear conscience unsullied by the reproach or rememberance of an unworthy action."

"——Hic murus aheneus esto
Nil concire Libi, mulla palles cere culpa."

Thomas Paine was a Quaker by birth and education. He hated vice, and even the semblance of a mean action. His motto was:

"The world is my country; to do good, my religion."

He wrote the numbers of "Common Sense" that fired the hearts of the people of the Colonies with love of liberty. He penned the numbers of the "Crisis" by the campfires of Washington that fanned the decaying embers of enthusiasm into a blaze. He was the "Author-Hero of the Revolution." To know his merits would be to praise. If I had any guilt in my heart, goading me to mental distress, and wished to avail myself of a cheap method of "alleviation," I would not go to the writings of the "Author-Hero," nor the philosophy of the Scotch sage, but I would turn to the "oracles" which teach, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow." I for one do not believe that a wrong action can be effaced from a virtuous mind. Character is like polished steel—when once tarnished, no art can restore its original beauty; it may be, and is often, brightened again, but it lacks its primitiv luster. This going to books and gods to "alleviate" guilt, is a false education. If one person wrongs another, go to him or her and make restitution as far as you can. This going to books and gods to rectify wrongs, is a relic of the Greek mythology, running through Catholicism, and tincturing Protestantism with its sacrificial rites.

Mr. Straton's clerical flourish in his "rejoinder," about "spiritual discernment" and the "carnal mind being at enmity against God," has always been old stock in the budget of priestcraft. I know that the doctrin of consubstantiation, the virginity of the "mother of God," and of "election and reprobation," are tenets that defy reason and pleasantry. But I should be excused for want of spiritual insight when it is remembered, as a learned critic says, "The volumes of theological controversy are overspread with cobwebs, and the mysterious doctrins of the church are far removed from the knowledge or reason of the laity, and the modern clergy sign the forms and articles of faith with a sigh or a smile;" while hundreds sing the doxology unconscious that it was manufactured in the Council of Nice. However seer-sighted the clergy may be, there is no doubt that they are, like myself, sufficiently carnal-minded to giv their friends no serious apprehension that the fate of Enoch may befall them.

Mr. Straton is desirous I should say something about Sir David Brewster, as may be inferred when he says, "He was careful to say nothing about Sir David Brewster in his reply, who stands second to none in the scientific world."

I think all scientific men confer blessings upon their race. He was more of a physicist than a mental or metaphysical philosopher. I hav the greatest esteem for his memory. But I was somewhat surprised that the study of physics had not more thoroughly eradicated from his mind the weeds of superstition. He was born, however, more than 103 years ago, and his mind had matured before the "electric light" of Tyndall, Darwin, and Spencer had burst upon the intellectual horizon of the world. Peace to his ashes!

Mr. Straton says: "We would like Dr. Bell to point out what benefits to society hav accrued from the spread of Infidel principles."

It will be proper to consider briefly what are really Infidel principles. It must be remembered that this is an epithet applied by ecclesiastics to liberal and scientific views that are opposed to supernaturalism, just as Christians who discarded the gods of Greece were called Atheists by the Greek philosophers. It is well known to the student of history what dire confusion in society followed the enforcement of obedience by law, the acceptance of the mysterious doctrins of the Christian councils as "divine truth." The mind and conscience were fettered, the manly intellect was deprived of its wings; it trailed in the dust of the dark ages, and with it came the decay of science. Persecutions followed upon one another, until the Auto-da-fe smoked with a hecatomb of victims. The church opposed the astronomers, and derided the philosophers. The works of Sir Isaac Newton were suppressed in France, and attacked by Leibnitz "as subversiv of natural and revealed religion." The conclusions of eminent geologists, as they are now, were condemned in the same way. And every new discovery was impeached, being inimical to the "word of God," just as Mr. Straton now decries the doctrin of evolution, the discoveries of Darwin, and the splendid achievements of Herbert Spencer. The principles that led to enfranchisment of the mind, and turned the investigators free, were called Infidelity. The principle that government derives its just powers, not from God, but from the consent of the governed, was regarded as a heresy by the governments of the Old World. The same idea, carried out, was applied to books that claim to derive their authority from God, with the same effect. It was shown, too, that they derive their merit, or demerit, alone from the minds of the persons who wrote them. Thus the authority of the priests was broken, the dungeons holding heretics were thrown open. The devices of the Inquisition—the rack, the thumbscrew, collar, and fagot, became the relics of spiritual tyranny in the museums of the world. Who made those instruments of torture necessary? The church. Who promulgates the principles that broke the fetters of superstition and religious intolerance? Men of advanced thought! What if they were advocated and crystallized into a burning lens, by Roger Williams, Voltaire, or the polished pen of Rousseau, whose writings made a "new epoch" in the history of the world, and advanced the civil condition of mankind? Society was greatly benefited; it was raised to a higher plane of excellence; the security of home, and the shelter of the "vine and the fig-tree," were secured by the spread and adoption of principles adverse to the religious dogmas and spiritual laws, ungratefully termed by way of derision "Infidel principles."

"Is it advanced thought that builds our asylums for the deaf, the blind, the sick, and insane?' asks Mr. Straton.

I answer, most assuredly it is. I will illustrate this answer by showing the peculiar attitude of the church upon this subject. Sir R. D. Hanson, in his "Jesus of History," has very clearly shown that it is no part of the Christian scheme of salvation to enhance the physical condition of mankind, nor his worldly interest. And it was held if an individual's industry, economy, and the natural advantages of his surroundings contributed to his material prosperity, it was an event more to be deplored than congratulated, as it might prove a foe and a snare to his spiritual interest. This idea evidently runs through the synoptic gospels. Besides, the church as a body holds and maintains that diseases, pestilences, famins, and even cyclones, are so many visitations of God, to manifest his displeasure at the evil conduct of man, which no device can avert. While the immortal Jenner was perfecting his theory and practice of vaccination, with the view of saving mankind from a most loathsome and malignant pestilence, the Rev. Dr. Dwight, of Yale College, denounced from the pulpit the discovery as the "device of the devil." It is a well-known fact in history that while the Christians were mumbling prayers in Latin over the sick and unfortunate, for the cure of their ailments, the Saracens and Mohammedans were building medical schools for the study of pathology. The first medical college established in Europe for the study of diseases upon a rational basis was founded by the Saracens (Draper's "Conflict Between Religion and Science"). If Mr. Remsburg, of Kansas, is to be credited with accuracy of research, the heathens and Mohammedans had already erected in various parts of the world asylums and hospitals for the sick and afflicted, while the Christians were wrangling over the difference of the meaning of Homouison and Homoiouson, and establishing inquisitions in Spain and Portugal (Gibbon's Rome, vol. ii).

Now, from these premises, which I think correctly stated, the obvious conclusion, and the natural inference of a philosophical mind, must be that if there had been no "advanced thought" on the theological idea of diseases and the misfortunes that afflict mankind, and their treatment and cure, there certainly never would hav been any effort made to build costly institutions to remove the ills "ordained of God." The intelligent reader has doubtless heard the same theory of divine government, as mentioned, advanced in the hundreds of sermons he has been compelled to listen to.

I most cheerfully admit that many of our hospitals and asylums are now under the fostering care of the church, although they draw and beg much of the money for their support from the men of the world. The erection of these humane institutions was not at all an exclusiv idea of Christians. A noble example of humanity had already been set by those termed barbarians, and this forced the church to ignore its peculiar views, at least in practice, against a theory its members might secretly cherish, as we see illustrated every day.

Mr. Straton tauntingly asks me in his rejoinder to my reply, "what asylums and public institutions of charity Infidelity has built."

I hav shown him that advanced thought, which the clergy call "Infidelity," has built all our hospitals and asylums. I will now point out to him some of the special charities of "Infidelity." But a person who is acquainted with the literature of this country does not need the information. It is, however, a pleasure to me to go over the subject. Forrest, the great American tragedian, founded a home for aged actors in Philadelphia. Mallard Turner, the English painter, left a legacy of $1,000,000 to found a home for "decayed artists." A man who has lived or traveled in Scotland ought to know that the great Infidel, Robert Owen, of Lanark, gave his services and hundreds of thousands of dollars for the benefit of the poor. James Lick, of California, aided in building the Paine Memorial at Boston, and besides gave hundreds of thousands of dollars for public and benevolent purposes. Peter Brigham and John Redman donated millions of dollars for free hospital accommodations for the sick at Boston. William McClure gave half a million of dollars, so says Mr. Remsburg, to aid the workingmen of Indiana. Last, though not least, the Infidel, Stephen Girard, of Philadelphia, gave the most magnificent and the most munificent legacy ever donated to charity. I doubt very much if all the clergy in the United States put together ever deeded half the sum for the sole benefit of indigent orphans. Girard College stands as a grand monument of benevolence. Mr. Straton, point at it, and tell your congregation, "See what an Infidel has done." He has said in his reply, if I am right in this matter, he "must confess to a great deal of ignorance." Let him confess. "An honest confession is good for the soul." If teachers of religious creeds refuse to read the writings of scientists and skeptics, how can they keep abreast with the discoveries and charities of eminent devotees of truth and humanity?

Mr. Straton says: "We affirm that Infidelity has a tendency to relax all the bonds of society, to break up all the foundations of governments, and to overwhelm law, order, and civilization with the violence of a torrent."

This assertion, if intended to apply to the principles of Freethought in the abstract, is an empty declamation. Had he been better acquainted with the philosophy of history, as illustrated by Montesquieu, Voltaire, and Buckle, he doubtless would hav written more reservedly, and hav been less likely to mislead the less critical reader. Jesus himself, and I say it cautiously, was an Infidel to the established religion, and hostil to the priesthood of his day. His teachings broke up the foundations of governments, and overwhelmed law, order, and civilization into the confusion of the "Dark Ages." In fact, the corruption of a priesthood, and the oppression of governments, can scarcely be reached by any other method. This "overwhelming of law and order" is often necessary, as the crucible is to the alchemists the only means they hav to purify base metals of their dross. All new experiments, all upheavals, whether in nature or of old customs and rites, are attended more or less with perturbations that shock the mind. It took a "torrent" to wrench from King John and his ecclesiastic vassals the modest demand, the right of habeas corpus and trial by jury. Nothing less than a political tornado can correct depravity when it creeps into church or state. Every gem set in the cap of liberty was bought at a very dear price. It is contended it took a tragedy to purchase the possibility of salvation. But, like the stream that overflows its confines, the turbulent flood soon adjusts itself, and the current flows along more smoothly for having cleared its channel of obstructions. Therefore it is not legitimate nor philosophical to attribute such things to Infidelity per se. It is making a wrong use of reason, and confounding cause and effect. It is misleading the uninformed, and does no cause any good, for its advocates to endeavor to enhance the merits of their system by maligning the just and true merits of other systems and principles.

Mr. Straton, it was religious principles that burnt at the stake Latimer, John Rogers, Ridley, and the immortal Bruno. It was the religious zeal of a bishop that kindled the fires of Smithfield, in which he was consumed. It was religious principles that prompted the cutting out the tongues of the victims of the inquisitions before putting them to torture, lest they might shock the cause of piety by blasphemy. It was religious principles that culminated in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, causing the blood of 70,000 innocent people to run in "torrents" through the streets of Paris, Orleans, Troyes, Bourges, and Lyons, while Atheists were busy endeavoring to stay the fanaticism. It is no wonder, then, that Voltaire wrote, "I end all my letters, Ecrasez l'infame. It is the greatest service that can be rendered to the human race" (Parton's "Life of Voltaire," ii, p. 284). It was religious fanaticism that instigated and carried on the Crusade wars; that sacrificed the lives of two millions of men; a carnage that wrapped the civilized world in mourning. "See what a terrible experiment" Christianity made in the vain attempt to recover the empty sepulcher of "the son God."

It is quite customary for religionists with more zeal than knowledge to point, as Mr. Straton has done, to the French Revolution, and say, See "that tremendous experiment by a nation to do without a God!" They seem never to hav seriously studied the cause and motiv of that rebellion. After a careful study of the subject, it may be affirmed that the efficient cause that led to such a moral catastrophe, had its prime origin in the dissolute conduct and "profligacy" of the clergy of the nation, and the wanton corruption of the officials of the government. The people reposed in a spiritual magistracy for protection, to find their most sacred rights trampled upon. The government upon mere pretense annulled the mutual contracts of marriage. The nation under a "theocracy" corrupted innocence, and set at defiance every peaceable efforts of its "subjects" to redress their wrongs. The tragedy of Calas, the execution of Count Lally, and the murder of the youthful La Barre, were enough to incense a people to commit almost any outrage. It is no wonder that a people who had suffered so much under a government guided by a priesthood should be willing at any cost to attempt almost any expedient that promised an improvement of their degraded condition. It was truly a moral earthquake which was necessary to overturn a mountain of corruption. "It was despotism, and not Infidelity, that produced the bloodiest drama in the book of time." It made way for liberty, and rendered possible a government by the people, and to-day republican France rejoices in the existence of a free government. It is of no use for one to rise to dispute this who is not familiar with the last chapters of Buckle's "Introduction," Guizot's "Civilization," "History of France," and Dr. Sanger's "History of Prostitution."

Mr. Straton says; "Dr. Bell givs us the key to his creed at the close of his article in the following lahguage: 'From my boyhood I hav been an advocate for truth, temperance, justice, and humanity—and the exercise of humanity even at the expense of justice, where the parties would be gainers, and no great harm done;' and he closes by saying that 'any other religion is not worth the paper it is written upon.' This, then, is his religion, a religion that sacrifices justice when no great harm would be done. Now, it seems to me that the original source of justice or right is the will of God. But if man denies the existence of God and acts as if there were no God, to what tribunal must we appeal for justice? And who is to determin when 'no great harm would be done' by intermitting its penalties? Must each man determin this himself, and thus become his own judge and jury? I say that all law has its seat and center in the bosom of God, and the penalties which his law attaches to transgression are exact and specific, whether applied to the natural or to the moral world."

I made no "denial of God," as he asserts, and it is like setting up a man of straw to fight to say so. But with pride I stand by my creed, as set forth above, and maintain that man, the human reason, is the sole judge when justice should be tempered with mercy, and the statute laws of Georgia so declare. When he affirms that the "seat and center of all law is in the bosom of God," he announces a thesis, I imagin, it would be difficult for him to sustain before a body of scientists, however easily the hypothesis might be proved before a convention of clergymen. He adds that the penalties which God attaches to transgression are exact and specific, whether applied to the natural or moral world." This is not strictly true, as could be abundantly shown in the actual occurrences of life. The law of nature is full of freaks, and the moral law is erratic.

However, Mr. Straton's idea, that justice should never be sacrificed for humanity's sake, would be a worthy statute to put in the hands of the Inquisition itself. It is in plain contradiction to the spirit and letter of the right claimed, the withholding of which inspired the hearts of a people to throw off the yoke of tyranny, to effect a revolution by the terrible arbitration of war. The Declaration of American Independence, written by an Infidel, embodying the sentiments of the Atheists of France, flared in the face of the monarchies and the hierarchies of the world the maxim that governments originate justly by the will of the people; and law, instead of having its "seat and center in the bosom of God," on the contrary, "in the United States of America." As a writer in the "Footprints of Time" says, "the source of authority, and the origin of all law, is in the people alone." The same instrument, written in a neat, lady-like handwriting, by a disciple of Heloctius and Condillac, declared in plain terms, to those who ruled by "divine right," that the people had the right to abolish and institute new government, laying its principles and organizing its powers in such form as shall to them seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

The special law of the land makes every man of understanding judge and jury. Before these principles were thundered into the ears of mankind, enlarging the liberality of the age, the officers of the Inquisition, executing the "will of God," were busy hunting down men for conscience' sake, with texts of scripture (John xv, 6; Ex. xxxii, 10) in one hand, and fagots in the other. John Calvin, one of the spiritual fathers of the modern church, armed with this inflexible order, instigated the burning of Servetus for his opinions, although he had sought shelter in Geneva under his protection. And it is a reproach to Christianity, as a distinguished writer declared, "that Calvin should proscribe in Servetus the guilt of his own rebellion!" The same humane law that excluded butchers from the jury box, on account of their supposed inhumanity, would render—and I say it with due respect—Mr. Straton ineligible, on account of his austere views of justice, to exercise a like function. Indeed, having in view the proscriptiv character of the clergy, the framers of the early organic law of Georgia denied them seats in its legislature. An unfortunate example of inhumanity, to appease justice, blotting out mercy, was set mankind when heaven refused to "rain back" a few drops of water from its deep fountains to cool the thirst of one who fell a victim to pride (Luke xvi, 24). In my reply to Mr. Straton, I charged him with being uncivil; he now disclaims any intention of being so, but adds in rather a contemptuous manner: "If an exposure and warning uttered against the defiling and destructiv tendency of Infidel principles, and their dire consequences to individuals of their propagation, constitute incivility, then I am content to rest under the stigma."

Whether he was so or not, I will let the reader judge.

But when, where, and what "Infidel principles" has he exposed that are so destructiv to individuals as he asserts? Christians write and speak as though they thought that "Infidels"—Jefferson; the lamented Lincoln; the late president of France; Emmet, the Irish patriot; the hero of Ticonderoga, whom an English officer said British gold could not corrupt; the renowned authoress of "Daniel Deronda," and Miss Harriet Martineau, an eminent English writer—had and hav no interest in the stability of society, no interest in the state, and no firesides that are dear to them to protect? The reader will call to mind that the most distinguished historians, philosophers, scientists, statesmen, and men of letters, that adorn the age in which we liv, were and are "Infidels." And instead of being defiled by their principles, they stood and stand foremost in the race of manhood, while bishops, ministers, and deacons, were and are falling, like Lucifer, almost every day, with the edicts of heaven in their hands. And one would suppose from Mr. Straton's indictment, that our prisons are filled with Infidels, while the contrary is the fact.

In 1873 Sir John Trelawney, a member of Parliament, moved that an examination of all the prisons of England and Wales be made with a view of ascertaining the religious belief of those confined in them. Here is the result:

Roman Catholics, - - - - -	38,581
Church of England, - - - -	96,097
Protestant Dissenters, - - -	10,705
Total Christian Adherents, - -	145,383
Non-religionists, - - - - -	379

This ought to open the eyes of the people to inquire if these things be so. He can not show a single principle in the writings of Thomas Paine, Hume, Gibbon, or Ingersoll, that has had, or will exert, any such "dire consequences" as he imagins. His fulsome accusation is only calculated to mislead and to deceive the unwary reader.

The views of Paine, Hume, and Gibbon, in reference to the Bible, are, in the main, now adopted and avocated from the pulpit by such scholars as Rev. Heber Newton, of New York; Smith, of Scotland, and the late Bishop Colenso, of the church of England.

On the other hand the Rev. Mr. Beecher, in a lecture delivered in Atlanta, Ga., and published in the Constitution, boldly declared: "I hold that the theology in which I was instructed in my childhood . . . is infamous . . . and that it is blasphemy to teach such things; and the man that undertakes to teach such things that stand in the confessions of faith, that underlie all the churches of this day and age, are misleading men." Mr. Straton may settle this with Mr. Beecher as best he can.

Five hundred Christians to one Infidel!

In his rejoinder, Mr. Straton, with delight, indulges himself in this way: "Dr. Bell may say the religion of Christ is not worth the paper it is written upon. He may attempt to assuage the pangs of his troubled conscience by casting contempt on the 'Oracles of God.'"

This is purely a clerical assumption. I made no such assertion, and such an inference is unjust. I cast no "contempt" on any kind of writings, as Mr. Straton was doing. But I will say, the calling of the cruel and barbarous laws of the ancient Hebrews, and their literature, the "oracles of God," seems to me to be a style of speaking tinged with popery. Read what the learned Dr. Curry said, in his Chicago sermon: "I am awfully shy of the Old Testament. I must say there is a great deal in it that is of very little value to religion. . . Many of the prophecies of Isaiah and other prophets that are applied to Christ, and the church, had reference to the return of the Jews from their captivity." Mr. Straton can settle this with Dr. Curry.

I will take this occasion to say it seems to be a chronic habit with a certain class of clergymen, that when they fail to meet the facts and arguments of "Infidels," as they term men of advanced thought, they fly, with an inquisitorial fury, at their conscience. It is an uncharitable presumption to brand me with attempting to ease my "troubled conscience" in any way. Refinement, if nothing else, ought to exclude such a thing from the pages of polemics. While I make no pretensions to piety, I hav no troubled conscience to appease. Here, I will venture to say I hav been shocked at the conduct of some ministers, who seize the opportunity at revival meetings to pounce upon the most innocent characters around the altar and load them with imaginary sins, calculated to disorder their minds. I hav been also amazed that intelligent parents should stand by and let the minds of their children, tender in years, be frenzied, almost crazed, by such recitals of their guilt, when no such thing was in the child's mind. No wonder our asylum has to be enlarged.

Mr. Straton winds up his letter by advising me thus: "Take the book which he seems to despise, and giv it a calm and dispassionate investigation; and while it will lead him to lament and repent of his sins, he will be able to perceive such evidence of the truth of the Christian religion . . as will inspire him with the most exalted hopes," etc.

I did not say a word in my letter that warrants the assertion that I "seemed to despise" any book. Unfortunately, such a happy result does not always follow a close investigation of the scriptures as is here claimed. He seems not to be aware of the fact that the investigation of the Bible led such master minds as Bayle and Chillingworth into skepticism. Does he know that the "truth of the Christian religion" filled the mind of Saurin, the great French divine, with such horror that he exclaimed in the pulpit, "I sink, I sink, when I contemplate the dire consequence of its denunciations?" That it so clouded the mind, dimming the hope in the breast of Rev. Albert Barnes as to cause him to cry out in a sermon: "I see not one ray to disclose to me why sin came into the world; why the earth is strewn with the dying and the dead; and why man must suffer to all eternity; . . and when I feel that God only can save man, and yet he does not do it, I am struck dumb. It is all dark—dark to my soul, and I cannot disguise it?" (Practical Sermons, p. 124.) Does he know that a distinguished senator declared in the council of the nation that the Bible sanctioned polygamy? Does he know that it filled the mind of Cowper, the poet, with a cloud of darkness? That it was, likely, the cause of the suicide of Hugh Miller and Rev. Mr. Colton? Does he know that an eminent critic, not an Infidel, defended in the Westminster Review a thesis "that no humane mind could wish the scriptures to be true?"

"New occasions teach new duties,
Time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward still, and onward,
Who would keep abreast of Truth."

Gems of Thought.

ANGER begets anger, contention breeds contention, selfishness begets selfishness, and hatred begets hatred. A bad example is as prolific of wrong as a good example is of the right. This is just as simple as the addition of the smallest numbers in making a sum which a child can comprehend, but it is just as true as the most elaborate problem in Euclid. Every example, every action, exerts its influence, either good or bad, according to its nature.—D. M. Bennett.

MATTHEW ARNOLD argues seldom—he demonstrates little; but he treats all the creeds of the orthodox and the established notions of Christendom with a curiously calm indifference, which is almost contempt—a quiet, lofty scorn, admirably calculated to giv spirit and confidence to less audacious Freethinkers. Prophecies, miracles, transcendental dogmas, "metaphysical propositions," "schemes of salvation," the Apostle's Creed (the popular science of Christianity), the Nicene Creed (the learned science), the Athanasian Creed (the learned science, "with a strong dash of violent and vindictiv temper"), all go down before his lance under the comprehensiv phrase of "Aberglaube;" and it is by no means clear that either a personal God or a future life is left standing amid the heap of ruins.—W. R. Greg.

IT is possible to be without position, and yet not prostrate; to belong to no society and yet not to stand alone. If I say we, I know that I am entitled to do so. The we I mean no longer count only by thousands. True, we do not constitute a church, a congregation, or even a society; but we know the reason why. Innumerable assuredly is the multitude of those who are no longer satisfied with the old faith, the old church, be it Protestant or Catholic: of those who either dimly apprehend, or distinctly perceive, the contradiction into which both are forced more and more with the knowledge, the view of life and the world, the social and political growths of the present age, and who in consequence regard a change, a modification, as an urgent necessity.—Strauss's Old and New Faith.

IN vain thou deniest it; thou art my brother! Thy very hatred, thy very envy, these foolish things thou tellest of me in thy splenetic humor, what is all this but an inverted sympathy? Were I a steam engin, wouldst thou take the trouble to tell lies of me? Not thou! I should grind all unheeded, whether badly or well. . . . Wondrous, truly, are the bonds that unite us one and all. . . . There is not a Red Indian hunting by Lake Winnipeg can quarrel with his squaw but the whole world must smart for it; will not the price of beaver rise? It is a mathematical fact that the casting of this pebble from my hand alters the center of gravity of the universe.—Sartor Resartus.

GIV me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties.—Milton.

EVERY Mussulman is taught, directly or implicitly, that he ought to fight for his faith, that he should assert himself as one of a favored people, and that it is wrong for him to endure, if he can help it, a direct and visible assertion of Infidel superiority. Of the millions so taught, a proportion believe the teaching, and a few believe it so strongly that they will rather die than allow the Infidel to get above them in any visible way. There is, therefore, in Mussulman countries, religious enthusiasm sometimes rising to fanaticism, that is, breaking loose from the control of the judgment; and, of course, when dogma is very much preached or events bring the obligations of their creed clearly home to the children of Islam, there is a good deal of it. But there is much less in quantity, and what there is is much less energetic in kind, than Europeans seem, at this anxious moment, inclined to believe.—The London Spectator (Sept. 16, 1882.)

ONE of the most important of the influences of science on religion has been its emancipation from the trammels of authority. We all know what these trammels were in the Middle Ages. We know it was not merely the church of Rome with its dogmata, but the support that the church gave to the dogmata of Aristotle that was the great obstacle to progress. If I were to tell you now some of the conceptions that it would then hav been heresy to question, you would be surprised that grown-up men and women could entertain notions so childish—such, for example, as that the planets must move in circles because the circle was the most perfect figure! And when Kepler found that Mars and other planets moved in ellipses he promulgated it with fear and trembling, lest the church should proceed against him for violating Aristotle's theories.—W. B. Carpenter.

IF circumstances lead me, I will find
Where truth is hid, though it were hid indeed
Within the center. —Shakspere's Hamlet.

IS there anything better in a state than that both men and women be rendered the very best? There is not.—Plato.

A GOOD tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.—Jesus.

CRAFTY men condemn studies, simple men admire them, and wise men use them; for they teach not their own use; but that is a wisdom without them and above them, won by observation. Read not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted, others are to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested; that is, some books are to be read only in parts; others to be read, but not curiously; and some few are to be read wholly and with diligence and attention.—Bacon's Essays.

WE view the world with our own eyes, each of us; and we make from within us the world we see. A weary heart gets no gladness out of sunshine; a selfish man is skeptical about friendship, as a man with no ear does not care for music.—Thackeray.

Odds and Ends.

TALK about parsons laying down the gospel! If some of the reports regarding this class are true, they ought to lay it down forever.

A YOUNG lady who was blamed for allowing her glove to be discovered in a young man's pocket, stated that she had no hand in it.

JACOB served Laban seven years for the hand of Rachel. If the old man had kept a carriage and let Jacob in as coachman, he would hav made the riffle in six weeks.

"NO," wrote a Montreal convent pupil, "we don't see a man over here once a month, but there's a French girl just come who has a dear little mustache, and we are training her to smoke cigarets and swear."

CANNIBAL king (to missionary): "I think that the best thing I can do is to eat you." Missionary (in earnest protest): "I do not agree with you, sir." Cannibal king: "Well, I mustn't eat anything that doesn't agree with me."

"TIMES hav changed," said old Hyson, mournfully; "times hav changed." "And as to wherefore?" asked his son. "In former times," said the old one, "man ate the cream." "And now?" "They creamate the man."

"WHAT do you call your dog, Georgie?" asked the visitor, pleasantly. "Psalm," said Georgie. "That's a funny name for a dog," the caller said; "why do you call it Psalm?" And the boy explained that he did so because the dog wasn't a hymn.

"WHAT," asks a very tender writer, "what can take the place of babies?" 'Sh! Bend your head a little lower and we'll tell you. Other babies. You didn't suppose this year's crop lasted forever, did you? Goodness, man, it will be clear out of style in eighteen months.

SAID a good sister in her testimony at a late camp-meeting: "My husband opposed my coming to this sacred spot, but I can truthfully say that in coming here I hav received a blessing; and I know that when I reach home my husband will receive a blessing." No one seemed to doubt her.

"AND what of this present time?" cried the parson, earnestly, smiting the pulpit. "What of this time in which we liv? What about the Now?" "Now," said the good editor, suddenly aroused from his comfortable slumber, "now is the time to make up clubs." And then the deacons clubbed together and set him out.

STRANGE that so few men discover how bad the music of the itinerant musicians is until the hat is passed around. If you will notice it, a crowd which is perfectly oblivious of the band's discord, will, the moment the hat makes its appearance, say the most cruel things against the wandering minstrels, with a unanimity which is quite remarkable.

"HOW did you enjoy my sermon yesterday?" asked the new minister of Fitzgoober. "Immensely," answered Fitz; "it was a delightful comfort to me, the cause of a great recreation." "I'm glad to hear it," spoke the pleased clergyman "but, sir, I fear you indulge in flattery." "Not in the least," emphatically replied Fitz, "you put me into the sweetest slumber when you began that I ever experienced, and kept me there, too, until you had finished."

IT is reported that a day or two ago Mr. St. John went into a Kansas drug store and called for a glass of soda water. His left eye accidentally twitched as the clerk gazed at him inquiringly. The mistaken clerk, not knowing the gentleman, gave him a liberal allowance of the usual flavor demanded on such occasions, and the glass was drained to the dregs. "My goodness gracious me!" said the candidate, smacking his lips. "I don't see how men can drink liquor when they can get soda water like that."

ANGLOMANIA has got to such a pitch among the high-toned people that bureaus are now called "chests of drawers" a l'Anglaise. A second-hand furniture-dealer on Market street thought he'd fall in with the times, and, for a bit of an advertising dodge to draw attention to his place, he put a rather antiquated-looking bureau out on the sidewalk in front of his store, and stuck a placard on it with big letters as follows: "For sale—A chest of drawers, formerly belonging to Mrs. Langtry." But he did not keep it there long. He got tired explaining what it meant to the dudes who came panting up to say they'd take one pair.—San Francisco News-Letter.

"DEAR, dear! where hav you been, girls?" said a Boston mother to her girls, who returned late from an entertainment, "We've been carmining the municipality,"* giggled the eldest. "And observing the pachyderm,"† laughed the second. "And vociferating the female to an extraordinary elevation,"‡ chimed in the third. "Dear, dear, dear!" exclaimed the mother in expostulatory tones. "There's no harm done," mamma," pouted the fourth; "everything is amiable, and the fowl whose cackling was the salvation of Rome is suspended at an altitude hitherto unknown in our experience."‖

TWO passengers on a Detroit-bound train occupied one seat in the smoking-car. Both appeared to be abundantly able to afford a berth in the sleeper. The conversation between them was not continuous. Each glanced out of the corners of his eyes at the other, as if suspicious of his neighbor. Finally one, being nettled at the eyeing he had been subjected to by the other, blurted out: "Well, you needn't be so all-fired suspicious of me. I am the superintendent of a Sunday-school in my town." "Is that so?" cried his companion, warmly, and his face brightening. "I am so glad to meet you. How much did you?——" "And you are——" "Oh, don't worry, I am a much respected citizen and a prominent church-member when I am at home. Shake, old boy, did you do well?" A moment later they were fast friends, sampling each other's liquor and studying a map of Canada.

Notes and Clippings.

At a Sunday-school in this city, says the Independent, a teacher asked a new scholar, a little girl, what her name was. She replied, "Helen French." An urchin in an adjoining seat sang out, "What is it in English?"

In some country churches of Iowa they sing a prohibition hymn which contains the two following lines:

"Put away the bottle, put away the cup,
For if you don't, 'twill turn you bottom up."

The very Rev. Joe Cook has just succeeded in calling public attention to himself by getting into a disgraceful row with the porter of a drawing-room car in Wisconsin. The trouble arose from the porter's resentment at being addressed in a brawling tone, "Here, you, Sambo!"

Mark Twain has been translated into Italian. A publisher in Italy brings out the works of this chronic funny man, calling them the writings of "Marco Duo," or "Samuelo Langhorne Clemensini." Thus Mr. Twain shares the fate of Bret Harte, who appears in Russia as "Bretoff Harteski."

The absorption of Brothers Wakeman and Leland's paper by The Truth Seeker suggests the thought that there is sometimes an antithetical repetition of the lowest in the highest, and that truth is stranger than fiction. We hav read somewhere, in a book of fable, about a whale swallowing a Man.

Some time since, avers the Christian at Work, a gentleman died, who, during life, refused to believe in any future punishment. Two or three weeks after his death his wife received through a spiritual medium the following communication: "Dear wife: I now believe. Please send my thin clothes and a barrel of ice water."

Labouchere, editor of London Truth, says: "I see it stated that the Church Missionary Society has expended in thirty-three years upward of £120,000 on 'missions' to Jews and Mohammedans in Palestine without making a single convert. The London Jews Society spent £30,000 between 1877 and 1882 with the same result.

It is said that Deacon S. V. White, a bona fide ad valorem deacon of Beecher's church in Brooklyn, has wagered $7,000 on the result of the election, and will still giv market odds on Blaine. Mr. Beecher has labored with him in vain, advancing every argument, even "You're sure to lose," but the deacon says nobody ever beat him in a horse-trade yet, and he guesses he knows what he is about.

Tronjem, in Norway, according to Dr. Buckley, is the most northerly spot in the world where Methodism has reached. Thus the people nearer the pole, in the midst of snow and ice, hav the consolation of knowing that there is one affliction which they hav been spared, and which their more southern fellowmen would fain be rid of. This fact may account for the prevalent scramble to reach the North Pole.

Little children are not always encouraged as they should be in their search after information. "Pa," asked a New York youngster, "how many blades of grass are there in Central Park?" The old man roused himself and informed the boy that the next foolish question would pack him off to bed. "Can't I ask a question that ain't foolish? It's about the Bible." "Go on," said the father. "How many Paul bearers did St. Paul hav at his funeral?"

The Philadelphia Record resurrects this story: An Indian, on being asked what he was doing now, answered: "Well, I hunt some, fish some, and preach some." "Where do you preach?" "Up on the creek bottom." "How much do they giv you?" "'Bout fifty dollars a year." "That's mighty poor pay, isn't it?" "Well, but it's mighty poor preach." The Cambridge Tribune adds: "Some preachers resign on account of small pay, but they never think of the quality of the stuff they dole out. The Indian knew more than some white men."

If one would be a Christian, he must bear his cross: "It's a powerful hard matter for me to keep my religion," said a church-member to his minister. "Every time I think I've got an everlastin' holt on it, something turns up to make me cuss; so I am kept on a trot between the world and the mourners' bench. This morning I lost all the religion I had while trying to shoot Tom Green. The gun wouldn't go off and I had to cuss."

This statement appears in the official organ of the Methodist church: "We hav recently heard of a church so surprised by a single conversion that several of its members said, 'Just think of it! Mr. B. has been converted, and in our church, too!'" We had no idea that things had reached this desirable condition in the church; but if "Mr. B." was an intelligent person, it is no wonder that his conversion to Methodism should excite remark.

The fifty-third exhibiton of the American Institute, between 63d and 64th streets, Third avenue, this city, which opened September 24th, is still open; and owing to the large quanity of exhibited articles, will not close until November 29th. This exhibition should be opened Sundays, giving mechanics who cannot spare a week day, without stinting their family or losing their situation, an opportunity to view their own handiwork.

It is very strange how quick some people will change their minds. A man in Vermont imagined that he was inspired to kill Mrs. Adams, a school-teacher, and after thinking it over for some time decided to do so. He called upon the lady and acquainted her with his mission, when she seized a club and knocked him down, and then broke nearly every bone in his body. He now entertains some doubts as to the genuinness of the inspiration.

A stranger arrived at St. Louis, last week, and put up at one of the principal hotels. The energetic landlord inquired whether he was looking for business chances. "No," replied the stranger, sadly, "I'm looking for salvation." The landlord, who had been born and raised in the place, seemed puzzled. He scratched his head and gazed into vacancy, and then, as if moved by sudden impulse, said, "Never heard of it, sir; guess you won't find it in St. Louis."

Dr. Newman Hall, author of a tract entitled, "Come to Jesus," became greatly excited over some criticisms, and wrote a very sarcastic and bitter reply, which he carried to Dr. Binney for suggestions and approval. The nettled Dr. Newman read it himself, and whenever he came to any passage which happened to be particularly bitter, he rubbed it in with much emphasis. When he had done he said, "Well, Dr. Binney, how do you like that lot?" "Oh," was the cautious reply, "I think it is remarkably well written, but has extremely sharp and bitter things in it. Hav you fixed up a title for it yet?" "No, I hav not," replied Dr. Hall; "perhaps you can assist me?" Then Dr. Binney said, "While you were reading those hard hits the thought occurred to me that this would be a capital title, 'Go to the Devil,' by the author of 'Come to Jesus.'"

A friend of a subscriber to the National Reformer givs a straightforward and amusing summary of missionary efforts in South Africa. The writer is a Wesleyan Methodist, dating his letter from "Kokstad, Griqualand East:" "The missionaries are doing more harm than enough out here. All they think about is making money, and then going home and telling a lot of lies about the good they are doing and the hardships they hav to undergo. The nativ, in his savage state, is honest and truthful, but the moment the missionary takes him in hand he almost invariably becomes a liar and a thief. The conversion of the hundreds you hear and read about at home to Christ is a farce. It means the man putting on trousers and the woman petticoats. Last week, a 'converted' Kafir came into the store, and I saw him put a bridle under his blanket. I followed him out, and, pulling him off his horse, gave him a thrashing. A day or two after this little event a hang-dog-looking missionary asked me why I beat a member of the church."

Roman Catholic priests hav long been in the habit of warning their parishioners to keep out of Methodist meetings, not only because Methodists are heretical, but because their preaching drives people crazy. It now appears that a good Romanist has just become a raving lunatic after attending the services of a Jesuit mission. The Advocate adduces this fact in refutation of Dr. Henry Maudsley's statement that Methodist revivals are a prolific cause of insanity, but the editor loses sight of the further fact that Christianity in all its lurid forms is calculated to unbalance the minds of emotional persons. It is difficult to understand how any one who is not a brute can believe in an eternal hell and not become insane.

"Resolved, That suicide of the National Liberal League in its abandonment of Free Speech, Press, and Mails, adds another ghastly skeleton to the decaying relics of hesitating inertia which mark the highway of heretic bewilderment."—The Word. The attention of The Truth Seeker has been called to the foregoing, with the request for a reply. The editor would be better able to undertake that task if some one would kindly inform him what it means. "The highway of heretic bewilderment" reminds him of Brother Gardner's attempt to "eventuate to irresponsible endeavor," or the phraseology of the Index in its struggle to stick a pin through the "absolute and local ego."

Dr. Blendmann, a professor in Berlin, claims to hav discovered evidences that the moon is inhabited. With a reflecting telescope, he took, it is said, a very detailed and correct photographic view of the disk of the moon, which he afterward exposed under a powerful solar microscope. In this way, the story is, he was able to perceive that what hav been believed to be seas are really regions covered with rich vegetation, and what hav always been taken for mountainous regions are deserts and seas. One can see, it is claimed, with striking distinctness cities, towns, and villages, and there are strong indications of industry and commerce. There are those who doubt the genuinness of Dr. Blendmann's observations, the New York Sun claiming that they contradict all previous knowledge of the earth's satellite.

The Toronto Through Mail is publishing a series of odd stories about the way a telephone girl at the central office is getting all sorts of people into trouble. One of them will be found this week in our column of "Odds and Ends." Here is the latest: The girl was having a good deal of fun with her beau at 104, when 611 dropped, and she stopped talking to ring a reply. "Hello!" said a female voice at 611. "Please giv me Rev. Alvah Slingword." The Rev. Alvah was called up, and Mrs. Beg asked: "Mr. Slingword, what made you look at me so when I came out of church this morning? I felt real mortified, and I would like to know what you meant by it?" The wicked girl had just asked her beau, "Say, John, do you really like me now?" and then switched him on to Mrs. Beg, who was listening for the reverend gentleman's reply, which John gave as follows: "Well, to tell the truth, my dear, I am greatly mashed on you. I like you better than any other woman in the whole world, and I hav a notion to come down there and hug the life out of you. Oh! you are a daisy, I tell you, and I am entirely gone on you. Giv me a kiss, now, by telephone, won't you? No? Why, you tormenting little vixen, I am coming down there inside of half an hour and take as many as I like. You know you love me to distraction, and yet you put me off and won't kiss me. Won't you go to a wine garden Sunday evening after church, so that we can hav a jolly time. What? You are mad? Now you know better than that. You are dying to be hugged, and I am coming right down there to hug you. When I rap four times four on the door, you will know who it is and let me in." When the Rev. Slingword went over to Mrs. Beg's to find out what she wanted to say to him, the telephone having, as he supposed, failed to work, she had told her husband all, and he sprang upon him from behind a tree and nearly killed the poor preacher, and when Mrs. Beg telephoned for a policeman, the girl laughed her sides sore.

News of the Week.

The citizens hav renominated ex-Mayor Grace for mayor of New York.

The dominion government has concluded not to exclude Chinese from Canada.

Forest fires are raging in several counties of Mississippi, causing great damage.

A partial eclipse of the sun was visible at San Francisco last Sunday afternoon.

The outlook for labor is made more hopeful in Georgia by several suspended mills resuming work.

W. H. Vanderbilt has given half a million to the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons.

A prominent clergyman of Troy, N. Y., was stricken with paralysis while attending a theater last Saturday.

The one-hundredth birthday of Sir Moses Montefiore, the Hebrew philanthropist, was celebrated on the 18th.

The Rev. J. O. Peet, Methodist, of this city, said in his last Sunday's sermon that it would be a slur upon God to make Cleveland president.

Blaine will wind up his Western campaign this week, and then turn his attention to New York. Butler will canvass this state until election day. Cleveland is not stumping.

The printers of New York to the number of five hundred met on the 19th and decided to support the Democratic candidate; not because they liked Cleveland more, but because they liked Blaine less.

It is reported that the leaders of the Mormon church in Utah are about to start a movement looking to the enforcement of polygamy on all members of that division of the Christian church. Apostle Cannon will head the crusade.

St. John advertised to lecture last Sunday in Brooklyn, and thirteen hundred people gathered to hear him, but he did not get there. A man who is running on the Prohibition ticket ought to go home early enough Saturday night that his appearance Sunday morning may be assured.

Mrs. Belva Lockwood, the Woman's Rights candidate for president, lectured in this city last Sunday. Her audience numbered five hundred. In her speech she ignored the campaign slander that she cannot make good doughnuts, and excoriated the other candidates without mercy.

The French budget committee has decided upon a reduction of 5,000,000 francs in the appropriations for distribution by the Ministry of Public Worship. Among the items disallowed by the committee are sums allotted for the repair of cathedrals. The allowance of the archbishop of Paris is diminished by 72,000 francs.

Dr. Rudolph Schramm, pastor of the cathedral in Bremen, Germany, and who, with his assistants, looks after the spiritual welfare of 50,000 souls, spoke in Brooklyn last Sunday upon the condition of religion in Germany. The Germans, he said, cared little for church life, and you would hear many of them say, "Oh, the church is a humbug." The result of this condition of things was that many hav become doubters, because the established church givs them food which is not fit for them.

The Rev. Mr. Wyncoop, of Washington, feeling himself in need of more physical exercise than he could obtain by pounding his pulpit, joined the canoe club of that city, and became a skilful paddler. Now the Rev. Mr. Stanton, D.D., frowns upon canoeing because it is often made the subject of bets, and is in other ways a worldly pleasure, and the Rev. Mr. Wyncoop is resting on his oars until some authority decides whether or not canoeing is scriptural. Some light will be thrown upon the subject when it is discovered how often the reverend gentleman stopped to "splice the main brace."

Colonel Ingersoll Catechised.

From the San Franciscan of Oct. 4th.

One evening this week the editor of the San Franciscan had the pleasure of meeting socially Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and the conversation turned naturally upon the subject of religion. The result of the conversation was that Colonel Ingersoll agreed to answer a number of questions which the editor of the San Franciscan desired to put to him. The questions were submitted in writing, and Colonel Ingersoll has sent us the following written replies. It will be seen that the editor endeavored to cover with his questions the main grounds of difference between the celebrated Agnostic and the defenders of the Christian faith.

QUESTION: Does Christianity advance or retard civilization?

ANSWER: If by Christianity you mean the orthodox church, then I unhesitatingly answer that it does retard civilization, always has retarded it, and always will. I can imagin no man who can be benefited by being made a Catholic, or a Presbyterian, or a Baptist or a Methodist—or, in other words, by being made an orthodox Christian. But by Christianity I do not mean morality, kindness, forgivness, justice. Those virtues are not distinctivly Christian. They are claimed by Mohammedans and Buddhists, by Infidels and Atheists, and practiced by some of all classes. Christianity consists in the miraculous, the marvelous, and the impossible.

The one thing that I most seriously object to in Christianity is the doctrin of eternal punishment. That doctrin subverts every idea of justice. It teaches the infinit absurdity that a finite offense can be justly visited by eternal punishment. Another serious objection I hav is, that Christianity endeavors to destroy intellectual liberty. Nothing is better calculated to retard civilization than to subvert the idea of justice. Nothing is better calculated to retain barbarism than to deny to every human being the right to think. Justice and liberty are the two wings that bear man forward. The church, for a thousand years, did all within its power to prevent the expression of honest thought; and when the church had power, there was in this world no civilization. We hav advanced just in the proportion that Christianity has lost power. Those nations in which the church is still powerful are still almost savage—Portugal, Spain, and many others I might name. Probably no country is more completely under the control of the religious idea than Russia. The czar is the direct representativ of God. He is the head of the church, as well as of the state. In Russia every mouth is a bastile, and every tongue a convict. This Russian pope, this representativ of God, has on earth his hell (Siberia), and he imitates the orthodox God to the extent of his health and strength.

Everywhere man advances as the church loses power. In my judgment, Ireland can never succeed until it ceases to be Catholic; and there can be no successful uprising while the confessional exists. At one time in New England the church had complete power. There was then no religious liberty. And so we might make a tour of the world, and find that superstition always has been, is, and forever will be, inconsistent with human advancement.

QUESTION: Do not the evidences of design in the universe prove a creator?

ANSWER: If there were any evidences of design in the universe, certainly they would tend to prove a designer, but they would not prove a creator. Design does not prove creation. A man makes a machine. That does not prove that he made the material out of which the machine is constructed. You find the planets arranged in accordance with what you call a plan. That does not prove that they were created. It may prove that they are governed, but it certainly does not prove that they were created. Is it consistent to say that a design cannot exist without a designer, but that a designer can? Does not a designer need a design as much as a design needs a designer? Does not a creator need a creator as much as the thing we think has been created? In other words, is not this simply a circle of human ignorance? Why not say that the universe has existed from eternity, as well as to say that a creator has existed from eternity? And do you not thus avoid at least one absurdity by saying that the universe has existed from eternity, instead of saying that it was created by a creator who existed from eternity? Because if your creator existed from eternity, and created the universe, there was a time when he commenced; and back of that, according to Shelley, is "an eternity of idleness."

Some people say that God existed from eternity, and has created eternity. It is impossible to conceive of an act coequal with eternity. If you say that God has existed forever, and has always acted, then you make the universe eternal and you make the universe as old as God; and if the universe be as old as God, he certainly did not create it.

These questions of origin and destiny—of infinit Gods—are beyond the powers of the human mind. They cannot be solved. We might as well try to travel fast enough to get beyond the horizon. It is things of importance—to questions that may by some possibility be solved. It is of no importance to me whether God exists or not. I exist, and it is important to me to be happy while I exist. Therefore I had better turn my attention to finding out the secret of happiness, instead of trying to ascertain the secret of the universe.

I say, with regard to God, I do not know; and therefore I am accused of being arrogant and egotistic. Religious papers say that I do know, because Webster told me. They use Webster as a witness to prove the divinity of Christ. They say that Webster was on the God side, and therefore I ought to be. I can hardly afford to take Webster's ideas of another world when his ideas about this were so bad. When bloodhounds were pursuing a woman through the tangled swamps of the South—she hungry for liberty—Webster took the side of the bloodhounds. Such a man is no authority for me. Bacon denied the Copernican system of astronomy; he is an unsafe guide. Wesley believed in witches; I cannot follow him. No man should quote a name instead of an argument; no man should bring forward a person instead of a principle unless he is willing to accept all the ideas of that person.

QUESTION: Is not a pleasant illusion preferable to dreary truth—a future life being in question?

ANSWER: I think it is. I think that a pleasing illusion is better than a terrible truth, so far as its immediate results are concerned. I would rather think the one I love living than to think her dead. I would rather think that I had a large balance in bank than that my account was overdrawn. I would rather think I was healthy than to know that I had a cancer. But if we hav an illusion, let us hav it pleasing. The orthodox illusion is the worst that can possibly be conceived. Take hell out of that illusion, take eternal pain away from that dream, and say that the whole world is to be happy forever—then you might hav an excuse for calling it a pleasant illusion; but it is, in fact, a nightmare—a perpetual horror—a cross on which the happiness of man has been crucified.

QUESTION: Are not religion and morals inseparable?

ANSWER: Religion and morality hav nothing in common, and yet there is no religion except the practice of morality. But what you call religion is simply superstition. Religion as it is now taught teaches our duties toward God, our obligations to the infinit, and the results of a failure to discharge those obligations. I believe that we are under no obligations to the infinit; that we cannot be. All our obligations are to each other, and to sentient beings. "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved," has nothing to do with morality. "Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you" has nothing to do with believing in the Lord Jesus Christ. Baptism has nothing to do with morality. "Pay your honest debts." That has nothing to do with baptism. What is called religion is simple superstition, with which morality has nothing to do.

The churches do not prevent people from committing natural offenses, but restrain them from committing artificial ones. As, for instance, the Catholic church can prevent one of its members from eating meat on Friday, but not from whipping his wife. The Episcopal church can prevent dancing, it may be, in Lent, but not slander. The Presbyterian can keep a man from working on Sunday, but not from practicing deceit on Monday. And so I might go through the churches. They lay the greater stress upon the artificial offenses. Those countries that are the most religious are the most immoral. When the world was under the control of the Catholic church, it reached the very pit of immorality, and nations hav advanced in morals just in proportion that they hav lost Christianity.

QUESTION: It is frequently asserted that there is nothing new in your objections against Christianity. What is your reply to such assertions?

ANSWER: Of course, the editors of religious papers will say this; Christians will say this. In my opinion, an argument is new until it has been answered. An argument is absolutely fresh, and has upon its leaves the dew of morning, until it has been refuted. All men hav experienced, it may be, in some degree, what we call love. Millions of men hav written about it. The subject, of course, is old. It is only the presentation that can be new. Thousands of men hav attacked superstition. The subject is old, but the manner in which the facts are handled, the arguments grouped—these may be forever new. Millions of men hav preached Christianity. Certainly there is nothing new in the original ideas. Nothing can be new except the presentation, the grouping. The ideas may be old, but they may be clothed in new garments of passion; they may be given additional human interest. A man takes a fact, or an old subject, as a sculptor takes a rock; the rock is not new. Of this rock he makes a statue; the statue is new. And yet some orthodox man might say: "There is nothing new about that statue. I know the man that dug the rock; I know the owner of the quarry." Substance is eternal; forms are new. So in the human mind certain ideas, or in the like a man trying to run away from his girdle. Consequently, I believe in turning our attention to human heart certain passions, are forever old; but genius forever givs them new forms, new meanings; and this is the perpetual originality of genius.

QUESTION: Do you consider that churches are injurious to the community?

ANSWER: In the exact proportion that churches teach falsehood; in the exact proportion that they destroy liberty of thought, the free action of the human mind; in the exact proportion that they teach the doctrin of eternal pain, and convince people of its truth—they are injurious. In the proportion that they teach morality and justice, and practice kindness and charity—in that proportion they are a benefit. Every church, therefore, is a mixed problem—part good and part bad. In one direction it leads toward and sheds light; in the other direction its influence is entirely bad.

Now, I would like to civilize the churches, so that they will be able to do good deeds without building bad creeds. In other words, take out the superstitious and the miraculous, and leave the human and the moral.

QUESTION: Why do you not respond to the occasional clergyman who replies to your lectures?

ANSWER: In the first place, no clergyman has ever replied to my lectures. In the second place, no clergyman ever will reply to my lectures. He does not answer my arguments—he attacks me; and the replies that I hav seen are not worth answering. They are far below the dignity of the question under discussion. Most of them are ill-mannered, as abusiv as illogical, and as malicious as weak. I cannot reply without feeling humiliated. I cannot use their weapons, and my weapons they do not understand. I attack Christianity because it is cruel, and they account for all my actions by putting behind them base motivs. They make it at once a personal question. They imagin that epithets are good enough arguments with which to answer an Infidel. A few years ago they would hav imprisoned me. A few years before that they would hav burnt me. We hav advanced. Now they only slander; and I congratulate myself on the fact that even that is not believed. Ministers do not believe each other about each other. The truth has never yet been ascertained in any trial by a church. The longer the trial lasts, the obscurer is the truth. They will not believe each other, even on oath; and one of the most celebrated ministers of this country has publicly announced that there is no use in answering a lie started by his own church; that if he does answer it—if he does kill it—forty more lies will come to the funeral.

In this connection we must remember that the priests of one religion never credit the miracles of another religion. Is this because priests instinctivly know priests? Now, when a Christian tells a Buddhist some of the miracles of the Testament, the Buddhist smiles. When a Buddhist tells a Christian the miracles performed by Buddha, the Christian laughs. This reminds me of an incident. A man told a most wonderful story. Everybody present expressed surprise and astonishment, except one man. He said nothing; he did not even change countenance. One who noticed that the story had no effect on this man, said to him, "You do not seem to be astonished the least at this marvelous tale." The man replied, "No; I am a liar myself."

You see, I am not trying to answer individual ministers. I am attacking the whole body of superstition. I am trying to kill the entire dog, and I do not feel like wasting any time killing fleas on that dog. When the dog dies, the fleas will be out of provisions, and in that way we shall answer them all at once.

So I do not bother myself answering religious newspapers. In the first place, they are not worth answering; and in the second place, to answer would only produce a new crop of falsehoods. You know, the editor of a religious newspaper, as a rule, is one who has failed in the pulpit; and you can imagin the brains necessary to edit a religious weekly from this fact. I hav known some good religious editors. By some I mean one. I do not say that there are not others, but I do say I do not know them. I might add, here, that the one I did know is dead.

Since I hav been in this city there hav been some "replies" to me. They hav been almost idiotic. A Catholic priest asked me how I had the impudence to differ with Newton. Newton, he says, believed in a God. Newton was a Protestant; and I ask this Catholic priest how he has the impudence to differ with Newton. This simply shows the absurdity of using men's names for arguments. This same priest proves the existence of God by a pagan orator. Is it possible that God's last witness died with Cicero? If it is necessary to believe in a God now, the witnesses ought to be on hand now.

Another man, pretending to answer me, quotes Le Conte, a geologist; and according to this geologist, we are "getting very near to the splendors of the great white throne." Where is the great white throne? Can anyone, by studying geology, find the locality of the great white throne? To what stratum does it belong? In what geologic period was the great white throne formed? What on earth has geology to do with the throne of God?

The truth is, there can be no reply to the argument that man should be governed by his reason; that he should depend upon observation and experience; that he should use the faculties he has for his own benefit, and the benefit of his fellow-men. There is no answer. It is not within the power of man to substantiate the supernatural. It is beyond the power of evidence.

QUESTION: Why do the theological seminaries find it difficult to get students?

ANSWER: I was told last spring, at New Haven, that the "theologs," as they called the young men there being fitted for the ministry, were not regarded as intellectual by all the other students. The orthodox pulpit has no rewards for genius. It has rewards only for stupidity, for belief—not for investigation, not for thought; and the consequence is that young men of talent avoid the pulpit. I think I heard the other day that of all the students at Harvard only nine are preparing for the ministry. The truth is, the ministry is not regarded as an intellectual occupation. The average church now consists of women and children. Men go to please their wives, or stay at home and subscribe to please their wives; and the wives are beginning to think, and many of them are staying at home. Many of them now prefer the theater or the opera, or the park or the seashore or the forest, or the companionship of their husbands and children at home.

QUESTION: How does the religious state of California compare with the rest of the Union?

ANSWER: I find that sensible people everywhere are about the same, and the proportion of Freethinkers depends on the proportion of sensible folks. I think that California has her full share of sensible people. I find everywhere the best people and the brightest people—the people with the most heart and the best brain—all tending toward Freethought. Of course, a man of brain cannot believe the miracles of the Old and New Testaments. A man of heart cannot believe in the doctrin of eternal pain. We hav found that other religions are like ours, with precisely the same basis, the same idiotic miracles, the same martyrs, the same early fathers, and, as a rule, the same Christ or Savior. It will hardly do to say that all others like ours are false, and ours the only true one, when others substantially like it are thousands of years older. We hav at last found that a religion is simply an effort on the part of man to account for what he sees, what he experiences, what he feels, what he fears, and what he hopes. Every savage has his philosophy. That is his religion and his science. The religions of to-day are the sciences of the past; and it may be that the sciences of to-day will be the religions of the future, and that other sciences will be as far beyond them as the science of to-day is beyond the religion of to-day. As a rule, religion is a sanctified mistake, and heresy a slandered fact. In other words, the human mind grows—and as it grows it abandons the old, and the old gets its revenge by maligning the new.

California Letter.

DEAR EUGENE: Please find inclosed postal order for fourteen dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER, to be sent as directed in my private letter.

You will see by this that I am at home in the Garden City once more—thanks to the forces seen and unseen—having traveled and spoken in Nevada, Utah, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Washington territory, Oregon, and California, and on the whole hav no fault to find with my friends or myself.

Since my last letter from Portland, Oregon, I hav lectured six nights in Ashland, Southern Oregon, at present the terminus of the Cal. & Ore. railroad, and much improved since our visit here two years since. Southern Oregon is indeed a bright and beautiful section of the great Northwest—full of happy fruits and homes, and will some day rival the far-famed valleys of her Southern sister, California. The Liberals of Ashland are alive, up, and doing, and showed their faith by their works. And at the close of the course, I had the pleasure of organizing a Liberal League of eighty-one members, with J. D. Fountain, president; E. J. Farlow, secretary; and B. F. Myers, treasurer; besides a most effectiv executiv committee, with J. F. McCaull at the head; and a music committee numbering Mrs. J. N. Conant, a very queen of song, as also Mr. Cooledge, highly gifted in musical talent. And with such a promising choir of officers you may hope to hear good things from the Ashland Liberal Union. Our thanks are due at Ashland to all of the Liberals who helped, or tried to help, us in our work; and especially to our aged friend Casey, for not only sympathy but material support.

Some people don't like my old friend Casey because he is so radical, and then he swears, too. But then there are many who indulge in the foolish habit of swearing, as there are many who pray from habit and yet do not mean anything by it, and both are foolish habits and should be avoided. But this is true, that there are some people with all their vices who are better than some other people with all their so-called virtues. I like the people of Ashland and hope to see them all again in the near future.

But I must not forget to mention our friend Kenney, who called us to speak two nights at Medford, a new town twelve miles from Ashland by the rail. Brother Kenney is a true Liberal who desires the advancement of our cause. So much so, that he wrote me as soon as he knew that I had arrived in the neighborhood, to come and he would stand in the gap for forty dollars for two lectures, and the hall rent, too, and my entertainment besides. I only wish we had more of such men as Brother Kenney, of Medford. Many thanks are also due to our friend Hauck for a home at his homelike hotel, during our stay in Ashland, and hope he may be prospered in basket and store.

Fifty miles' ride by stage through a most highly picturesque country of mountain and valley landscape, brings us to Yreka on the northern border of California, an old but once flourishing town in the early days of California mining, and fabulously rich in golden ore, and still has some good mines; but, like most of our mining towns, her former glory has departed. I did not know a single Liberal in Yreka, but I hav a way of finding out things, and called to see the postmaster, who informed me that no TRUTH SEEKER, no Boston Investigator, and, in fact, no Liberal paper of any kind, was taken in Yreka. "Well," I said, "are these people all Christian?" "Oh, no," he replied, "there are but few Christians here." And there has never been any Liberal speaker here until two weeks ago. Ingersoll spoke one night to an audience of about one hundred people.

We spoke five nights here with the best of results, our audience reaching as high as four hundred by the third night, and I am glad to say that THE TRUTH SEEKER and Boston Investigator will, hereafter, find a few readers in Yreka. And, as I hav said in former letters, Why don't our Liberals take the papers? Where they are taken, there is mental life, and, invariably, where the Liberals of a community do not read our Liberal literature, there is a total stagnation and indifference to the cause of mental freedom, and almost a mental earthquake, or cyclone, is needed to wake them up.

Our thanks are due at Yreka to H. W. Frost and family, Dr. Reams, J. Kessler, and others, for kindness during our stay at Yreka. And, especially, we are indebted to the leader of the Yreka brass band, H. L. Scheld, for music on the street and in the hall at each lecture of the course, and hope, on some future occasion, to reward the boys of the Yreka band as they richly deserve.

Seventy miles of stage coaching from Yreka, over mountain and through deep canyons, passing along close by the foot of Mount Shasta, rising fourteen thousand feet above the sea level, looking so grandly cold, draped with eternal snow from whence come the springs which giv rise to the great Sacramento, which waters the entire length of the great Sacramento basin, so rich in fields of grain, orchards, and vinyards, spread out like a panorama of lasting beauty, finds us at Delta, the present terminus of the California end of the C. & O. R. R.

Our country is red-hot just now with politics, which seem to me like a grand scramble to get into or stay in office. There may be honest choice between the two great parties, but we fail to see any great issues involving any great reforms for the masses of our people. Hence political dust is the last resort and only stock-in-trade to maintain power over the people.

Ingersoll speaks in San Jose to-night, and we propose, mother and I, to giv ourselvs a grand treat of hearing somebody else talk for once, as the inspiration of one's own voice gets to be by time a little monotonous to one's self; besides, it is not often one can hear an Ingersoll.

What a wonderful ado our camp has got into about Brother Chainey's conversion to Spiritualism! What of it? Is he not a Liberal man still? Some speak of it as though a great misfortune had befallen our friend Chainey. To my mind it is a sort of sectarianism, and not Liberalism, which finds a victory in Chainey's conversion, and also the same, a narrow view of Materialism, and not Liberalism, in its best sense which seems to deplore the loss of Chainey as though he were dead. How long, O Lord, how long, will it take our people to find out that Materialism in the Thomas Winter sense is one thing, and Spiritualism in the J. M. Peebles sense is another thing, and that Liberalism is not of necessity Materialistic, nor yet Spiritualistic, but may and should combine both elements of belief? I am not in sympathy with any person or movement that seeks to drive an entering wedge of antagonism between the two great factors of Liberalism. This was the life work of our friend, D. M. Bennett—to build up Liberalism, the grandest mental condition, and the highest round in the ladder of intellectual worth and attainment. I am a Materialist and a Spiritualist both. Put a pin in that spot—a Materialist in the sense that matter and force constitute the sum total of all things in the universe; a Spiritualist in the sense of the possibilities wrapped up in nature, and a belief in a future state predicated upon what I hav seen and know about the so-called spiritual phenomena. Now, while I do not hav absolute knowledge of a life beyond, yet I believe in and hope for such a life. I do not feel just right in the presence of positiv affirmation for or against a state of being which to my mind is wanting as yet, the elements of absolute proof to many minds, and must as yet remain an open question. I take it for granted that every man believes all that he can from the evidence to his own mind. If there is no conviction, bring evidence; if the conviction is light, bring more evidence. If, after all, the evidence fails to convict, what then? Will you Materialists and Spiritualists, like Methodists and Presbyterians, damn, or even feel aggrieved at a man because he differs with you in belief? Men do not quarrel about knowledge or that which can be demonstrated. Only those quarrel who stoutly assert and assume that which in the nature of things cannot be demonstrated to all, and hence wanting in the elements of universal knowledge. When a man says that Materialic Liberalism is a bundle of cold negation, and cannot warm into life human activity and promote human happiness, he talks simply nonsense, as he would prove thereby a defect in the economy of nature, as many cannot reach a full conviction of another life, and hence must be unhappy. When a man says that there is no life beyond, and that those who believe in such a state are fanatics or crazy, he is alike open to the charge of talking nonsense. And to my mind, Materialism or Spiritualism, when viewed in an abstract sense, or used for any other purpose than gaining knowledge, drops at once to the plane of religion, sect, and ism, and as such is not entitled to any more respect than Methodism or Mormonism.

Let us foster a Liberalism based upon knowledge, combining belief and disbelief about all open questions, which can in no sense hinder or promote true happiness only as they serve to prevent stagnation and promote mental activity.

I will be at home until after election, when I will again be ready to answer calls to lecture anywhere on the Pacific coast. DR. J. L. YORK.

EDUCATED Christians are now anxious to make peace with the doctrin of evolution, and are quite indignant if Freethinkers suggest that evolution and Christianity are incompatible. It is therefore refreshing, says Mrs. Besant, to meet a good, sound, orthodox paper like the Rock, which repudiates all nineteenth-century knowledge, and sticks to the old, ignorant folly of the Bible. It writes on Evolution: "The sure tendency and the avowed object of such pernicious doctrins is to lead us away from the clear and distinct scriptural account of the creation—an account which has been wonderfully illustrated and confirmed by the discoveries of geology. True, the book of Genesis tells us that certain kinds of creatures were made at different times to others; evolution, however, says that there was no creation at all, but that all life was produced in the course of events, by what seems to ordinary men simple chance, from a single piece of matter. Between these two there can be no point of agreement. That a reptil rather than an amphibious animal is to hav the honor of having been our first progenitor makes no difference in the main position. With such plausibly destructiv speculations, we, as Christians, hav nothing to do; to dally with them under a vague impression that they may be reconciled with true Christian theology is to deceive ourselvs; whilst yielding to their fascination we may find that our faith is being secretly undermined. When would-be scientists put human nature before us in a form which, if pressed to its logical conclusion, would place the faculties of man and of brutes on the same level, the gulf which separates them from Atheism is not very broad. Such writers are responsible for much of the Infidelity of the day. If we accept their teaching, there is an end of moral responsibility; of religion, of a personal God. Evolution can hav no place in the world of him who believes by faith 'that the worlds were framed by the word of God,' and remembers that 'the Lord giveth not an account of any of his matters.' The whole order of nature points unceasingly to one mind and will, selecting, arranging, adapting, and controling everything. . . . 'Science and Christ,' says Darwin, 'hav nothing to do with each other. I do not believe that any revelation has ever been made.'" Well done, Rock! You are perfectly right. Between science and Christianity "there can be no point of agreement," and the sooner both recognize the fact the better for the world.

Against Mr. Chainey's Proposed Debate.

It having been left with Mr. Putnam to arrange the preliminaries for the debate to which Mr. Chainey challenges Charles Watts, the following letter has been written. It was not intended for publication, but as it sets forth in so plain and convincing language the reasons why the proposed debate should not be held, we hav secured Mr. Putnam's permission to lay it before our readers:

MY DEAR CHAINEY: I hav received a letter from Watts in regard to the debate, and he is not in favor under present circumstances, and so concurs with my own judgment, as I hinted to you in my reply that I was not in favor of keeping up the controversy. As things are now, it seems clearly against our duty. We are officers of the League, engaged by the League to do a certain work, and our time is not our own. All our time and all the money we can earn belong to the League. Now, the work of the League is in the line of the Nine Demands and Secularism. We cannot in justice to the League go outside of these and engage in any other work. Now, you are not opposed to the Nine Demands, and you are not opposed to Secularism. You believe in these as much as we do, only in something more, namely, Spiritualism, which concerns not the League at all. So you see there is no fight between you and us, except in a mere matter of opinion which has nothing to do with the main matter at issue.

Now, I guess you will see this as I do, that according to the program of work laid out for us by the League we cannot engage in this controversy, and in this case we must act as officers of the League, and not as private individuals.

But furthermore, I want to say that in my judgment this debate is not only out of our line, but entirely opposed to our plans and purposes. It is not fighting the common enemy, but is an internecine strife. There is no antagonism between Spiritualism and the League. They are forces that work together. Our common enemy is Christianity. This is entrenched in the laws of the land, and is a tyranny. Spiritualism is a belief, and there is nothing in it contrary to the Nine Demands. As a matter of fact, the vast majority of the Spiritualists are the warmest friends and supporters of the League. We hav pronounced Spiritualists among the officers of the League, and in every way it would be disastrous for us to engage in this war of opinions, when in purpose we are one and the same. My judgment and my conscience, therefore, are against this debate. If it did no injury to League work, it is entirely outside of that work, and as officers we cannot take hold of it. But secondly, it would be deeply injurious to our work. It would alienate friends, it would create a false issue, it would be a combat among allies, and at this time we must reserve all our force for the real enemy.

Do you not see how we stand, and that we are friends and not enemies?

Now, whatever Watts, and I, and all of us can do for you as friends, we will, but we cannot engage in battle when there is no battle. I think you hav made a mistake in attacking Materialism. You are just as much of a Materialist as I am. All your belief in spirits is founded upon material phenomena, and without that material phenomena you would hav no faith whatsoever. Your own good sense will tell you this. Therefore there is no antagonism between Spiritualism and Materialism, only as to the amount and value of evidence, which is a mere outside question, and is not fundamental. I think a little cool reflection will convince you of your error, and, as a friend who wants you to do the best you can for yourself, I would advise you to make a frank avowal of this mistake and take your place side by side with us in the battle for human rights. You hav injured the feelings of some of your best friends, and there is deep resentment against your unjust charges. Our philosophy of life is as dear to us as yours to you, and you hav attacked that philosophy in the spirit of orthodoxy, and you hav said, "I am holier than thou." You hav acted exactly as Moody acts. In tht heat of your enthusiasm you hav played the part of a "converted Christian," and put on airs of superior wisdom and sanctity. I do not think you hav had good counselors in this matter. You hav not done what a plain, level-headed, practical business man of the world would hav done. You hav been a woman really—"a mad poet," but not a wise philosopher. You hav made a very great mistake in this—like Othello, putting your heart upon your sleeve for daws to peck at. Now, my boy, I simply wish you to back down from your position as gracefully as you can, admit your error of judgment, make an apology like a gentleman to a gentleman. Act honorably in this matter, and with courage. Don't be afraid to beg pardon when your conscience must tell you that you hav done wrong, that you hav made cruel and unjust charges against us Materialists, against the nobility of our belief. Now is your opportunity to act in a magnanimous way. Your home is with us, or the church. One or the other is your fate. You will not be satisfied where you are. Either you will be in the ranks of the Liberals, or of the church. You can strike hands with us now, and we will march on together, and you will hav the best and the stanchest friends you ever had. You know yourself that you hav had no better, truer, nobler, more devoted friends than you hav found in the Liberal ranks. Why will you engage in any contest with them? Above all, why will you wound their hearts?

We cannot fight you until you are really our foe. When you plant yourself against the Nine Demands, then we will meet you. As representativs of the Liberal League, we cannot do otherwise.

I say in this case, don't let any damnable pride, or personal pique, or anything, stand in the way of a genuin reconcilation with your old comrades. You hav done a wrong: why not frankly avow and say to us, "I am with you from this time henceforth, and will work and fight with you." I write this with all my heart, for I feel that you are in a dangerous position, and may do that which will cause life-long regret and injury. You may not like what I say, but it is the plain truth, and I am satisfied that your cool, clear intellect will so decide.

When I was at Cassadaga, I hardly knew what to say; I felt as if all reasoning was useless in your excited state of mind; you were absolutely spirit-intoxicated, and did not seem to realize the injustice of your position. The matter of fact world seemed to you a dream, this solid earth seemed of no account in your eyes, and you really thought that we Materialists had no motiv power and would go to the dogs, if we did not believe as you did. You took exactly the attitude of Moody. I think, perhaps, you hav got over that fever of the mind and can think calmly and clearly, and see the sheer folly of your course, and its terrible drift, which is to sever you from the Liberal world and drive you back again into the church. This is the simple logic of your position, and I can no longer keep silent in regard to it, for I feel that by continuing in this course you are ruining all your chances of usefulness. I don't want you to giv up Spiritualism. I want you to keep it and make the most of it for yourself and others, but I want you to be Liberal and not orthodox in your mind. I feel that you must reverse your course and that as soon as possible, or it will be too late. Now is the time to manfully admit your mistake, giv honor to the Materialist, declare yourself a Liberal, work on the constructiv basis among your new allies, fight for justice in this world, and so join hands with us; and in that way we can be of service to you in your work, and a broad and bright field will be before you; but we cannot, and you can see that we cannot, turn aside from our chosen work and engage in a controversy which might make some excitement for the time, but would be a terrific blow to our cause. We cannot do it on any account whatever.

Now, you may be angry with me for what I say, but there is not one, not one of your best friends who will not cordially indorse every word I write. I know I speak the truth, and in the greatness of my friendship, so I speak it. It may hurt, but I hope it will cure and open your eyes to the peril of your present course, and turn you back to us, not in doctrin—let that go—but in spirit and purpose.

Ever yours, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Mr. Chainey's Reply.

MY DEAR PUTNAM: Your letter, which you inform me is to be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, has been received. I will therefore ask you to secure this the same publicity, and, if possible, in the same issue. I am somewhat amazed and confused with your earnest and loving epistle. You and I hav of course been too long loving comrades and confidants ever to write aught to each other save in love and true friendship. Still I cannot but feel that you wrote this time without due reflection and stained your ink slightly with prejudice. Though all the world judge me wrong, surely you ought to judge me right. Though realistic minds turn my poetry to prose and translate metaphor into fact, your poet's sight ought to hav led you into a knowledge of the truth. I know a great dust has been raised in the Liberal papers, turning attention from what I did say to what I did not, and never dreamed of saying. But as you heard all I did say, and in the confidence of warmest personal friendship knew the deepest feelings of my heart, I am sorely puzzled with some portions of your letter. But let me take up the separate points. First, you inform me that Mr. Watts refuses to debate. I am at a loss to understand this, when I hav a letter from Mr. Watts heartily accepting my challenge, with one slight modification as to the order of appearance, to which I instantly agreed. Hence, between men of honor refusal comes too late unless accompanied by the apology which it is mine to demand—not, as you claim, giv. I did not open this controversy. You know full well that I hav often suffered under unjust imputation rather than take the sword. Mr. Watts announced he would reply to me long before he knew what I was to say. I advised him against it. I felt it unwise at a Freethought convention to start a debate between the advocates of Spiritualism and Materialism. If when I had said my say Mr. Wakeman had said his strongest word for Positivism without trying to ridicule me, and Mr. Watts for Materialism without directing most of his argument against me personally, all would hav been well. If he had been fair and just in reply, I should hav said nothing. But though he disclaims it, I say he did try to steal a victory by personal innuendo, hinting that I had been converted by a woman, charging me with effeminacy, and pettifogging every point raised. If his reply had been printed word for word, as my lecture was, I would hav asked for no other vindication. The answer he does make in print is by no means the one he made at Cassadaga. Through this failure to giv both sides equally to the public, I hav been subject to all sorts of false reports. I was utterly annihilated, crushed to powder, and blown away; my tissue tawdry torn to shreds. It has also been claimed, when opportunity was offered me to reply, that, like a coward, I announced that I would do so after he (Mr. Watts) was hundreds of miles away. This is a lie. I am no coward. I am ready to back the truth I hold against the world. I hav endured more than tongue can tell of vexation, malice, libel, slander, loss of friendship, and twice sacrificed a secure position for most dangerous uncertainty for the truth. I foresaw also this time much that was to follow. I shrank from the pain, the misunderstandings, the false and evil reports I saw would follow this last change of opinion. Only the shield of courage and sword of truth could hav carried me through the opposition that assailed me on all sides at Cassadaga. On seeing Mr. Watts's reply in THE TRUTH SEEKER, in which he charges me with glaring inaccuracy, reckless imputation, and an utter lack of reason, I felt that my honor as a man, and the truth I hold most dear, called upon me to challenge him to make good his charges, and to giv me an opportunity in a large city, beneath the impartial light of the secular press, to show that I am no puling infant, whining schoolboy, man in petticoats, mere gusher of sentiment, telling a tale full of sound and fury signifying nothing, such as he would imply I am in both of his recent replies through THE TRUTH SEEKER. I do not admit that he has contracted any engagement with the Liberal League that exempts him from the honor and justice of a man, or allows him lightly for policy to cancel an engagement already made.

I demand the fulfilment of his pledge, or an apology and withdrawal of his personal accusations referred to above. You say well when you say I am not opposed to the Nine Demands of Liberalism and Secularism. Of course I am not, if by Secularism you mean the secularization of the state. But secularization as taught by Mr. Watts means also the secularization of the individual. To that I am deeply and mightily opposed—inspired thereto by the hollowness and emptiness of life, as realized in my own experience, when bounded only by the cradle and the grave. If you should confine your labors to the public advocacy of the Nine Demands, I am with you, heart and hand. I am ready to put them into the constitution of any society I organize. But you will not so limit your labors. Nearly all the labors of Mr. Watts are directed to the secularism of the individual. Since employed by the League he has challenged Dr. Sexton to debate on this ground. He also challenges every minister in the land on this ground. There are many ministers who believe in state secularization as much as Mr. Watts, but not in Secularism. Many Spiritualists are helping to support him in this work. In so doing they hire an assassin to cut their own throats, and undo the work the advocates of Spiritualism are engaged in. Let Mr. Watts and my dear friend Putnam stick to the work you say you are engaged to perform, and I am satisfied. There will then, as you say, be no fight between us. Otherwise there will. I also know full well that it is next to impossible for you to suppress and limit yourselvs in any such way. You may giv one or two lectures on state secularization, then, the subject being exhausted, you will seek to make converts to your personal Secular philosophy of life. When I became a convert to Spiritualism I could no longer be a candidate for the presidency of the League. Why? Because I could not afford to suppress the great bulk of my personal convictions, and labor a whole year for just one of them. That is what you and Mr. Watts hav obligated yourselvs to. I shall rejoice greatly if I see that you fully realize your duty and do your best to perform it. But Mr. Watts must prepare new lectures, and change the nature of his defiance to the clergy. You must disappoint the mere destructiv Liberals, who are awaiting with anticipations of great enjoyment to see him back his trained tigers against every form of religion that lifts man's gaze above the dust of earth and the corruption of the tomb. Now I hav sat in the damp of this grave vault, I know how it chills and benumbs all the best instincts of the heart. I know, of course, that when we first shake off the fetters of old theology we are full of joy and satisfaction, and fancy nature beautiful without a soul. But all her beauty is that of the grave. The fairest landscape, the bluest sea, is one vast field of blood, where each slayer has in turn its slayer. Disappointed here, we turn to man. We will work for liberty and justice. But liberty degenerates into license. The man we forgave goes and thrusts some one into prison who owes him far less than he did us.

The advocates of reason tire and vex us often worse than the disciples of unreason. We see lofty pretense vanishing into impotence and failure, while those who claim to be the world's new redeemers, show that they hav not yet redeemed themselvs. Yet reason cries: On and on; think, explore, investigate. But the heart grows colder. The rust of despair gathers on the bright sword of enthusiasm. The apples of life turn to ashes in our mouths. The thought of death is a skeleton at every feast, while the nameless shadow and tongueless silence of annihilation intrudes into every bower of love and joy. We prick the sides of our intent with vaulting ambition. But what is fame or honor worth when the end of it all is to make a banquet for worms? Why sweat and groan to be remembered when we can remember no more? How great the chance anyway is it, even if we do our best, that anyone will wreathe a garland of praise around our memory or our name with the lips of love after the few short years "if a man lie in the ground ere he rot?" You know, my dear old comrade, that thus driven to the wall we hav rejoiced together in the one hope that we might forget our misery in the arms of human love and intoxication of the perfume wafted from the flowers that bloom to-day. You know just as well as I do that here, for utmost devotion, we hav been rewarded with deceit and betrayal, while the flowers hav faded at our touch. More hopeful and buoyant by nature than myself, with less experience of the bitter fruit of this philosophy and the blush of shame that mantles the soul when the coarse, bloated, soddened sensualist hurrahs for you, as he often will this coming season, you still pursue, as a star of hope, the treacherous will o' the wisp.

But long since I exclaimed with Hamlet, "How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable seem to me all the uses of this world. Fie on it! 'Tis an unweeded garden that grows to seed. Things rank and gross in nature possess it merely." But a soft hand pressed my fevered aching brow, and an angel form came forth from the shadows that oppressed me, and led me forth from the tomb and set me free from all fear and sentence of death. Urged and urged, all refusing to take no for an answer, I told what I had seen and felt, and the change it had wrought in heart and mind. I spoke of certain general tendencies in Materialism and also Spiritualism. I made no charge against the first that I cannot substantiate. Many false meanings hav been put into my words. But I had no meaning that I cannot justify and defend against the world. Is this the mistake I hav made? Is it for this I am to confess I hav done wrong and apologize? Let those who feel deep resentment against me say for what. Am I to swear white is black because my friend does so? I do not accuse him, as he may simply be color blind. It's easy to say my lecture was false, inaccurate, reckless, insulting. Let them bring on the proofs.

How hav I imitated Moody, or the part of a converted Christian. Did I tell anyone he could be saved through the blood of Jesus? Did I not preach just the opposit? Did I say to anyone, Thou art the man, save to myself. Did I not lay more to my own charge than to anyone else's. Why should simple, honest confession excite such rage, libel, and slander? Who should apologize, those who told the truth even though it pained them to do so, or those who, out of spite or chagrin, reported falsely? I do not feel that I hav anything to back down from gracefully or ungracefully. Nay, I feel rather that I need all the grace I can cultivate to go forward in the same path. If I felt in my conscience that I had aught to beg pardon for, I do not think I should lack the courage to do it. I hav no concern about my relations. One and the truth is always a majority. I hav no desire to be labeled. I am perfectly satisfied with my position. I am bound to no creed, belong to no organization. I am ready now, and always shall be ready, to strike hands and march forward into the light with all free men and women. If I succeed in establishing an independent church in Boston, anyone will be welcome to its membership who desires thereby to do good or get good. Though I know that the essential claims of Spiritualism are true, I am more truly Liberal than I ever was. I believe in the utmost freedom of thought. I will love all, no matter what they believe. But knowing the joy-poisoning and enthusiasm-assassinating nature of Materialism in its legitimate technical meaning, shall I not be free to say so without crooking my knees and whining forth, for peace and policy, an unfelt apology? My friends whom I hav loved as Jonathan did David, how could you be deceived into asking it? Of course I never had better friends than many of you hav been, and, I trust, always will be to me. I at least am not sensible of any loss of loyality.

Though I demand of friend Watts the fulfilment of his pledge, it is in the sincerest feelings of kindness toward him personally. I think he meant to be kind to me in his reply at Cassadaga. But, sometimes, old habit was too strong for him, and made him simply the king of the arena, resolved on victory at any price. I offer him an opportunity to make the amende honorable, to stop the evil tongue of false report, and the foul mouth of slander, by meeting me in a fair, friendly, impersonal comparison of opinion. Unless he does, I shall be justified in saying, with Banquo to Macbeth, "Then yield thee, 'coward.'" But to you, my dear boy, let me assure you, I entertain naught but feelings of kindness and friendship. I think your surroundings hav slightly biased your judgment. We are both impressiv, poetic, and given sometimes to a surplus warmth of effulgence in expressing ourselvs. But I know how to eliminate what is hyperbolic in your glowing, resplendent, and all-regnant enthusiasm for Secularism, and shall continue always to think of you when I quote from Hamlet:

"Dost thou hear?
Since my dear soul was mistress of her choice,
And could of man distinguish her election,
She hath sealed thee for herself, for thou hast been
As one in suffering all that suffers nothing;
A man that fortune's buffets and rewards
Hast ta'en with equal thanks, and blest are those Whose blood and judgment are so well commingled,
That they are not a pipe for Fortune's finger
To sound what stop she please. Giv me that man
That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him
In my hearts core, ay, in my heart of heart,
As I do thee."

Thine also, always and afterwards,
Cleveland, Ohio, Oct. 18, 1884. GEORGE CHAINEY.

Mr. Putnam's Rejoinder.

No one will hereafter doubt the courage and chivalry of George Chainey; but in regard to the debate, the same insuperable objections still lie in my mind. Mr. Watts and myself are servants of the League, under engagement to do the work of the League, and it is for the League to decide whether it will pay its money for any such debate. Therefore I am constrained to remand this whole question for final decision to the Board of Directors of the National League. Neither Mr. Watts nor myself can take the responsibility.

The Banner of Light, the representativ organ of the Spiritualists of America, has flung our flag of the Nine Demands to the breeze. This shows that we are united in this battle for human rights. I want the Spiritualists with their wealth of hope and splendid enthusiasm. They are our allies. Together we can make this world most beautiful and happy.

Our time for labor is most precious, and must be carefully used. On November 9th, at Paine Hall, Boston, we open the grand campaign. November 16th we shall be at Newark and New York. November 23d, at Troy and Albany. November 30th, at Philadelphia. From thence we go to Salamanca, and the great Canadian convention at Toronto. From Canada we go to Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Altoona, Grand Rapids, Cincinnati, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, Denver, Salt Lake City, Texas, California, and all intervening points. Our time is fully taken up with the direct work of the League; we can giv scarcely more than a fortnight to each state, and must make the most of every opportunity. There is no chance for a mere outside debate, even if we were disposed to hav one. So we will let friend George take the laurels, while we buckle on the armor and stick to the rough work. In due season he will fight as valiantly as any for the Nine Demands.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

From the Chairman of the Finance Committee.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I see by this week's issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER that Mr. Chainey has challenged Mr. Watts to a debate. I most sincerely hope that Mr. Watts will forbear. Were he (Mr. Watts) simply a private individual, of course no one would hav any especial business to advise; but, connected as he is with the National Liberal League, will his obligations to that League permit him to debate with Mr. Chainey? I think not. In accepting, as he did, after the action of the Congrees at Cassadaga Lake, the office of first vice-president as well as lecturer for the League, it seems to me that he thus bound himself to work for the League; and that knows no Spiritualists, and no Materialists or Agnostics. It knows only as a League Secularization as against church rule. For a Materialist and a Spiritualist to debate, within the League, would be like a quarrel between the right and left hands, or like the two wings of an advancing army, in the face of the foe, stopping to battle with each other over minor differences between themselvs. It is true Mr. Watts might become, for the time being, a private individual, and, as such, hold the debate, and it would be interesting to all lovers of controversy; but it would not be doing the League's work. I was sorry that, at Cassadaga Lake, any public criticism by any one connected with the League should hav been made upon Spiritualism, or upon the fact of Mr. Chainey's having become a Spiritualist. The only points in Mr. Chainey's addresses that called for a reply from the Liberals were his attacks upon them, and that might hav been made by a Spiritualist as appropriately as by a Materialist or Agnostic. For the public controversy, thus far, I hold that Mr. Chainey is mainly if not wholly responsible. But that occurred at the Convention of the New York State Freethinkers' Association and in THE TRUTH SEEKER as a report of that Convention, and not in the League Congress at all. It is to be hoped that it will still be kept out of the League. If this debate should now occur, even though Mr. Watts should hold it as a private individual, it would still be considered as the League against Spiritualism, and that, I repeat, has no quarrel with either Spiritualism, Materialism, or Agnosticism, or even with Christianism, except when it is out of its place. Mr. Chainey, as a Spiritualist, has a difference, of course, with Materialists, a subject of controversy much as he dislikes controversy, but none at all with the League. With that and its purposes, he must, of necessity, feel, whether he expresses that feeling or not, just as much interest as ever. And, after all, Mr. Chainey's objections to controversy do not seem to be so much against the thing itself as against certain forms of it which are really an abuse.

The Liberals in a Quandary.

From the Worthington Advance (Republican).

The Liberals of this country, or at least those who write for their journals, are discussing the question of how they shall vote at the coming presidential election. Many of them do not like Blaine, and yet they know that Blaine introduced an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit Congress, and also any state legislature, from ever making any law establishing any religion, or making any appropriation to support any particular religion or any sectarian school. This puts Blaine right on the question of connecting church and state, and hence Liberals like him on that ground, but many object on other grounds. Then there are many who do not like Cleveland, but they remember that John Kelly and his Tammany followers are opposed to Cleveland mainly because he vetoed a bill passed by a Democratic legislature to fee Catholic adherents of the party out of the state treasury. Cleveland is understood to be sound on the question of refusing public money in support of the Catholic church and its schools and institutions. Then again, strange as it may seem, there are Liberals who are Prohibitionists, and yet they are aware that Gov. St. John, their candidate, is a rabid religious fanatic as well as a Prohibitionist, and is working might and main with those who are demanding a union of church and state by amending the Constitution so as to declare this a "Christian government," and "Jesus Christ the ruler of this planet."

Others, still, like Butler's position on the labor question, but on the issues between the Liberal element and the church element, they regard Butler as a hypocrit, and as neither fish, flesh, nor fowl.

For our own part, Blaine's position on the church and state question suits us well enough, while his position on a hundred practical political questions suits us still better.

The Liberals, through their numerous Liberal Leagues, can become a most important and potent political factor, by nominating and supporting a candidate on the simple issue of a "total separation of church and state."

MR. BUTLER, People's candidate for the presidency, recently visited Topeka, Kansas, where he held a reception in Gov. Glick's office at the capital. Mr. Harman, of Lucifer, thought it was an opportune time to step down and find out how the distinguished visitor stood on the question of state secularization. After waiting awhile for the crowd to thin out, Mr. Harman got at the object of his visit. He tells the result in this way:

"I said, 'General Butler, will you allow me a question?' Understanding him to assent, I continued, 'Some of us would like to know how you stand on the question of state secularization. You are aware that there is now something of a union of church and state in this country, and that there is a party rapidly forming that seeks to incorporate a religious plank in the Constitution of the United States.' Gen. Butler replied—rather stiffly, I thought—'I did not know that there is now any union of church and state, and as to the God-in-the-Constitution movement, it don't amount to that'—snapping his fingers. 'But, general, is it true that the Prohibition movement is working for similar ends, by similar means, and that the success of one means the success of the other?' 'No, sir! I can't talk to you, sir!' And with a haughty gesture he walked away."

This ungracious reception has naturally cooled Mr. Harman's enthusiasm for the People's candidate. He thinks that, while it is possible his question may hav been a little "malapropos," he "certainly did not merit such uncivil treatment." He sadly says:

"Up to the time of this interview, and till I heard his address at the Fair Grounds, I had cherished the hope that the Butler boom might take such shape that Liberals could consistently be found among its supporters. All such hope is now dead—utterly dead! Secularists hav less to hope from Butler's success than from that of either of the other candidates. Butler's instincts are those of the Puritan, the aristocrat, and the dictator. In his address he eulogized the arbitrary spirit and acts of General Jackson. 'Oh, for a Jackson to say to-day, "By the Eternal, these abuses shall be stopped!"' Instead of instructing the people how to abolish these abuses themselvs, he hopes to earn the gratitude and devotion of the masses by an act of dictatorship. That is Butler's idea of government. Away with such leaders!"

Bible Morals.—Concluded.

UNKINDNESS TO CHILDREN.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because its teachings respecting the treatment of children are cruel and unjust.

It advocates the use of corporal punishment for children.

"Thou shalt beat him with the rod" (Prov. xxiii, 14).

"Withhold not correction from the child: for if thou beatest him with the rod he shall not die" (Ibid xxiii, 13).

"Foolishness is bound in the heart of a child; but the rod of correction shall drive it far from him" (Ib. xxii, 15).

"The rod and reproof give wisdom" (Ib. xxix, 15).

It advocates capital punishment for children:

"If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his mother, and that when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them; then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city, and unto the gate of his place. . . . And all the men of the city shall stone him with stones that he die" (Deut. xxi, 18, 19, 21).

It advocates the indiscriminate and merciless slaughter of little children:

"Their children also shall be dashed to pieces before their eyes" (Isa. xiii, 16).

"Samaria shall become desolate; for she hath rebelled against her God; they shall fall by the sword: their infants shall be dashed in pieces" (Hosea xiii, 16).

"As he [Elisha] was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the city, and mocked him. . . . And he turned back, and looked on them, and cursed them in the name of the Lord. And there came forth two she bears out of the wood, and tare forty and two children of them" (2 Kings ii, 23, 24).

It advocates the punishment of children for the misdeeds of their parents.

"I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children" (Ex. xx, 5).

"I will stir up the Medes against them, . . . their eye shall not spare children" (Isa. xiii, 17, 18).

"I will also send wild beasts among you, which shall rob you of your children" (Lev. xxvi, 22).

David prays that the children of his adversaries may become vagabonds and beggars; and Jeremiah, that the children of his enemies may perish by famine.

God kills Bath-sheba's child:

"And the Lord struck the child that Uriah's wife bore unto David, and it was very sick. . . . And it came to pass on the seventh day that the child died" (2 Sam. xii, 15–18).

Poor babe! tortured and murdered for its parents' crime!

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it sanctions and enjoins unkindness and cruelty to animals.

Portions of the Old Testament, and particularly those relating to sacrifices, are calculated to foster a spirit of brutality, and a total disregard for animal life. God revels in the blood of the innocent. The offering of fruits made by Cain is rejected by him; the bloody sacrifice of Abel is accepted.

Nearly the entire book of Leviticus is devoted to such laws as these:

"If he offer a lamb for his offering, then shall he offer it before the Lord. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering, and kill it before the tabernacle of the congregation; and Aaron's sons shall sprinkle the blood thereof round about upon the altar" (Lev. iii, 7, 8).

"And if the burnt sacrifice for his offering to the Lord be of fowls, then he shall bring his offering of turtle-doves, or of young pigeons. And the priest shall bring it unto the the altar, and wring off his head, and burn it on the altar; and the blood thereof shall be wrung out at the side of the altar" (Lev. i, 14, 15).

The minutest directions for conducting these bloody sacrifices come from the lips of Jehovah himself, and are too brutal and disgusting to repeat.

The number of animals sacrificed was incredible. At times whole herds were killed. On one occasion Asa sacrificed 700 oxen and 7,000 sheep. David made an offering of 1,000 bullocks and 2,000 sheep. At the dedication of the temple, 142,000 domestic beasts were sacrificed by Solomon.

And this wholesale slaughter of innocent animals, we are told, was highly pleasing to the Lord. But

> "What was his high pleasure in
> The fumes of scorching flesh and smoking blood,
> To the pain of the bleating mothers, which > Still yearned for their dead offspring? or the pangs
> Of the sad ignorant victim underneath
> The pious knife?" —Byron.

A God of mercy, it would seem, ought to protect the weaker orders of his creation; but the God of the Bible manifests an utter disregard for them. When the being created in his own image proved too true a copy, and he wished to destroy it, he sent a deluge, "and all flesh died that moved upon the earth." To wreak his vengeance upon Pharaoh, he visited with disease and death his unoffending cattle. In times of war, he ordered his followers to "slay both man an beast." Saul's great transgression, the chief cause of his dethronement and death, was that he saved alive some sheep and oxen instead of killing them as God desired. David and Joshua, God's favorite warriors, hough-ed the horses of their enemies, and, thus disabled, turned them loose to die.

We teach a child that it is wrong to rob the nests of birds. It listens respectfully, then opens the Bible and reads:

"If a bird's nest chance to be before thee in the way in any tree, or on the ground, whether they be young ones, or eggs, and the dam sitting upon the young, or upon the eggs, thou shalt not take the dam with the young; but thou shalt in any wise let the dam go, and take the young to thee" (Deut. xxii, 6, 7).

Throughout Christendom "man's inhumanity to man" is only equaled by his cruelty to the inferior animals. The Buddhist, who has not the Bible for his guide, considers it a sin to harm the meanest creature. Even the savage kills only what he needs for food, or such as threaten him with danger. But the Christian, whose Bible gives him dominion over the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air, maims and murders in pure wantonness, and after years of patient service, even turns his beast of burden out to die of hunger and neglect.

For the sake of these dumb creatures, would that our world had less theology, and more humanity; had fewer Moodys, and more Henry Berghs!

HUMAN SACRIFICES.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it sanctions human sacrifices.

"No devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the Lord of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed; every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord. None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death" (Lev. xxvii, 28, 29).

God commands Abraham to sacrifice his son:

"Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering" (Gen. xxii, 2).

The order was countermanded, but the perusal of this text has driven thousands to insanity and murder.

That a famine may cease, David sacrifices the sons of Saul:

"Wherefore David said unto the Gibeonites, What shall I do for you? and wherewith shall I make the atonement, that ye may bless the inheritance of the Lord? . . . And they answered the king, The man that consumed us, and devised against us. . . . Let seven men of his sons be delivered unto us, and we will hang them up unto the Lord. . . . And the king said, I will give them. And he delivered them unto the hands of the Gibeonites, and they hanged them in the hill before the Lord; and they fell all seven together, and were put to death in the days of harvest" (2 Sam. xxi).

The sacrifice, we are told, was accepted, and the famine ceased.

The pathetic story of Jephthah's daughter is familiar to all of you. Jephthah is a warrior, and makes a vow, that if he is permitted to conquer the children of Ammon, upon his return the first that meets him at the door will be offered up for a burnt offering unto the Lord. He is successful; the children of Ammon are defeated. Upon his return the first to meet him is his daughter, an only child. He tells her of his vow. She prays for two brief months to live. Her prayer is granted, and at the expiration of this time, the Bible tells us that Jephthah "did with her according to the vow which he had vowed" (Jud. xi, 26–40).

The celebrated Jewish commentator, Dr. Kalisch, while endeavoring to palliate, as far as possible, the crimes of his people, admits that human sacrifices were not uncommon among them:

"The fact stands indisputable that human sacrifices offered to Jehovah were possible among the Hebrews long after the time of Moses, without meeting a check or censure from the teachers and leaders of the nation" (Leviticus, part 1, p. 385).

"One instance like that of Jephthah not only justifies, but necessitates, the influence of a general custom. Pious men slaughtered human victims not to Moloch, nor to any other foreign deity, but to the national God, Jehovah" (Ibid. p. 390).

The church, having received the benefits of a sacrificed God, deems human sacrifices no longer necessary. But what can be said of the church as a whole, cannot be said of all its individual members. Scarcely a year passes without the sacrifice of human beings by those who believe the Bible to be inspired, and who believe that what was right three thousand years ago is right to-day.

Let me recall a half-forgotten scene. In a quiet village of New England live a pair whom nature meant for good, kind citizens. But they have become infatuated with the Bible. They believe it to be infallible. Day after day they pore over its pages. They dwell with especial interest upon the story of Abraham and Isaac, until at last they become impressed with the belief that they, too, are called upon to offer up their child. The fatal hour arrives. Nerved for the cruel deed, they approach the bedside of their child, a sweet-faced, curly-haired girl of four. How placidly she rests! Folded upon her breast are dimpled hands, white as the winter snow; curtained in slumber are eyes as mild as the summer sky. How beautiful! how pure! We would risk our lives to save that pretty thing from harm. How dear, then, must she be to that father and that mother! She is their idol. But that idol is about to be sacrificed upon the altar of superstition. There they stand—the mother with a lamp in her hand, the father with a knife. They gaze for a moment upon their sleeping victim. Then the father lifts his arm and plunges the knife into the heart of his child! A quiver—the blue eyes open, and cast a reproachful look upon the parent. The little lips exclaim, "O papa!" and the sacrifice is made!

You say they were insane. Aye, but what made them insane? And what, more than any other cause, is peopling our asylums with these unfortunate people? The vain attempt to reconcile with reason the irreconcilable teachings of this book.

CANNIBALISM.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it teaches the horrible custom of cannibalism.

"The fathers shall eat the sons in the midst of thee, and the sons shall eat their fathers" (Ezek. v, 10.)

"And ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters shall ye eat" (Lev. xxvi, 29).

"And I will cause them to eat the flesh of their sons and the flesh of their daughters, and they shall eat every one the flesh of his friend" (Jer. xix, 9).

"And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons and of thy daughters. . . . So that the man that is tender among you, and very delicate, his eye shall be evil toward his brother, and toward the wife of his bosom, and toward the remnant of his children which he shall leave; so that he will not give to any of them of the flesh of his children whom he shall eat. . . . The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness, her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her bosom, and toward her son, and toward her daughter, . . . for she shall eat them" (Deut. xxviii, 53–57).

"The hands of the pitiful women have sodden [boiled] their own children" (Lam. iv, 10).

"And the king said unto her, What aileth thee? And she answered, This woman said unto me, give thy son, that we may eat him to-day, and we will eat my son to-morrow. So we boiled my son, and did eat him. And I said unto her on the next day, Give thy son that we may eat him; and she hath hid her son" (2 Kings vi, 28, 29).

You will say that these were punishments inflicted upon these people for their sins. And you will have us believe that these punishments were just. Strange justice! a merciful God compelling a starving mother to kill and devour her own child!

"Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you" (John vi. 53).

The church perpetuates the idea, if not the practice, of cannibalism. The Christian takes a piece of bread, and tries to make himself and the world believe that he is eating the body of Christ; he takes a sup of wine, and says, "This is Christ's blood." Your sacramental feast points to the time when savage priests gathered around the festal board and supped on human flesh and blood.

In the remote districts of Christian Russia, where the rays of our civilization have not yet penetrated the darkness of theology, where Bible morals are still supreme, we are told that even at the present time a more terribly real form attaches to this eucharistic ceremony. From Harper's Weekly, I quote as follows:

"We hear of horrid sects at present in Russia, practicing cannibal and human sacrifices with rites almost more devilish than any recorded in history. 'The communism of the flesh of the Lamb,' and 'the communism of the blood of the Lamb,' really seem to have been invented by the lowest demons of the bottomless pit. The subject is too revolting to be pursued in detail; it is enough to say that an infant seven days old is bandaged over the eyes, stretched over a dish, and a silver spoon thrust into the side so as to pierce the heart! The elect suck the child's blood—that is, 'the blood of the Lamb!' The body is left to dry up in another dish full of sage, then crushed into powder and eaten—that is 'the flesh of the Lamb!'"

WITCHCRAFT.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it recognizes as a verity the delusion of witchcraft and punishes with death its victims.

The God that inspired the account of Saul's interview with the witch of Endor, was as thorough a believer in witchcraft as the most superstitious crone of the middle ages.

Manasseh "used enchantments, and used witchcraft, and dealt with a familiar spirit, and with wizards" (2 Chron. xxxiii, 6).

Isaiah speaks of "wizards that peep and mutter" (Isa. viii, 19).

The decline in the belief of wizards and witches denotes a decline of faith in the Bible. Until a very recent period, those who professed to believe in the divinity of the Bible, also professed to believe in the reality of witchcraft. "Giving up witchcraft," says John Wesley, "is, in effect, giving up the Bible" (Journal, 1768).

"Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live" (Ex. xxii, 18).

Oh! that I could bring to view the suffering and death this text has caused! Nearly a million women have died because of it: 1,000 were burned at Como in one year; 500 at Geneva in three months; 7,000 died at Treves; 50,000 were sentenced to death during the reign of Francis I.; 100,000 perished in Germany; 30,000 were executed in England; 16,000 in Scotland—all because the Bible says, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live."

Four hundred were burned at Toulouse in one day. Think of it! Four hundred women—guilty of no crime, save that which exists in the diseased imaginations of their accusers—four hundred mothers, wives, and daughters taken out upon the public square, chained to posts, the fagots piled around them, and burned to death! See them writhing in the flames—listen to their piteous shrieks. Four hundred voices raised in one wild chorus of agony! And all because the Bible says, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live."

Only five years ago, in the province of Novgorod, Russia, a woman was burnt for witchcraft. Agrafena was a soldier's widow, and possessed of more than ordinary gifts of mind. But ignorance and superstition prevailed around her. Every strange occurrence, every disease that could not be accounted for, was the result of witchcraft. One day, a farmer's daughter was seized with a fit of epilepsy, and in her paroxysms of pain she chanced to breathe the name of Agrafena. This was enough; Agrafena was a witch. A mob was raised and led to the widow's dwelling. They called her to the door, parleyed with her a moment, then thrust her back into the house, fastened its doors, and set it on fire. And while it was burning, this mob, led by Christian priests, stood around it, singing praises to God—their strains blended with the shrieks of this dying woman—dying because the Bible says, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live."

And in our own America the blighting influence of this delusion and this brutal statute has been felt. With the soil of our republic is mingled the dust of murdered women—murdered because the Bible says, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live."

SLAVERY.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it sanctions the infamous crime of human slavery.

"Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you; of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they beget in your land; and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen forever" (Lev. xxv, 44–46).

In certain cases they were even permitted to enslave the members of their own race.

"If thou buy a Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve; and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing. If he came in by himself, he shall go out by himself; if he were married, then his wife shall go out with him. If his master have given him a wife, and she have borne him sons or daughters, the wife and her children shall be her master's and he shall go out by himself" (Ex. xxi, 2–4).

If he desires his liberty, he must desert his wife and little ones. To become a freeman, he must become an exile.

"And if the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children; I will not go out free; then his master shall bring him unto the judges; he shall also bring him unto the door, or unto the door-post; and his master shall bore his ears through with an awl; and he shall serve him forever" (Ex. xxi, 5, 6).

Let me cite one of the laws of the Bible relative to the treatment of slaves—a law which demons would blush to indorse, but which a merciful (?) God enacted for the guidance of his children.

"If a man smite his servant, or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand, he shall be surely punished. Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished: for he is his money" (Ex. xxi, 20, 21).

Here a master may brutally beat his slave, and if that slave linger in the agonies of death for a day or two before dying, he shall not be punished, because the slave "is his money."

Nor is it the Jewish scriptures alone which sanction slavery. The Christian scriptures are not less emphatic in their indorsement of it.

"Let as many servants as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honor" (1 Tim. vi, 1).

"Exhort servants to be obedient unto their masters" (Titus ii, 9).

"Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling" (Eph. vi, 5).

"Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward" (1 Pet. ii, 18).

It may be urged that the term "servant" here refers to a hired servant. Not so; wherever the word "servant" occurs in the New Testament, it means slave in its worst sense.

The Fugitive Slave law, which made us a nation of kidnappers, derived its authority from the New Testament. Paul had established a precedent by returning a slave to his master.

It was no easy task to convince the Bible moralist that slavery was wrong. When the French Revolutionists rejected the Bible, they abolished slavery in the colonies. When the church regained control of the government, the Bible came back, and with it slavery. When Clarkson's bill for the abolition of slavery was before Parliament, Lord Chancellor Thurlow characterized it as a "miserable and contemptible bill," and "contrary to the word of God." The most zealous defenders of slavery in this country were theologians.

The Rev. E. D. Simons, professor in Macon College, Ga., said: "These extracts from holy writ unequivocally assert the right of property in slaves."

The Rev. R. Furman, D.D., of South Carolina, said: "The right of holding slaves is clearly established in the holy scriptures, both by precept and example."

Rev. Thomas Witherspoon, of Alabama, said: "I draw my warrant from the scriptures of the Old and New Testament to hold the slave in bondage."

Said the Rev. Mr. Crawder, of Virginia: "Slavery is not only countenanced, permitted, and regulated by the Bible, but it was positively instituted by God himself."

You say that this is the testimony of interested parties, that the South was interested in perpetuating slavery. True, but where did your Northern theologians stand?

Rev. Dr. Wilbur Fisk, president of Wesleyan University, thus wrote: "The New Testament enjoins obedience upon the slave as an obligation due to a present rightful authority."

Rev. Moses Stuart, of Andover, said: "The precepts of the New Testament respecting the demeanor of slaves and their masters beyond all question recognize the existence of slavery."

Professor Hodge, of Princeton, said: "The savior found it around him, the apostles met with it in Asia, Greece, and Italy. How did they treat it? Not by denunciation of slaveholding as necessarily sinful."

Said the Rev. Dr. Taylor, principal of the theological department of Yale College: "I have no doubt that if Jesus Christ were now on earth, he would, under certain circumstances, become a slaveholder."

Slavery flourished on this continent because the Bible taught that it was lawful and just. To oppose slavery was to oppose the plainest teachings of this book. The Abolition movement was an Infidel movement. The Emancipation Proclamation was a nullification of "God's law." The great Rebellion was a contest between Bible morality and natural morality. The latter triumphed, but the conflict filled half a million graves, brought grief to many million hearts, and covered the land with desolation.

And this advocate of slavery is the idol Protestants worship; this is the book they wish to become the law of our land; this is the moral guide they wish to place in our public schools! In the name of those who died for the freedom of their fellow-men; in the name of those made childless, fatherless, and companionless by this cruel strife; in the name of those whose backs still bear the scars of the master's lash; in the name of human liberty, I protest against this retrogressive movement!

POLYGAMY.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it sanctions polygamy.

The Mosaic law provides that "if a man have two wives, one beloved, another hated," he shall not ignore the legal rights of the hated wife's children (Deut. xxi, 15–17). This statute recognizes both the existence and the validity of the institution.

Another statute (Deut. xxv, 5) provides that if a man die, his surviving brother shall become the husband of his widow, and this regardless as to whether the brother be married or single.

The first eighteen verses of the eighteenth chapter of Leviticus are devoted to what is termed "unlawful marriages." Here polygamy is recognized and regulated to the extent of prohibiting a man from marrying the sister of a living wife.

But there is one atatute which places the validity of this institution, so far as the Bible is concerned, beyond all controversy. Deut. xxiii, 2, declares that no illegitimate child shall enter into the congregation of the Lord, even up to the tenth generation. Now, polygamy was either lawful or unlawful. If unlawful, then the children of polygamists were illegitimate children, and disqualified for the sanctuary. But the children of polygamists were not thus disqualified. The founders of the twelve tribes of Israel were all children of a polygamist.

The most renowned Bible characters were polygamists. Abraham had two wives, and when he died the Lord said, "Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws" (Gen. xxvi, 5).

Jacob was a polygamist, and after he had secured four wives God blessed him and said, "Be fruitful and multiply" (Gen. xxxv, 11).

Gideon had "many wives" (Jud. viii, 30), and it was to him an angel came and said, "The Lord is with thee" (Jud. vi, 12).

David had nearly a score of wives and concubines, and "David was a man after God's own heart." "David did right in the eyes of the Lord." God himself said to David, "I delivered thee out of the hands of Saul; and I gave thee thy master's house and thy master's wives" (2 Sam. xii, 7, 8).

"And God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart"—sufficient to hold a thousand wives and concubines.

It is true the primitive Christians did not generally adopt polygamy. And why? Because pagan Greece had taught them better. It was to her, and not to their scriptures, that they were indebted for the monogamic system of marriage. Neither did the Roman Catholic church sustain polygamy, but it did sustain a system of concubinage which was certainly as bad. For centuries the keeping of concubines was almost universal among the Catholic clergy, one abbot keeping no less than seventy.

The founders of the Protestant church, however, accepting the Bible as their guide, attaching to it a degree of authority which had never been attached to it before, were candid and consistent enough to admit the validity of the institution. Referring to this subject, Sir William Hamilton, a Christian and a Protestant, says:

"As to polygamy in particular, which not only Luther, Melancthon, and Bucer, the three leaders of the German Reformation, speculatively adopted, but to which above a dozen distinguished divines among the reformers stood formally committed" (Discussions on Philosophy and Literature).

Speaking of Luther and Melancthon, Hamilton says:

"They had both promulgated opinions in favor of polygamy, to the extent of vindicating to the spiritual minister a right of private dispensation, and to the temporal magistrate the right of establishing the practice if he chose by public law" (Ibid).

In accordance with these views, John of Leydon, a zealous Protestant, established polygamy at Munster, and murdered, or drove from their homes, all who dared to oppose the odious custom. Other Protestants followed his example.

On the 19th of December, 1539, at Wittenberg, Luther and Melancthon drew up the famous "Consilium," authorizing the landgrave, Phillip of Hesse, to have a plurality of wives. This instrument bears the signatures of Martin Luther, Philip Melancthon, Martin Bucer, Dionysius Melander, John Lening, Antony Corvinus, Adam Kraft, Justus Winther, and Balthasar Raida, nine of the leading Protestant divines of Germany.

It is a well-known fact that Luther advised Henry VIII. to adopt polygamy in his case; but by divorcing two wives, and murdering two more, the founder of the English church avoided it.

The advocacy of polygamy by the chief reformers prevented Ferdinand I. from declaring for the Reformation. The German princes, too, generally opposed it; and this opposition, coupled with the fact that the most licentious sects espoused it, finally caused a reaction in favor of monogamy.

Protestants, it ill becomes you to point the finger of scorn at the Mormons of Utah. Yet with characteristic consistency, you are demanding the suppression of polygamy in the territories, while at the same time you are endeavoring to have the whole country accept as infallible authority, a book which sanctions the pernicious custom. Make the Bible the fundamental law of the land, as you demand, and polygamy will become, in theory at least, a national instead of a local institution.

INTEMPERANCE.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it fosters the evil of intemperance.

While the sacred books of Buddhists and Mohammedans, by forbidding the use of intoxicating drinks, have contributed to make drunkenness among these people disreputable and rare, the Bible, by encouraging their use, has made intemperance in Christian countries frightfully prevalent, and almost respectable.

"Thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink" (Deut. xiv, 26).

Another Missionary Pamphlet.

The interview with Col. Ingersoll published in this issue has been added to and put in pamphlet form, selling for five cents. Something over a million of these tracts ought to be circulated in this country. Send for a dollar's worth.

Ecuador and the Pope.

News from Rome tells of the arrival there of a diplomat from Ecuador, charged with the mission of inducing his holiness to relinquish the tithes for the support of the church now drawn from the revenues of that country.

Previous to the year 1600, Ecuador became thoroughly Romanized in its religion through its conquest by the Spaniards. In no country on the earth do priests and Jesuits hav things more their own way. The oath of a heretical Protestant has no weight, and is not received. It was considered a remarkable concession and exercise of tolerance when a few years ago Protestants were allowed to hold a burial ground of their own.

The revenue of the country is only some few millions of dollars per year, so large a percentage of which annually goes to Rome that the public debt is increasing frightfully, and the government is all but bankrupt. The result of all this extreme piety—sentimental and practical—is that not a railroad or telegraph existed in the country up to the year 1873, and the only college of mathematics at Quito, established very recently, was founded and is officered entirely by Europeans.

Ecuador is an uncommon illustration of the truth of the Infidel saying, The more piety the less progress.

Wise League Officers.

Although Mr. Watts had written to Mr. Chainey that a public comparison of differences would afford him (Mr. Watts) great pleasure, he now writes to us to say that having seen a copy of Mr. Putnam's letter to Mr. Chainey, which appears in another column, he thoroughly agrees with its main points and considers that such a debate as Mr. Chainey proposes, and to take place as suggested, would be unproductiv of any practical results. Mr. Watts urges that there is nothing in Spiritualism, if held apart from dogmatism, that prevents a believer therein from doing good Secular work. Secularism is sufficiently comprehensiv in its nature to include within its fold all who labor to improve humanity, whatever their speculativ views may be, provided those views do not limit useful actions on earth; and this Secularism is sufficiently just and noble in its influence, not to inspire any antagonism between its adherents and those who think differently. Mr. Watts is particularly desirous that it shall be understood that he is always ready and willing to debate the relativ merits of Secularism and Christianity, leaving the truth, or otherwise, of Spiritualism to be decided by individuals according to the evidence, or lack of it, at their command.

The belief in "spiritual manifestations" is peculiarly a question of personal feeling, and no amount of debate on the platform would demonstrate to general opponents the reality of the individual experiences in private circles. Our great obstacle, remarks Mr. Watts, in the great work of human redemption is orthodoxy, and to lessen its evils is one of the principal objects of Secular advocacy, and whoever can labor for that purpose should be united thereon, however much they may differ either upon Materialism, Spiritualism, or any other ism.

We think the decision arrived at is a wise one. As officers of the League, Messrs. Watts and Putnam expect to do League work, and it assuredly is not one of the objects of the League to either establish the rationality of Materialism, or the truth of Spiritualism. No good end could be achieved in arraying the two philosophical sects against each other. In this country they are natural allies in resisting the church. In California the Spiritualists—who are Liberals as well—were foremost in demanding a secularization of the new constitution. In Ohio, Massachusetts, and New York the Liberals—many of them Spiritualists, too—labored hard to defeat bills unconstitutionally discriminating against Spiritualists. In this state, as we happen to know, the medical bill that bore particularly hard upon Spiritualist healers was defeated by a Materialist.

It would, therefore, be the hight of foolishness to raise within the League, by false issues, antagonisms which do not really exist.

A Symbol of the Lowest of Things.

Last Sunday Mr. Beecher paid his occasional poetic tribute to Christ. One of the things he said was that

"He [Christ] changed the cross from the lowest of things to one that is higher now than the sword or the pen."

How many Christians, when they look upon the cross as "the morning kisses it upon the cathedral spire," know the origin of the symbol? How many of the refined ladies from whose necks depends the golden ornament realize that it symbolizes the "lowest of things?" Very few, we will wager, or the priapic emblem would soon disappear from decent society. Mr. Beecher's Jesus—an ideal character, and not the New Testament tramp of Palestine—cannot alter the character of the cross. It was useful in crucifixion; and its form made it valuable as a stake at which to burn heretics; it is convenient as a sword hilt; but no idealization of a victim of its use can make it aught but a relic of barbaric worship of the most disgusting kind.

Two Papers.

We cannot help contrasting the whole-hearted support of the League given by the Banner of Light—printed in another column—with the factious opposition of the Index to the same organization.

The Index was once the "organ" of the League; but since the Congress at which its editor was defeated in his efforts to be president, the paper has been the League's enemy. This attitude cannot be solely the result of the "repeal" policy, for Mr. Abbot and Mr. Underwood left the League before the repeal resolution was passed, and refuse to return now that the resolution is dropped. The reasons must, therefore, be mainly personal. It is evident that self-love is stronger than interest in Liberalism.

The Banner of Light, on the other hand, has never been identified with the League. It is the representativ Spiritualist journal of the country, and could not be looked to to go outside its own field. Its doing so proves that Spiritualism is more closely allied to Liberalism than is Free Religion, and that its leaders are keen enough to see true principles and honest and courageous enough to defend them. No personal feeling prevents co-operation in strong and good work for liberty.

How opposit the course of the two journals!

The Struggle in Belgium for Secular Education.

The high-handed course pursued by the clericals upon their accession of power in the law-making branch of the government of Belgium has been rebuked by the people of eighteen towns which held municipal elections last Sunday. In only a few places were the Catholic candidates elected.

This result is construed as a popular disapproval of the passage of the Education bill which establishes parochial schools in place of secular schools in those towns when the Liberals are in a minority. A people living in a country in which Catholic schools hav been thoroughly tested and found deplorably wanting in everything conduciv to a real education, are not to be blamed for hissing a king who fastens such institutions upon them, and the matter for surprise would hav been their not condemning the bill.

Though still in power in the nation, the clericals will be rendered cautious by this victory for Liberalism, and may be disposed to retreat from their arrogant endeavor to force the state to pay for the conversion of Liberal children into Catholic ignoramuses.

Editorial Notes.

THE Methodists of California are becoming anxious about the public schools. At the conference held recently at Pacific Grove, a resolution containing the following was passed:

"The education of the state is almost wholly secular: No Bible, prayer, or other religious teaching in the state schools. When this influence is exerted upon the young men and women of the land, what will be the effects on their character, in its relation to their church interests? It is the plain duty of the church to provide for the education of her own children. How are theology and the Bible treated in the public school? Bowed politely out. We must therefore educate them."

What would the Methodist brethren hav? asks the San Franciscan. What sort of theology would they like to see taught in the public schools? When the Presbyterian, Unitarian, Universalist, Catholic, Baptist, and Methodist churches succeed in making their creeds agree, it will be time enough for them to complain because the state refuses to turn the public schools into pits, wherein theologians may bark and bite and fill the air with endless and useless controversy.

THE Lord is to be called into the canvass by St. John's party through the observance of a day of prayer and self-abasement. The following proclamation has been issued:

"PROHIBITION HEADQUARTERS, CHICAGO, Oct. 7, 1884.
"To the People of the United States:

"In view of the misery and crime resulting from alcoholism, and of the guilt fastened upon the people by governments—municipal, state, and national—by permitting and even licensing the traffic in poison drinks, the Executiv Committee of the Prohibition party call upon the people of this country to observe Wednesday, Oct. 29th, as a day of fasting, humiliation, and confession; and in view of the fact that many all over the land are aroused and realize the enormity of the liquor crime, and are willing to be at cost and pains to put it away, we call upon all Christian believers to unite in prayer to Almighty God that his aid may be given to measures which will result in the speedy putting away of this guilt, and the suppression of the traffic in alcoholic drinks. JOHN B. FINCH, Ch'n."

In a speech in Brooklyn the other day, St. John said that he was proud that he stood on the only political platform that recognizes the existence of a God.

MR. CHARLES WATTS seems to be having a busy time of it in Canada, where Liberalism is evidently undergoing an extensiv revival. Not only in Toronto is this activity manifested, but in various cities throughout the dominion which Mr. Watts has visited. He is engaged to lecture every night until he starts for New York next month. Judging from reports to hand, our first vice-president had some stormy debating last week when he encountered a Methodist and also a Baptist minister, who appear to hav been more forcible than polite in their advocacy. The Hamilton Spectator givs a two column account of some very severe cross-firing between a minister and Mr. Watts after his lecture there; and in Dunnville, the conflict with the "servant of the Lord" was even more severe. We congratulate Mr. Watts upon the result of his pitched battles. Such work as this was required and its justification is shown in the large audiences which assemble, and the various new societies that hav been formed. The press is by no means hostil to Mr. Watts's mode of advocacy; neither are all his opponents strangers to fairness and gentlemanly behavior, as the following notice from the Ontario Reformer in reference to his recent lecture at Oshawa will show:

"The lecture was certainly an able one, as was to be expected from Mr. Watts, one of the most able advocates of Secularism living. The speaker occupied about an hour. His closing was remarkable for its eloquence and elocutionary power. Discussion was then invited. The Rev. Mr. Shorey was called for by the audience. That gentleman arose, and in a most courteous and forcible manner, expressed his dissent from the speaker's views, putting some very strong and incisiv questions. These the speaker answered with ability and fairness. The candor and courtesy of both gentlemen, their marked deference to other views, and the wide variance between them, made the debate interesting."

OUR correspondents hav had a good deal to say about politics, but we hav held our peace for the very good reason that we saw nothing to be gained in any probable event for Liberalism. Ordinary party politics we hope we are miles above. We hav tried in various ways to worm something out of the three most talked about candidates, but they all seem equally afraid of the Infidels, and will take no notice whatever of the Liberal vote. But here is a new suggestion a friend makes in a private letter. The writer is a man eminent in Freethought and familiar with politics in its practial details. Two days after the Ohio election he writes: "Yesterday the Republicans were claiming 32,000 on Ohio. To-day it seems to be but 12,000. The official count will be less. The Prohibition and Greenback vote as far as returned shows that it will reach over 15,000, so that the Republicans will hav a plurality, not majority. I think it would be well for you to call attention to the fact that Ohio is so close; the fight in the states of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Michigan, and Wisconsin, may be determined by the votes of the Liberals; and that they should combine their votes as far as possible for state officers and members of the legislatures for candidates in favor of Secularism, and withhold their votes from every candidate, state and national, who is not committed to Secularism in governmental affairs. The average politician is a coward, and a few determined men can bring them to terms by showing a bold front. I would bolt every candidate who panders to the Catholic or Protestant churches for votes, and wears on his coat sleeve a clerical certificate of character as a devoted churchman. We cannot win by moral suasion alone. The value of ballots is shown by the large fund used to buy them. Were I in New York or New Jersey I think I should vote for Butler; not because I love the man, but because the People's party is the only party in most of the Southern states which makes a bold fight for a free ballot and honest count, and the bulk of the Liberals are with it in the South. The white Republicans take few risks, and the colored vote is ruled by the ministry." While we are upon the subject of politics, we will call the attention of the parties to one factor they hav overlooked in seeking reasons for the recent vote of Ohio, and why Gov.

Hoadly was elected and not the late Democratic candidate for secretary of state. The reasons are two in number. The first is that the Republicans were responsible for the tyrannical Russell bill taxing mediums $300 a year. The Spiritualists in a body repudiated the party on this account, and they were helped by the Liberals who also had another reason, namely, the denunciation of Gov. Hoadly for his Infidelity by the religious Republican press. These two issues being out of the canvass this fall—the Russell bill being repealed and Gov. Hoadly in office—the Republicans secured a plurality. Had the Democrats had sufficient courage to hav caught the Liberal vote, the result might hav been different. When we reflect upon the apathy manifested toward the Liberal cause by the politicians, we feel like using Mr. Vanderbilt's famous phrase, substituting politics for people, and vowing to help defeat the whole crowd. The discouragement to such a course is that the vote that defeats one party lifts into power another in every way as bad.

A CORRESPONDENT of the London Times has been touring in the poverty-stricken districts of Ireland this summer. The following remarks are part of his summing up of the Irish situation: "But I see, as everyone must see, that any number of priests are living, even in the poorer districts, with every comfort about them; and, the laborer being no doubt worthy of his hire, I feel it invidious to criticise that state of things. And I know that many of those priests are indefatigable in their labors of charity and mercy, and that in the worst and hardest times, when there was no one else within call, they hav stood between their flocks and oppression or starvation. But I see, too, that the country is covered with substantial ecclesiastical edifices of all kinds, that sometimes are actually magnificent. The parish churches are generally good, and often showy; the convents and schools are commodious and architecturally imposing; while not a few of the cathedrals, though one may take exception to the style and the taste, are of grand proportions, and must hav been extremely costly. The church revenues, which apparently must be swelling year after year, are drawn from a steadily dwindling population, and chiefly out of the pockets of poor farmers, of poorer peasants, and petty shopkeepers. It would seem as if while the rents of the landlords were being reduced the dues of the priests and bishops were being proportionately augmented."

Two Presbyterian Chinese women were recently imported by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions to act as teachers in the home mission at San Francisco. Upon arriving it was found that they had not the proper certificate required by law, were not permitted to land, and were ordered by the treasury department to return China. The Christian Chinee are thus excluded by a law intended to reach the pagan Chinese—a law indorsed by tha t good churchman, James G. Blaine, who has recently subscribed $2,500 for a new Presbyterian church in Washington. The church considers it a great hardship that its contract labor is not admitted. It will consider it a greater hardship when China enacts a law prohibiting the entrance into its domains of any persons employed by corporations or persons on contract to work or preach—a law which would be perfectly justified by the anti-Chinese law and policy indorsed by Mr. Blaine.

PROFESSOR RAGSDALE, proctor of the Texas State University, has received a communication from one Parson Hamblin, of Bell county, that state, asking how many of the faculty claim to be religious, and how many are Infidels and Spiritualists, and hinting that there is reason for investigating the religious status of the faculty at Bryan also. Bell county, it will be seen, is getting ambitious. For several years it has been known as the most bigoted portion of Texas, and it was within its sacred precincts that a Freethinker was flogged with hickory rods for his disbelief in the efficacy of the crucifixion. Not content with sanctifying their own bailiwick, the parsons are endeavoring to extend their authority over the whole state, especially to its educational institutions. Parson Hamblin should recollect the fate of Cæsar, and be warned in time.

NEW ZEALAND has just held a general election, and two of the contests are of interest to Freethinkers. At Wanganui, Mr. J. Ballance, the editor of the Freethought Review, and vice-president of the New Zealand Freethought Union, was a candidate, and, although the cry of "Atheist" was persistently raised against him, he had nearly 200 votes more than the two other candidates put together. In the other contest the member in the last Parliament, M. W. Green, famous for his championship of Christianity, was opposed by Robert Stout, president of the same Freethought Union. In this struggle every effort was made by Green and his partisans to raise the odium theologicum, but without much success. The whole of the Dunedin papers attacked Mr. Stout with more or less acerbity, but on the election day he polled 755 votes to his antagonist's 555. He is now Premier and Attorney-General of New Zealand, being the first outspoken Freethinker who has ever occupied the position of Prime Minister in a province of the British empire. In Sydney, N. S. W., the museum, public library, picture gallery, and school of arts are open on Sundays, excellent music is provided Sunday afternoons in a popular resort, and the theaters in the evenings are patronized by thousands. All this liberty is the result of the strenuous labor of the Freethinkers of the city, who hav never relaxed their efforts since, several years ago, Lorando Jones was sentenced to one year's imprisonment and to pay a fine of £100 for blasphemy. Six theaters and halls were used on a recent Sunday evening for Freethought gatherings and lectures. In Melbourne the people hav none of these privileges, the city being ruled by bigoted churchmen, who close all places of entertainment. Joseph Symes, an English Freethinker, has just started a paper in this latter place called the Liberator, and through its columns and by his Atheistic lectures is shaking the orthodoxy of the city at a rapid rate. In Auckland an unrepealed act dating from the time of George III. prohibits the collection of a fee on Sundays for admission to a public place, and the police hav turned this old blunderbus against the Auckland Rationalistic Association, which thought it best not to contest the matter in the courts, preferring to rely on voluntary contributions for money to pay expenses. At Newcastle, N. S. W., the Freethinkers are building a hall, some seven hundred shares in the structure being already subscribed. The ground is held on a ten-years' lease, with privilege of purchase for £357. The Second Australasian Conference of Freethinkers was held in Sydney during the last days of September and first of October. Delegates from nearly all the colonies were in attendance, the proceedings terminating with a grand ball. The Australian Assembly has just passed an act abolishing judicial oaths. Gerald Massey, the distinguished poet and lecturer, is visiting Australia, and lecturing to large audiences.

THE total nativ population in British India in 1881 was 201,699,343. The nativ Christians numbered 758,937. This included the Eurasians, who were brought up as Christians, or were nativ infants adopted by missionaries in time of famin. The Romanists hav had missions in India for over three centuries, and their converts number 600,000 nativs and Eurasians. This leaves 150,000 nativ Christians and Eurasians to represent the work of a century in British India.

THE names of "God," "Jesus," "Christ," "prayer," "creation," etc., no longer cumber the text-books of the public schools of France, confusing the children and leading to error in belief and teaching. In a "Grammar for Children," such examples as "God is the creator of the world," "Cain slew his brother Abel," "Abraham was the father of the Hebrews," "Adam is the father of all nations," hav been eliminated, and sentences conveying some information substituted.

THE anti-death league will rebel against the inevitable by holding an annual convention in "Science Hall," 820 Washington street, Boston, Sunday and Monday, Oct. 26th and 27th, three sessions daily. Several speakers are expected to defy the king of terrors, conspicuous among whom is E. H. Heywood. This is the seventh time the league has met, but Mr. Heywood does not say how effectiv the former protests hav been.

A STATE camp-meeting of Liberals and Spiritualists, Dr. J. L. York writes under date of the 8th, has been held at Long Branch, Alameda Co., Cal., with a large attendance. One of the objects of the gathering was to organize a permanent state association of Liberals and Spiritualists.

PROFESSOR SAYCE is alleged to hav deciphered an Assyrian tablet which describes a transit of Venus which took place in the year 1600 B.C. Science does not owe everything to Christ, as claimed by the church.

THE president of the Social Science Congress of England at its recent meeting stated that one out of every five deaths in London occurred either in workhouses or hospitals.

THE convict camp at Lockett's, in Georgia, under the control of Christian contractors, has a hard name. Since Feb. 1st, 20 out of 150 convicts there hav died.

COL. INGERSOLL has delivered sixty-four lectures within the last three months. He was warmly received by the people everywhere.

A ST. JOHN elector in Nebraska, an earnest Sunday-school worker, has left home to join the Christian band of John C. Eno.

Canadian News.

A crowded audience assembled in Albert Hall, last night, to hear Charles Watts discourse on Religious Fanaticism. He applauded some of Christ's teachings, but condemned his fanaticism and religious intolerance; such as forbidding the young man to bury his father—"Let the dead bury their dead; follow thou me"—a most inhuman command. Again, where he orders them to "leave father and mother" and follow him, and many other sayings of Christ equally barbarous. St. Paul was as bad as Christ in preaching fanaticism and religious intolerance. "Who so preacheth any other gospel than that I teach, let him be accursed," a most savage speech, and only one of many equally ferocious utterances of St. Paul. Such abominable authoritativ utterances bore their legitimate fruit in bloody perscutions, both by Catholics and Protestants. Science has civilized Christianity by degrees; knowledge and reason hav shed their benign influence over the savage teachings of Christ and St. Paul.

The Toronto Secular Society hav established classes for elocution and dramatic performances on Tuesdays; dancing on Wednesdays; music on Fridays; science, chemistry, physics, biology, physiology, etc., etc., on Saturdays; debating, essays, etc., on Sundays in the morning at eleven o'clock, and a public meeting in the evening at seven o'clock. All the other classes meet at eight o'clock in the evening.

Charles Watts has established and organized Secular societies at Oshawa, Lindsay, Simcoe, Hamilton, and other towns and cities. All of them are affiliated with the general central body, "The National Secularist Society of Canada."

Those Infidel books: W. B. Cooke, bookseller on Young street, Toronto, has just received a letter from Customs Commissioner Johnson, at Ottawa, containing the following sentence on the books (Paine and Voltaire's works) seized two or three years ago: "That books seized be destroyed." Mr. Cooke has written to the minister of Customs, asking when this last outrage on Canadian liberty will be put in effect, so that he may attend. He also tells him he that will not stop the circulation of the books, as he (Cooke) will reprint them right away, and thereby assist the N. P. in encouraging nativ production.

The Toronto Secular Society held a general reception on Wednesday evening last. The entertainment consisted of a vocal and instrumental concert, recitations, etc. Between each piece of music, any strangers present were invited to ask questions of Mr. Watts as to the aims and objects of Secularism, or to further explain any remarks he may hav made in his lectures. The general public are invited—admission free—and members are asked to bring their friends and acquaintances who are not at present members. The hall was filled, and a very interesting meeting took place, some of the performers, vocal, instrumental, and elocutionary, displaying great taste, culture, and proficiency.

In his lecture Oct. 10th, Mr. Watts said that nothing was so detrimental to progress as mental stagnation, and he considered that the erroneous views entertained by many in reference to secular philosophy was attributable principally to people putting their thinking out to be done for them. Secularism was misrepresented not so much from intention as from the traditions of misrepresentations handed down. New truths were always shunned apart from their alleged defects, and modern science was dreaded, avoided, and opposed when it was ushered into the world by those who had never examined it. It was the same with the uprising of the Christian church. New ideas were shunned first, because old customs are mixed up with our government, and hence difficult to eradicate; second, doctrins were accepted in infancy and grew up with the individual; and third, old ideas were bound up with our interests; for to acknowledge oneself a Freethinker was to be exposed as a target for the puny bigots who sometimes can and do deprive the honest doubter of bread for expressing himself. The speaker denied that Secularism was a mere system of negation, it being negativ only to error, but positiv to truth. The Catholic was a negationist to Protestantism, and Protestants were negationists to Catholicism. The Secularist's cardinal idea was that supreme attention should be given to this life and its duties, as the present existence was a fact beyond dispute, and all hav missions to perform with dignity to themselvs and usefulness to the community. If there was to be another life we knew nothing of it, and he said with Col. Ingersoll, "One world at a time." While we were wasting time in preparing for a mythical existence, we sometimes neglected to fulfil our duties to society. Prayers never removed the cholera, as was seen by the present condition of pest-ridden Italy, where prayer had taken the place of sanitary duties. If you want anything done, you must work. Hence Secularists believed human minds and human reason could not believe in an infallible God who wrote an infallible book which is constantly being improved upon as human reason advances, and the nightmare of theology thrust aside by the training of the intellect. For the text, "Take no thought of this life," etc., he would substitute, "Man, know thyself." In the domestic circle he did not believe in the "lords of creation," or "Wives, be subject unto your husbands." The garb of sanctity covered a multitude of sins, and hypocrisy was the greatest curse of the day.

On Sunday morning last a debate came off on Max Nordau's book, "The Lies of Civilization," the members, each in turn, reviewing some of the positions taken by the author, and pointing out where his strength lay in some cases, and in others where he displayed weakness in dealing with his subject. They all agreed that the book is a vigorous and honest appeal in the interest of the many—that is, the producers, as against the oppressions of the privileged classes and the injustice inflicted by the monopolists. His style is fresh and striking, and many things which hav often been said before when reiterated by him wear an aspect of newness and freshness.

At Hamilton, Happy Tommy Stout, of the Salvation Army, had an encounter with Charles Watts. The lecturer had read a letter purporting to hav been written by Tommy, and the latter denied any share of the authorship. The Rev. Mr. Parsons asked Mr. Watts several questions, which the lecturer answered with his usual lightning quickness, volubility, happy knack of laying down his position, and undermining that of his opponent, and all the time displaying his own comprehensiv mastery of his subject. The lecture in the city of Hamilton was a most successful affair, and Mr. Watts established a strong and flourishing Secular society there in what is called "the Ambitious City."

At a meeting of the city of London city council on Monday evening, an application was handed in from Mr. Charles Watts, of Toronto, asking if the City Hall could be obtained at a future date for lecturing purposes. Alderman Stringer said, "We want it distinctly understood that this City Hall cannot be let to Infidels." The matter was referred to the select committee. Mr. Charles Watts is making an extensiv tour of the towns and cities of Ontario, and during his visit to the city of London the above incident occurred.

This has been a busy week with Mr. Watts, he has lectured nearly every night of the week at a different town or city each night. At his third visit and third lecture at the city of Hamilton this week, he met (as it is his delight to meet) opposition from a clergyman; they kept at it hot until late at night. He rained forth his blows on all sides as thick as hail and with telling effect. He beat a sort of "devil's tattoo" on the armor of his opponent. The clergy of Canada are getting a rattling shake-up. "Great was the shaking up in the valley of dry bones."

On Tuesday Mr. Watts lectured at Welland to a large audience. On Wednesday at Dunnville he met with fierce opposition from the clergy. One reverend gentleman assumed the role of the proverbial mad bull, enraged at the red rag. He made a savage onslaught on the apostle of Secularism. "Blood, blood, Iago! I will hav blood!" on, on, he madly rushed, thirsting for Agnostic gore. "Giv me another horse! Bind up my wounds!" Ha, ha! now, I hav thee! Die! die! thou advocate of spontaneous generation and protoplasmic germs!

R. B. BUTLAND.

Toronto, Ont., Oct. 18, 1884.

"Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts. Let him drink and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more" (Prov. xxxi, 6, 7).

"Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake" (1 Tim. v, 23).

"Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works" (Eccles. ix, 7).

"They shall plant vineyards, and drink the wine thereof" (Amos ix, 14).

"Wine that maketh glad the heart of man" (Ps. civ, 15).

"Wine which cheereth God and man" (Jud. ix, 13).

"Destroy it not, for a blessing it is."

Will that wing of the Prohibition army which has adopted the Bible as its text-book on temperance, inscribe the above texts upon its banner?

Jehovah is represented as being particularly fond of strong drink.

"In the holy place shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured unto the Lord for a drink offering" (Num. xxviii, 7).

One of the most direful calamities was a wine famine.

"Awake ye drunkards, and weep; and howl, all ye drinkers of wine, because of the new wine; for it is cut off from your mouth. . . The drink offering is cut off from the house of the Lord; the priests, the Lord's ministers, mourn. . . Gird yourselves and lament, ye priests; howl, ye ministers of the altar; come, lie all night in sackcloth, ye ministers of my God; for . . the drink offering is withholden from the house of your God" (Joel, i, 5, 9, 13).

God's peculiar favorites had a weakness for wine. When he drowned the world's inhabitants, he saved Noah, knowing that as soon as the waters subsided, he would plant a vineyard, make wine, and become intoxicated. When Sodom was destroyed, the only righteous man he found was drunken Lot. When David made his celebrated feast in honor of the Lord, he gave to every man and woman a flagon of wine. He kept some for himself, and so merry did his heart become, that he "danced before the Lord with all his might."

Thus joyously sings Solomon: "I have drunk my wine with my milk [milk punch]; eat, O friends, drink, yea, drink abundantly." In the morning he sings another song: "Open to me, . . . my love, . . . for my head is filled with dew." How many a wayward fellow, like Solomon, has risen from the gutter, sorrowfully wended his way home, and serenaded his sleeping spouse with that same melody!

God commanded Jeremiah to tempt with wine those who abstained from its use:

"Go unto the house of the Rechabites, and speak with them, and bring them into the house of the Lord, into one of the chambers, and give them wine to drink" (Jer. xxxv, 2).

Christ spoke as follows:

"John the Baptist came neither eating bread nor drinking wine. . . . The Son of Man is come eating and drinking; and ye say, Behold a gluttonous man, and a winebibber" (Luke vii, 33, 34).

This censure was evidently not unmerited. The first act in Christ's ministerial career was to manufacture three barrels of wine for a wedding feast; his last recorded act was a benediction upon the wine cup.

Theology being no longer in demand, the Protestant clergy, contrary to the teachings of the Bible and the traditions of the church, now find it popular and profitable to espouse the cause of temperance. But in championing one rational virtue they employ two Christian vices, hypocrisy and intolerance. The most inconsistent, the most uncharitable opponents of the liquor traffic to-day, are these fresh converts, who profess to be doing their master's will, and who claim that his word is the advocate of total abstinence and prohibitory laws. With fierce invective they declaim against the old god Bacchus, yet every anathema they hurl at him will apply with equal justice to their God and Christ.

POVERTY AND VAGRANCY.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it encourages poverty and vagrancy.

Jesus Christ was the panegyrist of poverty and the promoter of vagrancy:

"Blessed be ye poor" (Luke vi, 20).

"But woe unto you that are rich" (Luke vi, 24).

"A rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. xix, 23).

"It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Mark x, 25).

"Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth" (Matt. vi, 19).

When the judicious use of wealth is promotion of human happiness, and when poverty is the source of so much misery and crime, such teachings are not only false, but pernicious.

"Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body what ye shall put on. . . . Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns. . . . And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin. . . . Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? . . . The morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof" (Matt. vi, 25–34).

To-day our land is infested with an army of tramps. Their skirmishers are deployed along every highway; their points of attack are the kitchen and the haymow; their text-book on military science is the Sermon on the Mount. "They sow not, neither do they reap." "They toil not, neither do they spin." They beg and steal. These are Christ's followers—the truest followers he has on earth to-day.

In the streets of our cities we see men clad in rags, idle, and drunken, and penniless. We see them arrested for vagrancy, thrust into prison, or made to labor for their bread. These are Christ's martyrs.

Poor tramp and vagrant! How you are "persecuted for righteousness' sake!" Men despise you; the farmer drives you from his door; the social economist racks his brains to devise a plan for your suppression; state governments legislate against you; everywhere you are treated as an outcast—and all because, taking the Bible for your guide, you endeavor faithfully to conform to its teachings.

IGNORANCE AND IDIOCY.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it condemns the use of reason and the acquisition of knowledge.

For partaking of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, our parents were banished from Paradise; for obeying the dictates of reason, we are consigned to hell.

Education, physical, moral, and intellectual, is discouraged.

NEITHER MAKE THYSELF OVER WISE.—Ibid.

Choice mottoes, the above, to hang up on the walls of the school-room!

"Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy" (Col. ii, 8).

"Knowledge puffeth up" (1 Cor. viii, 1).

"Thy wisdom and thy knowledge it hath perverted thee" (Isa. xlvii, 10).

"I gave my heart to know wisdom, and to know madness and folly; I perceived that this also is vexation of spirit. For in much wisdom is much grief; and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow" (Eccles. i, 17, 18).

The Bible, and the religion emanating from it, are the fruitful parents of idiocy. They demand a sacrafice of the very attribute which exalts the man of sense above the idiot; they bid him pluck out the eyes of Reason, and in their place insert the sightless balls of Faith.

"Reason should be destroyed in all Christians," says Luther (L. Ungedr. Pred. Bru., p. 106).

"One destitute of reason," is a phrase employed by Webster to define the word "fool."

"We are fools for Christ's sake," exclaims Paul (1 Cor. iv, 10).

OBSCENITY.

I refuse to accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, and protest against its being placed in the hands of the young, because its pages are defiled with obscenity.

Aside from thousands of coarse and vulgar expressions contained in it, there are at least a hundred passages so obscene that their appearance in any other book would exclude that book from the mails, and send its publisher to prison. There are entire chapters, such as the thirty-eighth chapter of Genesis, that reek with obscenity from beginning to end.

In proof of the charge of obscenity, I refer you to the following: Isaiah xxxvi, 12; Ezek. iv, 12–15; Gen. xix, 30–36; xxx, 1–16; xxxviii; 2 Kings xviii, 27; Lev. xv, 16–33; Job xl, 16, 17; 1 Kings xiv, 10; Isaiah iii, 17.

That portions of the Bible are obscene, and unfit to be read, is admitted even by Christians. Noah Webster, a Protestant, edited an expurgated edition of the Bible. In vindication of his work, he says:

"Many passages are expressed in language which decency forbids to be repeated in families and in the pulpit."

The Rev. Father Maguire, Catholic, in his debate with the Rev. Mr. Greg, at Dublin, gave utterance to the following:

"I beg of you not to continue such a practice; it is disreputable. I will ask Mr. Greg a question, and I beg of you, my brethren of the Protestant church, to bear this mind, I will ask him if he dare to take up the Bible and read from the book of Genesis the fact of Onan—I ask him will he read that? Will he read the fact relative to Lot and his two daughters? Will he read these and many other passages which I could point out to him in the Holy Bible, which I would not take one thousand guineas, nay, all the money in the world, and read them here to-day?"

Richard Lalor Shiel, M.P., and privy counselor to the queen, thus wrote:

"Part of the holy writings consist of history, and the narration of facts of a kind that cannot be mentioned in the presence of a virtuous woman without exciting horror. Shall a woman be permitted to read in her chamber, what she would tremble to hear at her domestic board? Shall she con over and revolve what she would rather die than utter?"

And if unfit for the perusal of matured woman, shall innocent childhood be polluted with these vile, indecent tales?

CONCLUSION.

Here are twenty crimes and vices sanctioned by the Bible. Scattering this book broadcast over the land, making it the chief text-book of the Sunday-school, and, above all, placing it in our public schools, and compelling our youth to accept it as infallible authority, is a monstrous wrong; and you who advocate it are the enemies of virtue and the promoters of vice. There are within the lids of this Bible a hundred chapters sanctioning the bloodiest deeds in all the annals of crime; and this is the book you wish to place in the hands of our sons! There are within this Bible a hundred chapters which no modest woman can read without her cheek becoming tinged with the blush of shame; and this is the book you wish to place in the hands of our daughters! If you delight to feast upon such carrion, you have the right to do so; but you have no right to thrust it down the throats of your neighbors. As a Liberal, I concede to the Protestant cuckoo the right to propagate her species; but I protest against her laying her eggs in the secular nest, and having them hatched by the state.

I affirm that the Bible does not present an infallible moral standard, and I hav given a score of valid reasons why it does not. I expect the defenders of this book to complete the task that I hav here essayed. They will claim that the Bible is opposed to crime. They will, no doubt, cite numerous passages in confirmation of this claim. Let them do this. Then place the result of our labors side by side. This will demonstrate what the nature and limits of my discourse have precluded me from doing; and that is, that the Bible abounds with teachings that conflict. This fact established, the dogma of its infallibility must fall.

You may contend that I mistake the meaning of what I have quoted from this book. But the language is too plain to be mistaken. Do not tell me that it states one thing and means another. This is, you claim, the word of your God. Is your God wanting in candor?

So far as the Bible is concerned, the criminal has as much to support the justness of his crime as the Christian has to sustain the truthfulness of his creed. The various dogmas of the church are not upheld by stronger scripture proofs than have been advanced in justification of the crimes that I have named. The doctrine of immortality is supported by the New Testament, and opposed by the Old. Christians accept the teachings of the former, and stigmatize as beasts those who accept the teachings of the latter. The dogma of endless punishment is supported at the most by but few texts. The Universalists adduce two hundred texts disproving it. Yet the doctrine of endless punishment is orthodox, and Universalism is the rankest heresy. The Bible teaches a simple monotheism. There is but one passage that clearly teaches the doctrine of the trinity, and this passage, it is admitted, is an interpolation. Yet in the Christian Confession of Faith, this trinitarian dogma has been written in letters of blood.

That great and good men have commended the Bible as a moral guide is true. It is a common practice to parade these commendations before the world. But the testimonials of these men are, for the most part, not the result of careful reading and research. They have been inspired by the teachings of childhood, by the popular sentiment that prevails around them, or by a perusal of only the choicest portions of this book.

The Bible moralist would have us believe that from his book our morality has been derived; that God is the author, and the Bible the revelation and sole repository of our moral laws. Poor, credulous slave of superstition, it is not from Gods and Bibles that these laws have come.

"Not in the way assumed by our dogmatic teachers has the morality of human nature been propped up. The power that has molded us thus far has worked with stern tools upon a rigid stuff. . . . That power did not work with delusions, nor will it stay its hands when such are removed. Facts rather than dogmas have been its ministers—hunger, shame, pride, love, hate, terror, awe—such were the forces, the interaction and adjustment of which during the immeasurable ages of his development wove the triplex web of man's physical, intellectual, and moral nature, and such are the forces that will be effectual to the end" (Tyndall).

Accepting the Bible—not for what it has been claimed to be, the word of God, but for what it is, the work of man—I can excuse in a degree the crude ideas of right and wrong, and the laxity of morals that prevailed among the people whose history it records. The age in which they lived, the circumstances that surrounded them, must palliate, to some extent, their deeds and theories. But it is humiliating to think that in these better times, illuminated by the light of a glorious civilization, there are those who spurn the robes of virtue that Reason in the loom of grave Experience has woven, and who from the dark and musty closets of the past drag forth for use the soiled and blood-stained garments that barbarians wore. JOHN E. REMSBURG.

Letters from Friends.

BURR OAK, MICH., Oct. 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The question: "How shall Liberals vote?" has been pretty thoroughly discussed. Preferences hav been plainly given for each of the three principal candidates for president, and their records hav been looked up. The evidence seems to show that all of them nominally profess the orthodox faith, but all are very liberal in views. Blaine is almost a genuin Freethinker, and Butler and Cleveland also hold to the church chiefly for the sake of popularity. But lately, Butler has received most of the praise. Some seem to think he is a real Liberal in every respect. One of THE TRUTH SEEKER correspondents says: "I see noble B. F. Butler in his letter of acceptance completely ignores the myths and phantoms," etc. Now, the writer of these lines happened to hear B. F. Butler make a short speech the other day. He spoke of God in the very first sentence he uttered. He said that God has been very good to this people. I was instantly and forcibly reminded of those Liberals who are harboring the insane delusion that Butler ignores the myths any more than the others do, when he can make them serve his purpose. Great stress is laid on that much-lauded fifth plank in the Greenback platform. Those who imagin that church property would be taxed under Butler's administration, because of that plank, would find to their sorrow that they had been basing their hopes on an exceedingly frail foundation. The churches would not be taxed unless influences should come in play that are entirely beyond the president's control. I would not giv one penny for the choice among all the long list of candidates, Mrs. Lockwood included, so far as the interests of Liberalism are concerned. We need not expect anything from any of them. Surely, it requires no argument to convince any intelligent Liberal that a man who will conceal his real sentiments before election, to secure the support of the church, will conceal them afterward for the very same reason. The president can make no move in favor of Liberalism that the church will not immediately discover. Unforeseen circumstances may arise in the coming four years, which the president, if so inclined, may be able to assist in shaping to the advantage of Liberalism, but it is foolish to cast a vote with any reference to vague chances that no man can now know anything about. If both men liv till after the election, either Blaine of Cleveland will be president.

The Liberal should decide, then, to vote for either one or the other of these two, or not vote at all. Butler stands a better chance of being struck by an aerolite than of being elected president. He will not get the entire electoral vote of one state in this Union. With several Northern states certainly Republican, others doubtful and divided, and nearly the entire solid South against him, his election is clearly impossible. In a Republican state, the man who votes for Butler casts half a vote for Cleveland; in Democratic states, he who votes for Butler casts half a vote for Blaine. Butler's views and policy are much nearer in accord with Republican principles than Democratic, but if he succeeds in preventing either of the old parties from winning at the polls, he and his followers might as well hav been working directly for Cleveland, for if the election goes to the House, Cleveland will be chosen just as certainly as if no Republican or Greenback candidates had been nominated. Blaine's fitness for president is unquestioned so far as ability and experience in public affairs are concerned. The only question is in regard to his honesty. In point of ability and experience, Butler is immensely superior to Cleveland. The man who votes for Cleveland will vote for him simply and solely because he is a Democrat. He would vote for John Kelly, Denis Kearny, Tilden's ghost, or the devil, if he was at the head of the Democratic ticket. Choose ye. N. G. W.

When the above was written, I had not read David S. White's communication in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 11th. It seems that Abraham Lincoln's spirit, after indulging in some very gloomy statements, says: "He who lifts his voice for the poor will be the chosen ruler, for the poor man's friend is the next in order in the history of this nation." This mystifies the matter a thousandfold. If the man "who lifts his voice for the poor" is to be the "coming man," the White House will not hold one-fourth of them. There is not a stump-orator from Maine to California who is not lifting his voice for the poor, every day in the week, and has been for lo! these many weeks. Abraham has changed his views, too, since he went "over there." It is evident that he no longer believes in a Democratic form of government, or he would not hav spoken of a ruler for our people. It is popularly supposed, at least theoretically, that the president of these United States is the servant, not the ruler, of the people. But Mrs. Fisk will easily be able to remove all doubts as to the veracity of Abraham's spirit. N. G. W.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Oct. 5, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The more I think about it the more I am convinced that Liberals or Secularists can accomplish more for the cause by not voting at all. If they vote they will divide up about equally with the three candidates—the political cutthroat trinity of the world, the flesh, and the devil—Blaine, Cleveland, and Butler, and so kill each other's votes A complete throwing away of a quarter million votes! What stupid nonsense! when by staying away from the polls altogether the moral, the educational influence will be above computation. Men, women, and children will giv sager audiences to a man explaining his reasons for declining to vote. They will think about it and go away and talk about it to their neighbors. It looks like a glorious opportunity for us to make a ten strike for Liberalism.

A Republican Liberal! A Democratic Liberal! Bah! A Liberal who will stand up and allow any party to place their brand upon his seat of knowledge is no more nor less than a thing. I could not help being born and raised a Republican, but when I became a Liberal I ceased to wallow in partisan mire. A party manufacturing millionaires by the thousand, and run by preachers, Comstocks, evangelical alliances, W. C. T. U.'s, and Y. M. C. A.s', was too rank for me. Jay Gould givs $100,000 to elect Blaine; other millionaires in proportion. They plant where they expect to reap—put their money where it will do them the most good. The party that legislates and divides with them gets their mon ey, their influence, and their votes.

There is no doubt but that the Democratic party would, of the three, be our best ally. But let us refrain from voting this time, and four years hence hav a candidate and cause of our own. By that time Col. Ingersoll will hav found out that the Republican party has no use for Liberals except to vote Christians into office, and probably be willing to accept the nomination for president by the Secular party, upon a secular platform, in the interest of pure, secular government.

In no other way can our grievances, our principles, and our claims be so effectually brought before the people of the country and legislation secured. Then, by hanging bravely to it for two, three, four, or five presidential elections, we will surely win. Even the more intelligent Christians begin to see that a secular government will afford them the most permanent protection. S. R. SHEPHERD.

SPIRITUALITY AND SPIRITUALISM.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Oct. 12, 1884.

TO GEORGE CHAINEY, Dear Sir: Although I was not present to hear your "Day and Night" of human life and character, yet I was greatly affected when I read it. I regretted that so brilliant a gem of literature and rhetoric—so grand, lofty, and spiritual an ideal of prospectiv life and development—should be stained, marred, and disfigured by ingratitude, untruthfulness, and want of logic.

When you virtually told your Materialistic and Agnostic friends that they were a cold, heartless set, without love or sympathy; that they did not and could not appreciate dreams; that they disparaged all opinions but their own; that they were animal and sensual, and must be so until they believed in decarnated spirits that exist eternally; and that some would, like swine, turn and rend you, I felt that you were not only misrepresenting and doing great injustice to your Agnostic friends who were present, but to me also, who for fifty years hav suffered, and sacrificed everything but life, to help prepare the way for you and others to spread the light of that higher life, and the "new heaven and earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness and peace."

In some of your expressions you seemed to forget that "every difference of opinion is not necessarily a difference of principle." I hav passed through Methodism, Universalism, and Spiritualism—perhaps not through—to Naturalism and Humanitarianism, and hav been growing higher, better, purer, and more spiritual all the time.

You say your conversion to Spiritualism caused you to abandon cigars and govern your appetites and passions. I am glad it has that effect in your case, but my observations for thirty years hav convinced me that Spiritualism, per se, does not often cause its votaries to abandon bad habits and fashions, or to be less selfish and animal than Materialists, or do more for humanity.

Think you that Courtlandt Palmer, S. P. Putnam, myself, and many others, men and women similarly organized, are less spiritual and more gross and earthly than you, simply because you hav seen evidence—to you—of a super-mundane life? Sir, a man of your fineness of organism and impressibility ought to know that there are all degrees of organic development among Spiritualists, "from snowy white to sooty." Men and women of coarse temperaments, shallow front, and narrow frontal-lateral heads, hav little or no spiritual life or ideality, and faint or feeble aspirations for the life that is pictured in your cerebral gallery.

Now, I would like to hav you prove to me that the character and altitude of a man's existence depend upon the length of it. If you will open your eyes to the fact that "as is the organism, so is the man," and that there is a spiritual side to human nature, and that, when fully developed, all men and women are a spirit-world, a "summer-land," in the body, in the upper chambers of the brain, "the dome of thought, the palace of the soul," you will "be wise unto salvation for yourself and humanity."

You complain, and justly, of the want of patronage and appreciation, among Materialists, of your past labors, and intimate it is for the want of a belief in Spiritualism; but, from thirty-six years of observation, experience, and extensiv travel and acquaintance, I find no difference in this respect between one class of Liberals and another.

It is want of development that makes us selfish and want to own, and monopolize, and enslave. Not many are yet developed "into the glorious light and liberty of the gospel" of humanitarianism, which lifts us up out of egoism into a true altruism. But I must stop, just as I hav begun. Wishing you great success in your new field of action, I am

Appreciativly yours, J. H. COOK.

KINGFIELD, MAINE, Oct. 5, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Yours of the 1st inst. is received and contents noted. I was in funds and should hav remitted $5 this week, for I had enjoyed the reading of THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time at your expense, for which I am very thankful. I can't very well get along without it, and if I am not so punctual at all times as you desire, nevertheless, you will get your pay, for your paper is the best of the half dozen that I take, and I would sooner do without all the rest than THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I am the only outspoken Infidel in town; and the sky-pilots giv me a wide birth, for every chance I get I throw hot shot into their ranks, which has a tendency to demoralize their best soldiers. Yours for the truth, ALONZO KNAPP.

MOUND CREEK, KAN., Oct. 7, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Juliet H. Severance, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 4th, says: "We first had a white man's government, now we hav a rich man's government. If our nation long remains, even with its seeming republicanism, we must make it what it professes to be—a people's government." This is bed-rock truth. She also says: "The monopolists own the press of the country, and control its expressions on all subjects, as it does the telegraph lines, by which news is obtained." Truth. Also: "The land must be returned to the people from whom it has been unjustly filched [true], and all revenues for the support of government raised by a rental of land [no!], which should be held in trust by the government for the use of the people [yes] instead of taking the fruits of industry. Thus the rights of labor would be protected [no!]. All the wealth of our world is the result of the labor of the world, and yet, although enough is produced to satisfy all the wants of the whole people, the great mass of the people are in want, while the few are surfeited with overmuch." "Competition must giv place to co-operation, and each individual hav the fruits of his own toil." That each one should in equity hav the fruit of his or her toil is patent. Competition versus co-operation does not come within the purview of the erroneous positions I seek to eliminate. I hav quoted from page 627. The close reader will be well paid to read and study the whole article, "The New Republic." The sentences at the bottom of the column are A No. 1.

Now, the reader will notice my first no comes in on the "rental of land." That land should be held by government in trust for the use of the people, I concede; but how the class who tills the land can pay all the revenues for the support of government, and not be class legislation, and not take the fruits of their industry to do it with; or how a class or a whole people either can be "protected" when all they produce is their own by taking from a class, or the whole, a revenue for government support, is a kink in logic, the more untwisting, the more kink. Labor per se needs nor asks for protection or fostering care, or class legislation; it asks and needs but justice only. One of the greatest jurists of the nation says, "Labor is weak, and capital is strong," and under present conditions it is true. But why? Because labor has not retained the wealth it has created. And why has it not retained it? Because of iniquitous so-called law, by giving a right of property in land; hence its price, rent, and monopolization, and by limiting the quantity of money short of zero per cent, which givs it the power to command interest. These two giv the power to accumulate wealth without labor. When once accumulated, as now, capital, the very creature of labor, by interest annually from labor has the means which givs it the power to institute monopolies without end. Yes, it can hold the very bread industry produces in the face of the laborer while he starves. Be it remembered forever by every truth seeker that labor pays all taxes, all rent, all interest on money and capital to the uttermost farthing; and that they are all, not excepting taxes, sheer robbery of labor, and that they must be eliminated, or the nation dies, since either in time will murder it. MR. EDITOR: This is my first letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I should hav written before, but I am such a poor letter writer, and, perhaps, a little too proud. Therefore did not write to show my poor composition. My regards to all THE TRUTH SEEKER employees, and to Miss Wixon. I hav learned to love her for her splendid stories in the Children's Corner.

Our dear old friend Seward Mitchell has just left us after a short stay of two weeks. We should hav liked him to stay longer, he is such a splendid old gentleman, and such a grand good worker for the Liberal cause. He is not idle a moment; always looking for subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, or selling pamphlets. I wish there were more Seward Mitchells, and if he ever comes this way again he won't get away so easy. I pity him; he is now over seventy-one years of age, and without money. He has spent his whole life in the cause of humanity and neglected himself.

Such grand unselfish people ought to be rewarded, it seems to me, somewhere. It seems to me, too, there ought to be another life or a continuation of this; to giv such grand souls a chance. Every time Bennett's name is mentioned tears will start to his eyes. I can never forget that grand old soul. I fear there are very few Seward Mitchells and Elmina Slenkers; some one must take their places ere long. Are there any to do it? I must thank my dear Miss Wixon again, before I close, for her "Apples of Gold," and many other beautiful gems from her pen. This from your young fifteen-year-old Truth Seeker,

CLARA LOUISA LEWIS.

CERESCO, MICH., Oct. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the tab on my paper that my year is nearly up, so I send $3 for one more year. I expect to take it as long as I liv, which I don't expect to be long. I am now seventy-nine, and hav been a Freethinker eight years. I was converted from orthodoxy principally by reading the Old Testament. I concluded that no real God could commit such immoralities and brutalities as are recorded. Oh, the cunning priests! Let us go for them. I wish I could write my ideas. Wouldn't they catch it?—you bet, the rascals!

So Brother Chainey has been convinced that Spiritualism is true. All right; I hope it is, but he should hav left the ranks without throwing mud. I like the man, and his preachings—a smart man—I hope he will be thoroughly convinced, and make a good Spiritualist. I remain

Yours for doing all we can for the human family,

The League.

How to Organize a Local League.

The National Liberal League is formed by the union of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues. To organize a Local Auxiliary League, any person (man or woman) may place the following Call at the head of a sheet of paper and solicit signatures:

CALL.

We, the undersigned citizens of [here introduce name of town or city], agree to organize an Auxiliary Liberal League, to work in connection with the National Liberal League, and to pay the sums set opposit our names for that purpose.

Names.	Residences.	Amounts.

As soon as ten persons have subscribed to this Call, and five dollars have been paid in, make out an application for a Charter, inclosing the application, together with a money order or postal note for five dollars (or the amount may be inclosed in a registered letter) to the secretary of the National Liberal League. The fee for a Charter is ten dollars, and the Board of Directors have voted to allow the organizer of the Auxiliary Liberal League to retain five dollars as compensation for his or her services in effecting the organization.

Any Liberal society can by a vote qualify itself an Auxiliary Liberal League, and take out a charter.

On receipt of the five dollars and application signed by the President and Secretary (or the temporary Secretary) of the new League (and as many others as may choose), the Secretary will forward to the applicant a Charter signed by the proper officers of the National Liberal League. Samuel P. Putnam,
Secretary of the National Liberal League.
55 East 9th street, New York.

SUPPORT OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE.

In order to provide an adequate revenue to the treasury of the National League, to enable it to carry out the requirements of sections, 4, 5, and 6 of Article III. of its Constitution, and to do other legitimate work of the League, every auxiliary is requested to contribute a certain sum monthly, not less than five cents per month from each one of its members, for the use of the National League. The amount thus collected should be remitted quarterly on the first days of January, April, July, and October, by the secretary of the auxiliary to the secretary of the National League.

CORRESPONDENCE.

John Turner, Philadelphia, Pa.: Please find inclosed post-office order for $30 for the National Liberal League.

C. E. Garner, Jacksonville, Fla.: I inclose you $2 for the emancipation cause, with best wishes and kind regards.

Stephen Brewer, Ithaca, N. Y.: I inclose $5 for the Fund to be raised. I wish the new administration adundant success.

C. W. Manderfield, San Carlos, Ariz. Ter.: Inclosed please find my contribution to the $5,000 Liberal Campaign Fund. I wish you success as a missionary in the Liberal cause.

John H. Bengel, Harrisburg, Pa.: It would be a blessing if you would come here and organize a League. When I can I will subscribe to the fund. I am a young man and work hard, but I desire to know the truth.

F. Fitzgibbons, New York City: I am always in sympathy with any movement that tends to accomplish the ends in view. I shall try to contribute one dollar quarterly, and inclose herewith first payment. With best wishes for success in the efforts you are so nobly making to advance the interests of the National Liberal League.

H. Clay Luse, Waynesburg, Pa., to C. B. Reynolds: You ask concerning an organization here. I think we can now effectually organize. I believe we could bring into an organization, say twenty-five, many of whom are men of influence. This would not be a bad start for Waynesburg. As you say, it would form a nucleus around which Liberals would gather. I shall attempt an organization at once, and will let you know of my progress. For the present, I think we can organize better under some such name as "The Waynesburg Secular Society."

George Longford, Secretary of Friendship Liberal League, Philadelphia: Inclosed you will find $5 from our League, as was promised by our delegate, Mr. Seymour. In behalf of the Friendship League, I may say that we hope success may crown your efforts, and that every League and Liberal in the country may come to your assistance. We expect to hav a big day November 30th, when Mr. Watts and yourself come. We shall leave no stone unturned to giv you a full house and a grand welcome. We shall challenge the clergy to meet Mr. Watts after each lecture.

Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, vice-president of the League, Kansas City: I want to liv to see the time when Liberalism shall be the greatest good to the greatest number; when it means generosity, manliness, character. I am going to try and do some work for and with the League this year, and organize for practical work. You and Mr. Watts will certainly come to Kansas City on your missionary tour. Our League here will be ready to assist earnestly and practically.

A FEW WORDS FROM MR. GREEN.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Nothing has pleased me more than to witness the energy and ability with which Mr. Putnam has entered upon his duties as secretary of the National Liberal League. Surely he is the right man in the right place. With Col. Ingersoll as president and S. P. Putnam as secretary, and with the present Liberal platform adopted at Cassadaga, I can see no good reason for any Liberal to refuse to work with the League. I hope to see new auxiliary Leagues springing up everywhere.

On account of the poor health of the editor, the publication of the Freethinkers' Magazine and Directory has been detained a few days, but it will be out soon. It will be an interesting number, and I hope all your readers who are not regular subscribers will send twenty-five cents for the November number.

And now allow me to cordially invite all the Freethinkers of western New York and northwestern Pennsylvania to prepare to attend the coming Salamanca Convention. We expect to hav a grand good time.

I will add that my health is constantly improving.

Truly yours, H. L. Green.

FROM C. B. REYNOLDS.

The following extract is from a private letter from that energetic, representativ Liberal, R. P. Barton, of Richburg, Allegany county, New York, one of the most influential and respected young business men of that county: "Things are now in shape so that my hopes will be realized, and if the New York meeting of state League, etc., of which you write, is held in December, by that time the Richburg Liberal League will be represented at the meeting." Take notice, if we desire to build up live local Leagues, to help insure the secularization of our government, and hav in our own neighborhood a Liberal society that in every respect—alike social and educational—shall be superior to the church and Sunday-school; that shall form a nucleus around which honest hearts can rally; where our mothers, sisters, wives, and children shall be enlisted and delight to participate; where the weak and timorous ones shall gain strength and courage; and that shall be a living refutation of the slanders and misrepresentations of the clergy that Liberals are all that is low, vicious, and depraved, obtain subscribers for The Truth Seeker. Even a three months' (only 50 cents) trial trip insures abandonment of superstitious faith, and awakes to thought. A year's subscription is certain to add an earnest, activ Liberal, and in all probability a whole family, to our ranks. Then, under the influence of such workers as R. P. Barton, a live, activ League will speedily result. That's how it worked at Richburg. That's just how it will work in your neighborhood. Try it.

Chas. B. Reynolds, Chairman Ex. Com. N. L. L.

Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, Dear Sir: Your letter, with circular to Liberals of America, has been under my notice for some days, but illness and press of business hav delayed an answer.

I am well satisfied with the action of the League in appointing paid lecturers, and wish to do something to sustain the measure. I do not think I can do so in a better way—in one that will more fully advance the cause—than by devoting the proceeds of the sale of a number of the Liberal Hymn Books to the support of the lecturers. These books sell for twenty-five cents each. Now, I do not intend to trouble you and Mr. Watts to carry round a lot of hymn books, however useful you might find them in getting the people to sing at gatherings. But I propose that you carry two or three with you to show what they are, and get people to send to us for them; those persons paying you twenty-five cents, and you giving them a receipt for it, with a two-cent stamp, which they are to inclose—that is, both receipt, signed by you personally, or Mr. Watts, and stamps—when they order the book from me. I guarantee to fill promptly every order so received for three months (perhaps longer). If you and Mr. Watts accept this offer, we will hav it published, if you please, in the Liberal papers. The two cents is to pay the postage on the book to each person.

Cordially yours, Eliza B. Burns. and Channing Burns.

A noble offer. Buy these hymn-books. They are just the thing for the new work. We must be stirred with music, or we cannot do our best. I am sure that this generous gift will put quite a number of dollars into our treasury, and cheer into our souls.

Listen to this from that remarkable octogenarian, La Roy Sunderland, old in the service, but whose spirit is as fresh as a May-day:

Quincy Mass., Oct. 16, 1884.

Dear Putnam: From the first shrill bugle note of yours, sounded for our humanity's triumph, I determined to send you the very first greenback I should find at my command. Your earnest appeals hav the ring of the true metal. There are living chords in every human heart that vibrate aloud in reading those appeals for freedom, the good, and the true. And, if I had the funds, I would send you a thousand as freely as I do this mite. Success is assured!

Yours truly La Roy Sunderland.

Our good friend, Wm. Reynolds, of Utah, is doing a good work. He has already secured five annual memberships, besides his own contribution, and is still pushing ahead. He is the Phil. Sheridan of our frontier forces.

MILWAUKEE LEAGUE DOING HUMANE WORK.

The Liberal League met on the evening of the 12th, at 216 Grand avenue. Every seat was occupied. Dr. H. S. Brown presided, and Dr. Juliet H. Severance acted as secretary. The committee appointed at the last meeting to investigate affairs at the Soldiers' Home reported, submitting a letter from Geo. M. Hare, with a statement that he had been released after proceedings to secure a writ of habeas corpus had been instituted. In his letter, which was written in the guardhouse, Hare says he was imprisoned there for criticising the management of the Soldiers' Home in a Dubuque paper. He charges that the guard-house has vile ventilation; is unprovided with chairs, and without even a pillow to lay a weary head upon. He had to eat without knife, fork, or spoon, and had no tobacco or reading matter allowed him. There were nineteen men in the prison—three of them ex-commissioned officers, four one-legged men, and one was blind. They were allowed but one towel a week, and this was for joint use. He became sick, and no doctor was sent for. The governor's orderly went into the guard-house Saturday night, drunk, and kept everybody awake all night. Some of the men in the guard-house were sent there for thirty days solely because they missed roll-call. Hare enumerates other causes for complaint, and asks if a citizen of the United States is to be imprisoned without hearing, and without proper authority, and placed in such surroundings simply because he dared express his opinion.

The League will take further steps for an investigation. On conclusion of the discussion regarding the Soldiers' Home matter, R. C. Spencer addressed the meeting on "The Republican Party." George Godfrey and Mrs. Dr. Juliet Severence answered him.

The Appeal of the Liberal League.

From the Banner of Light.

The cause of Liberalism is before the great public with its demands and resolutions, which are to be read in another column. No one can peruse this timely and forcible proclamation of purpose by a large and rapidly increasing body of most intelligent men and women without being profoundly impressed with the comprehensiv character of their expressed views and the deep sincerity and wholeness of their convictions. The demands put forth by them before the public are certainly such as should readily commend themselvs to all Liberal, reflecting minds. The spirit in which they are uttered, though radical, is far from being open to the charge of destructivness. It would only clear away the recognized obstructions to a new advance of society and a larger expansion of the human mind, in order that the work of reconstruction may go on unembarrassed by the dead weights of old dogmas and lifeless prejudices. The object is purely one of benevolence and aspiration. The intent is only to benefit and bless humanity by the speedy emancipation of the human spirit from its present state of bondage.

What are the demands which the National Liberal League make, that they should not be heeded? They demand nine things, each one of which is firmly rooted in reason and morality. Read the list and then judge, if possible, without prejudice or passion. Ought not, for instance, all forms of ecclesiastical property to be taxed like other property, under a government that refuses to protect any and all forms of religious organization? Ought orthodox chaplains to be called upon to pray in official places, when not even the necessity for prayer, public or private, is once recognized in our Constitution? Is it right that one portion of the people should be taxed for the support of the sectarian institutions of another portion, whether in the name and guise of religion or anything else? Ought a government like ours to hav anything to do, as a mere government, with the holding of religious services, or to insist on the use of the Christian Bible any more than the Mohammedan Koran, or the Materialists' creed, in the schools which are supported by the constant taxation of all? Why should presidents or governors appoint religious feasts or fasts for a part of the people only to observe, if religion is really no possible part of their official business?

Or on what ground of authority, derived from the fundamental law if derived at all, is the judicial oath required and administered in the courts of law and in the various departments of government, when a plain and simple affirmation is just as binding on the human conscience, and the "pains and penalties" of "perjury" stand waiting for those who affirm that which is not true? By what common or by what conceded right, too, are laws made and enforced which command the religious observance of any one day in the week, to which a certain amount of the population, but not all, hav agreed to affix a peculiar character—call it by the name of Sunday or any other name? And while the large majority of the people of this country may consent in silence to be called Christians, even while those who style themselvs Christian ministers are voiding their abuse upon them as Infidels and heathen in their belief and practice, is it in any sense consonant with justice, with truth, with a spirit of equality before the statute law, that into the Constitution under which all liv and which all unitedly support and sustain shall be injected the sacerdotal power, always and everywhere tyrannical because resting on naked authority, that designs only the absolute conquest of men's consciences and the irresponsible governance of their conduct?

These, now, are every one of them vital questions; and, taken together, they constitute a cause, an issue, that is of sufficient importance to challenge the widest public attention. The National Liberal League is the champion of this cause, and stands forth to meet this issue. It steers clear of party politics, and ascends at once to the level of universal principles. It deals with the underlying questions of human progress. It is tolerant of the great and confused variety of opinions that accumulate around questions of reform and reconstruction, and aims only for the perfect freedom of all minds, for equal rights for all, and for nothing but fair play in all that appertains to political government. The cause could hardly be stated more clearly or impressivly than it is stated, or argued with more cogency and conclusivness. Thus should it be, for it is a cause to enlist the sympathies, as well as the reason, of all men and women, and one that appeals to us all for immediate and practical action for the sake of securing actual and visible results. We may depend upon it that unless Liberalism dominates in this country, things will be sure to fall under the control of ecclesiasticism, which is ever the foe to political liberty.

There is no question that the civilized world is changing front on the issues that once were thought of vital importance to man. A new era is being ushered in. It is the era of spiritual influences and spiritual power. The old dogmas of authority are dead. Not even the boasts of human reason are equal to the marshaling and leading of the new forces which are appearing in the social life of civilized man. It is becoming more and more evident that all power proceeds from the spirit, even as spirit is the only substance; of which matter and all external things are the forms visible through the sense to the inward consciousness. People are beginning to comprehend the great and high truth that we all liv in the spirit alone, of which the body is but the constant manifestation. Hence they are beginning to understand that their lives, and conduct, and institutions of every kind, should be more in harmony with spiritual laws, which alone govern and control everything. To the intuitions of the open and recipient spirit the highest reason is subordinate and subject, and hence to heed these intuitions is to wait studiously upon teachers who are ever ready to lend a new illumination to our reason, and to lift continually our external life to the level of the ideal, which is the spiritual.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

"Out to Old Aunt Mary's."

Wasn't it pleasant, O brother mine,
In those old days of the lost sunshine
Of youth, when the Saturday's chores were through
And the "Sunday's wood" in the kitchen, too,
And we went visiting, I and you,
Out to old Aunt Mary's.

It all comes back so clear to-day,
Though I am bald and you are gray—
Out by the barn lot and down the lane
We patter along in the dust again,
As light as the tips of the drops of rain,
Out to old Aunt Mary's.

We cross the pasture, and through the wood,
Where the old gray snag of poplar stood,
Where the hammering redheads hopped away,
Aud the buzzard raised in the open sky,
And lolled and circled as he went by
Out to old Aunt Mary's.

And then in the dust of the road again;
And the teams we met and the countrymen;
And the long highway, with the sunshine spread
As thick as butter on country bread,
And our cares behind and our hearts ahead,
Out to old Aunt Mary's.

I see her now in the open door
Where the little gourds grew up the sides and o'er
The clapboard roof. And her face—ah, me!
Wasn't it good for a boy to see?
And wasn't it good for a boy to be
Out to old Aunt Mary's.

And O my brother, so far away,
This is to tell you she waits to-day
To welcome us. Aunt Mary fell
Asleep this morning, whispering, "Tell
The boys to come." And all is well
Out to old Aunt Mary's.

Jack—A Mendicant.

A smooth-haired, whitish-brown terrier it was, with cropped ears, a black patch over one eye, and only half a tail; a thin, shadowy sort of thing that used to grub about in the twilight in the gutters, and in odd corners where poor people throw waste and rubbish, picking up its own living as best it could. If it had not known how to "fend for itself," it must hav fared hardly indeed; for though it had a master who loved it as he would hav loved the sun in the heavens, could his blind eyes hav been lighted for one moment by its beams, and who treasured it as he did the memory of his dead wife, dead daughter, dead grandchild, yet he had nothing but his love to giv it, and love, as we all know, though it never faileth, and is greater than faith and hope, yet in hard times cannot so much as buy an ounce of bread, nor even get a bone for a dog.

Caleb had been blind for more than twenty years. Once he had been a strong, skilful workman who had never known a dinnerless table nor fireless hearth. Things had gone well with him in early life; he had married a stout young country-woman, and had only one child by her—a blue-eyed, fair-haired darling, whom they had christened Martha, but whom everyone loved to call Mattie. She looked as if she had been born to a pet name, and she stuck to it as a right. Mattie was sent to school and taught embroideries and needlework; she was not to work hard, as her father and mother had done before her, but was to lead a quiet, gentle life; and if, by and by, when father and mother were getting old and could no longer work for their darling, some good honest workman was to come along and offer to marry her—well!—then he should hav her, and their blessing go with her.

But before Mattie was ten years old, or there was any thought of father and mother getting old, Caleb's great trouble had come upon him. There was a huge fire at the factory where he worked, and Caleb, in his zeal to save his master s property, was much burnt about his face, arms, and chest. They took him to the hospital, where they did the best they could for him, and he came out of it in a month's time with limbs patched, face sound, though scarred, but eyesight gone forever.

How the stout young wife would hav wept over him if she had had time to weep! But time meant money in those days, and she set to work with a will to get the daily bread. No more embroideries for little Mattie; sewing and stitching will serve her in better stead now, for she can earn a shilling here and a shilling there by plain needlework among her poor neighbors.

And so things went on for ten years or more. Caleb turned woman in the house and cooked their small meals, and kept things straight and neat as he could without his eyesight; and the women turned men, as poor women often hav to do, and brought in the pounds and the shillings, or, failing the pounds, the shillings and the pennies, and even in those days had always wherewithal to help a brother or a sister less fortunate than themselvs.

Then there came another change; fever set in in that neighborhood, and the brave, strong mother was the first to fall a victim to it. Caleb was dazed with grief. Mattie wept her heart out, then set to work again, but this time with less of spirit and courage. From house to house Caleb groped his way, begging for work—he would do what he could for a sixpence a day; he was, so he said, "a giant in strength." "True," said the people, "but a blind giant is no use to us, and we are too poor to pay sixpence a day for nothing."

"I will go into the workhouse," said Caleb. "No man shall say I liv idle upon my little girl's earnings." Then Mattie clung about his knees and besought him not to leave her, telling him a secret she had meant to tell the dead mother, how that she had married secretly a fine-looking young fellow, who had gone, she knew not where, nor even whether the name in which he had married her was his own.

Caleb lifted up his voice and cursed the day wherein he had lost his eyesight. "If I had but the glimmer of daylight wherewith to guide my steps, I would search the world through to find the false-hearted coward who has brought this shame to our door."

Mattie drooped day by day, but still she managed to keep her customers together, and sent home smart dresses for gay young shopgirls to wear in the summer evenings when they went walking out with their sweethearts. By and by a second Mattie came—a little fair-haired, blue-eyed thing, like Mattie the first; and though Caleb cursed again the false-hearted man who had left his Mattie to struggle through her troubles alone, the little creature came like a gleam of sunshine into the dark life, and no one thought more of her baby comforts, or took more tender care of the tiny, fragil thing than the old blind grandfather.

For Caleb was fast becoming a prematurely old man now. He lacked the first of youth's greatest preservers—honest, steady, constant work; and he lacked also the second—good, plain, wholesome food. What wonder if his back was bent, his brow wrinkled, and his hair thin and gray!

How they managed to struggle through another five years he did not know, no one quite knew. The furniture in the little room (they had only one room now) grew less and less; also their bread was often eaten without butter; also when the winter came round Mattie began to hav a cough and complain of a pain at her chest. Then Caleb whispered something in little Mattie's ear, and the child led him down the stairs and along the streets to a bright, sunshiny wall in the big city, where people were passing backward and forward all day long, and where, if the old blind man held out his hat, there might be a chance of finding a few stray pence in it at the end of the day.

The poor people in the house where they lived felt their hearts touched when they saw the old man and the small, white child creeping down the stairs together, and heard the poor, suffering daughter coughing as she stooped over her dresses and shirts. They shook their heads at each other. "It can't go on much longer," said one to the other; "and what they'll do without her, God only knows." So they would giv little Mattie a cup of tea or a bit of cheese to take to her mother, and the mother would drink the tea and giv the cheese to the little one, and smile and shake her head and say she couldn't eat.

And one day a small rough boy in the house brought to little Mattie a white terrier pup. "Father was going to drown it," he said, "but I told him I thought you would like it, and may be by and by 'twill help to lead the old man along." Little Mattie took the puppy gratefully, and called him Jack after her boy friend. They knotted a piece of cord together and put it around Jack's neck, and every day the old man, the child, and the terrier pup were to be seen finding their way along the streets to the bright sunshiny wall.

Once as they stood thus in the bleak March weather, with a northwest wind sweeping the streets and drifting the dust into clouds that shut out the spring sunbeams, a poor woman came hurriedly up to them. "You'd best make haste home, Caleb," she said, "if you want to see your daughter again alive." She forgot, poor soul, for the moment that Caleb hadn't seen his daughter for ten years or more, and never could—in this life, at any rate—see her again. But poor people, you know, havn't much time to spend in choosing their words, and they don't expect other people to be very nice in the matter either.

So Mattie, and Jack, and the grandfather trudged the streets, and for once in a way got home by daylight, to find Mattie the elder (poor child, she wasn't five-and twenty then) lying on the bed, the sheet stained with blood, and her feet and hands growing damp and cold.

"She's goin' fast," said one of the women about the bedside.

"O God," cried Caleb, kneeling down on the bare boards, "if only for one moment I might see those blue eyes before they close forever!" Useless the prayer, the beating of the hands against the closed barred doors; Mattie's life ebbed out that day before the twilight fell, and—well—two days after, there was another mound in the big pauper burial-place outside the city. That was all.

"Yet I liv on," said Caleb, as day after day he took his stand by the sunshiny wall, Mattie by his side, and Jack on his haunches a little in front. Mattie's clothes were very thin now, and her shoes almost dropping from her feet. One by one the little odd comforts the dead mother had bought her were taken to the pawnshop, and a few coppers, or at most a sixpence, brought back in return. As winter crept on she began to grow white and shiver as the mother had done and then cough and draw her breath in as though to let it out gave her pain. The neighbors began to shake their heads again as they had over the mother. "She's going the same way," they said whispering together, "and God help the old man then!" Going the same way, was she? Before the first winter snow had settled on the mother's grave, she was gone. And Caleb? Well, he had his dog left him, and his old clothes, and his sunshiny wall, and what would you more? Poor people can't hav everything they want, you know, in this life.

When little Mattie lay stretched white and cold on the mattress on the floor (the bedstead had long since disappeared) on which her mother had died, the poor people came in and did the best they could for her; poor people are not always thrashing horses and kicking dogs to death, as some think; they sometimes do little kindnesses one for the other, and show a refinement which people in higher ranks occasionally forget. So one brought a clean white sheet and wrapped the little girl in it, another combed out her fair hair, and a third—a flower-girl—put a spray of fern and geranium into her small, thin hand.

"She's looking that lovely, Caleb, she is," said a brown old woman of sixty, with a handkerchief tied over her head.

"Lord, for this once!" pleaded Caleb, lifting his hands high above his head. "For one moment only let my eyes be opened, that they may see the face I hav loved and never known." The poor people stood back and heard his prayer, with their breath drawn in. Almost they expected a miracle to be performed—had they not heard of such things in the churches?—and for a moment the film to be lifted from Caleb's eyes, that they might rest on the face he had loved so well before the cold earth had shut it in for evermore.

All in vain. No answering Ephphatha was breathed down from the silent everlasting heavens. Caleb's hands fell down helplessly to his side, and Jack crept out of a corner and licked them, and then the parish people sent their undertakers to carry Mattie away to the same big cemetery where her mother was sleeping.

All gone but Jack! Well, a dog is something, after all, to hav left one; and when one is old and blind, and poor, one doesn't expect a great deal in life, you know, but is just thankful for a crust of bread to eat, some straw or old clothes to lie down on at night, and a sunshiny wall to lean against in the daytime; so the dog was altogether something extra in the way of mercies. "How he do liv on is a marvel," one to another would wonder, watching the old man creeping down-stairs day after day to take his stand in the streets; and, "The dog is like a child to him now," they would say, as they noted Jack sitting on his stump of a tail, waiting for a gap in the crush of carts and carriages before he would venture to lead his master across the busy high-road.

It was in those days that Jack first began to "fend for himself." As long as the two Matties lived, there was always a plate of odds and ends of some sort—scrape it together how they might—waiting for him inside the door when he came in from his morning's work; but after they were gone, things were different. It was hard work enough for Caleb to get his own daily bread and collect the eighteen pennies which paid for his miserable little cupboard—attic, it was supposed to be—at the top of the house; so when he came in at four o'clock in the winter's twilight with a loaf of bread and a few pence, the cord was unknotted from Jack's neck and the poor animal let free to forage for himself in the alleys and gutters. Jack in this way became very punctual in his habits. At four o'clock he was released from duty; it took him about an hour to find his dinner in the streets, and punctually at five he might be seen sneaking along some by-street with a bone in his mouth, or the remnants of some fish, dodging skilfully between passers-by till he reached home, where at his master's feet he would finish in calm enjoyment his hardly-earned meal, to which, be it noted, Caleb never failed to add some portion of his own, however scanty it had been.

Find her little sister too.

CROSS WORD ENIGMA.

My first is in day, but not in night;
My seconds in ghost, but not in fright;
My third is in ground, but not in sky;

My fifth is in poundeth, but not in press;
My whole is what we would all like to possess.

A DECAPITATION IN AN EASTERN STATE!—THE GUILLOTINE RESTORED!

In a state of the East,
We see how a priest
Has left his discourse without head;
For its head we can take
The head of a snake,
It will do quite as well instead.
In the name the state
Let the headless thing wait,
Till something awakens the dead!

RIDDLE.

I hav a bed, but never sleep,
A tongue, but never talk,
Two pairs of shoes, and yet no feet;
I run, but never walk.
My bed is way above my reach,
And that is why, you see,
I never lie upon my bed,
My bed is laid on me.

We can make our lives sublime,
And departing leave behind us,

Correspondence.

BRACEVILLE, ILL., Oct. 284.

MISS WIXON: I wish to correct a mistake in my letter. Braceville is a village of six thousand inhabitants, instead of six hundred. I wish I had the ability to write some of my experiences for the children of your corner. I passed the first seventeen years of my life on the prairies of Illinois, twelve miles from the nearest post-office or market place. Mother used to keep the spade standing by the door to kill snakes with. And what snakes! Blow snakes, blue-racers, and rattle snakes to be seen almost every day; and the prairie wolf as large as a good-sized dog, could be seen trotting across the open prairie with his long, bushy tail hanging to the ground. In those days we did not pull our blinds down when we lit the lamp, but we used to set the lamp in the window, so it would shine out as far as it could, in hopes some belated traveler might see it and be guided on his way, and perhaps be saved from perishing on the prairie.

Wishing you continued success, I remain a friend,

THE BIBLE ANALYZED. In Twenty Lectures. By John R. Kelso, A.M. New York: TRUTH SEEKER office. Pp. 833. Price $3.00.

Mr. Kelso is an ex-soldier. He served his country in a war which resulted in the deliverance of millions from physical slavery. Here he fights against the more degrading slavery of the human mind to a book, falsely assumed to be a revelation from an eternally existing person—the creator of all things and beings that exist. He proves not only that the assumption in regard to the book is false, but that such a person is wholly imaginary. If human reason is not a worse than worthless faculty, then, in the light of Mr. Kelso's lectures, attributing divine inspiration to such a collection of writings as the Old and New Testaments, has been one of the greatest calamities that has ever befallen the human race. This is by no means denying the usefulness of the book as a human production, for the most pernicious of the lies and forgeries of the past may be useful in the future. A fictitious history of the past may help the future, but surely a true one would be better. Mr. Kelso's aim is simply to overthrow the baleful faith in the divine inspiration of the Bible or any part of it, which he effectually accomplishes by not only proving its history fictitious, but its morality often bad and worse than brutal.

Of course, to make out his case against the divine inspiration of the Bible, he does not need to prove an absence of all historical truth. It is enough to prove the presence of deliberate falsehood and forgery. After the admissions of Bishop Colenso, an honest Infidel may fairly be allowed to express some feeling of indignation at the cool attitude of the clergy of this end of the nineteenth century in upholding the demonstrated lies and forgeries of Hilkiah and Ezra.

The publication of Mr. Kelso's honest and able book will make it necessary for the church either to greatly amend the Bible or ignore it altogether. Refusing to read is only temporizing. Reason is nothing but common sense, and common sense is not confined to the clergy or to any priesthood. There are moral axioms scattered through the Bible which will not be lost with it, for they exist wherever human thought does. How much soever violated, they are identical with the laws of self-preservation, and will become more and more distinct as time and knowledge advance and force and fraud decay.

If it was a fact that God, selected as the typical man through whom he should carry out his scheme of saving the world, a man who asked his wife to tell a lie to save his own life, then, in a moral sense, the inference is unfavorable to God (Gen. xii, 13). If it was not a fact, the Bible is guilty of at least one lie, and that a quite fundamental one. In any decent moral light, Pharaoh appears in that chapter to great advantage compared with the "father of the faithful." ELIZUR WRIGHT.

FIAT LUX. A Two-Hours' Candid Inquiry into Biblical Harmonies. By Dr. W. R. Bachelor, of Pauline, Ark. Price 25 cents.

Like any other two-hours' candid inquiry into Biblical harmonies, the inquiries of Dr. Bachelor show that the alleged harmonies do not exist. The writer says in his brief preface that he has no apology to offer for writing this work, only that he desires to contribute something toward that grand movement of universal mental liberty and Freethought which characterizes the age. Knowing that reason will prevail over superstitious faiths and mysticism, he has taken his stand for truth, reason, and Freethought. His examination of the Bible is both thorough and effectiv. The thirty-nine octavo pages of his pamphlet are crowded with facts and arguments.

SCOTT-BROWNE'S BOOK OF SHORTHAND ABBREVIATIONS. A Tabulated List of all the Abbreviations of the System, Numbering 300, with a Reference Vocabulary of 3,000 Words in Common Use. 58 pp; satin-limp covers. Price 50 cents. Sold at this office.

This book is intended chiefly for shorthand writers who use the Ben Pitman system of phonography. Mr. Scott-Browne states that the necessity for such a work as the present one arises from the fact that many words are susceptible of being written in divers ways. He has discovered which ways are the easiest and the most legible, and recorded them for the benefit of the shorthand student. In order to understand these word-signs which he has given, it is of course necessary for the pupil to make a preliminary examination of some text-book of the Pitman system. It will then be seen that they are not arbitrary signs used to represent words, but are generally made up of the consonants used in spelling, and are skeletons of the words themselvs. A few specimens of these skeletons and contractions may prove interesting and instructiv to the general reader; more especially so to phonographers. Take the word characteristic; it is made thus:  , and read literally from this sign is simply krakcist. It is plain enough when you know what it is. Shorthand is no respecter of persons. For the Almighty Mr. Scott-Browne writes . The word is all there except the vowels. Jehovah is turned off with this fish-hook-like thing,  , which is nothing more nor less than Jv; while the signature of Jesus Christ, written in shorthand, would be, briefly,  . The question of immortality is dismissed thus,  , and the beyond is represented with a brief character, viz:  . A sign made thus  will strike the reader as a painful case of limited circumstances; and no one would suspect an innocent-looking mark like this of being loaded:  . We are not let off so lightly, however, on all words. Incandescence and incendiarism, made respectivly,  and  , are more formidable. In these words all the consonants are present. Incandescence is accomplished with seven movements of the pen. In longhand thirty-six are required. Eighty per cent is, then, saved on one of the most intricate words in the system. Altogether shorthand is an interesting study, and reveals, as nothing else does, the superfluous letters with which our orthography is cumbered.

Mr. Scott-Browne has a college of phonography but a few doors from THE TRUTH SEEKER office, where he fits pupils for the position of amanuenses, and he has gained the name of doing this in a shorter time than the majority of teachers in his line. He is one of the most genial of men.

The subject of shorthand ought hardly to be mentioned unconnected with the work of Stephen Pearl Andrews, with whose name left out the history of the Ben Pitman system in this country cannot be written. Mr. Andrews, nearly half a century ago, brought the art from England, studying it on his passage from that country to this, and teaching it almost before he had himself mastered its intricacies. He was one of the first stenographers of the United States Congress; published a text-book of phonography, and taught Mr. Edward F. Underhill, the present president of the Stenographers' Association, how to write shorthand. The system had then hardly reached the perfection which it has since attained, but it answered practical purposes. Several improved methods hav been built upon Pitman's, among the best of which is Scott-Browne's. Mr. T. C. Leland, an early pupil of Mr. Andrews, also has a system which in simplicity approaches nearest that taught by Andrews & Boyle. Mr. Leland is a professor of the art, and has just opened a series of Sunday classes at 744 Broadway, where those so disposed will hav an opportunity to break the Sabbath up into pothooks.

Mr. Scott-Browne has in press "Part II. Text Book," which is a treatis on and a compendium of the art, and a guide to all sorts of reporting.

IN SEARCH OF GOLD. The Story of a Liberal Life. By Don Juan. H. W. Thompson, publisher, 64 College Place, New York.

Many persons will read this book with profit. It reveals numerous errors into which an amateur novelist is liable to fall; therefore to writers it will be helpful. Its hero does many foolish things which he ought not to hav done, and the trouble he got into will be a warning to all other heroes. This hero, Joseph Lockwell, is represented as an Infidel more for the fun of the thing than from conviction. He passed through a great number of surprising adventures from Maine to California, the relation of which is done more or less ably. It was probably the intention of the writer that his incidents should hav the semblance of probability; but when a solitary man is made to bail out the sunken hulk of a large vessel with a tomato can, the reader's credulity is somewhat overtaxed. However, the motivs of the author are undoubtedly of the best. The book, than which many worse has been written, can be obtained by addressing the publisher. Price, $1.50.

"THE National Secular Almanac," edited by Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant, is out for 1885, with its budget of useful information. The "Story of 1884" is told by Mr. Bradlaugh; "The Future Life" is discussed by Mrs. Besant; Alice Bradlaugh contributes an article on "Esthetics and Ascetics," which is full of Sweetness and Light; Henry G. Atkinson writes on "Fear and the Knowledge of Causes;" and G. Standring treats of "The Sacred Show Business." A calendar, statistics, etc., fill out the complement. The "National Secular Almanac" is a staid and dignified publication, but it does not impart to this era the illuminated tint that will be observable when THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1885 makes its appearance. The price of the "Secular Almanac" is 25 cts.

THE "Freidenker-Almanach fur das yahr 1885" is out. Its motto is "Freiheit, Bildung and Wohlstand fur Alle!" Those are our sentiments. This almanac is printed in German, and has 118 pages devoted to its calendar and literary department, and some squibs, under the head of "Humoristisches," which will undoubtedly make the Teutonic citizen smile. The "Freidenker Almanach" is issued by the Freidenker Publishing Co. of Milwaukee. The greatest loss one can experience from not understanding German comes from the fact that he cannot profit by the excellent publications of this enterprising company.

THIRD EDITION.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

New! Eloquent! Elegant! Splendid!

JUST PUBLISHED.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

Gems of Thought.

EVERY individual ought to feel a desire to improve himself and his own usefulness, and to improve the world, if only a little, to leave it some better than he found it, some wiser and some happier for his having lived in it. This is all within our power if we will but act up to the best knowledge we hav. We can do as well as the angels are supposed to do if we only make the necessary effort, and curb every incentiv to do that calculated to injure ourselvs, or our fellow-beings.—D. M. Bennett.

LET me play the fool:
With mirth and laughter let old wrinkles come;
And let my liver rather heat with wine,
Than my heart cool with mortifying groans.
Why should a man, whose blood is warm within,
Sit like his grandsire cut in alabaster?
Sleep when he wakes? and creep into the jaundice
By being peevish? —Shakspere's Merch. of Venice.

THERE is only one cure for the evils which newly-acquired freedom produces; and that cure is freedom. When a prisoner first leaves his cell, he can not bear the light of day! he is unable to discriminate colors, or recognize faces. But the remedy is, not to remand him into his dungeon, but to accustom him to the rays of the sun. The blaze of truth and liberty may at first dazzle and bewilder nations which hav become half-blind in the house of bondage. But let them gaze on, and they will soon be able to bear it. In a few years men learn to reason. The extreme violence of opinions subsides. Hostil theories correct each other. The scattered elements of truth cease to contend, and begin to coalesce. And at length a system of justice and order is adduced out of the chaos.—Macaulay's Milton.

WHY is there any misery at all in the world? Not by chance, surely. From some cause, then. Is it from the intention of the Deity? But he is perfectly benevolent. Is it contrary to his intention? But he is almighty. Nothing can shake the solidity of this reasoning, so short, so clear, so decisiv; except we assert that these subjects exceed all human capacity, and that our common measures of truth and falsehood are not applicable to them; a topic which I hav all along insisted on, but which you hav from the beginning rejected with scorn and indignation. —Hume's Dialogs Concerning Nat. Religion.

FORTY years ago, before my "Life of Jesus" appeared, the impression had long been looming up before the minds of thoughtful students of theology, that no such supernatural things could hav occurred in Jesus' career as were narrated in the gospels and had been believed by the church down to that period; neither could they believe in the unnaturally natural interpretations offered by the rationalistic expositors of scripture; doubts, too, as to the apostolic origin of the gospels, and as to the historical character of these writings in general had sprung up here and there. And yet, when I brought these fragments of thought together, and showed that the evangelic narratives are neither apostolic nor historical; that the miracles they recount belong to myth rather than to history; that everything about Jesus was, in reality, perfectly natural, albeit we cannot now giv an account of every circumstance of his life —when, in my "Life of Jesus," I put all these things together in consecutiv order, every one, young and old, was indignant, and the author's name "the synonym for every deed accursed."—Strauss's Old and New Faith.

HOW much lies in laughter; the cipher-key, wherewith we decipher the whole man! Some men wear an everlasting barren simper; in the smile of others lies a cold glitter, as of ice; the fewest are able to laugh, what can be called laughter, but only sniff and titter and snigger from the throat outward; or at least, produce some whiffling, husky cachinnation, as if they were laughing through wool; of none such comes good. The man who cannot laugh is not only fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils, but his whole life is already a treason and a stratagem.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

THE man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treason, stratagems, and spoils;
The motions of his spirit are dull as night,
And his affections dark as Erebus;
Let no such man be trusted.
—Shakspere's Merch. of Venice.

DR. JOHNSON could scarcely be induced to admit the truth of any narrativ which struck him as odd, and it was long, for example, before he would believe even in the earthquake as Lisbon. Yet he seriously discussed the truth of second-sight; he carefully investigated the Cock-lane Ghost—a goblin who anticipated some of the modern phenomena of so-called "Spiritualism," and with almost equal absurdity. He told stories to Boswell about "a shadowy being," which had once been seen by Cave and declared that he once heard his mother call "Sam," when he was at Oxford, and she at Lichfield. The apparent inconsistency was in truth natural enough. Any man who clings with unreasonable pertinacity to the prejudices of his childhood, must be alternately credulous and skeptical in excess. In both cases, he judges by his fancies, in defiance of evidence; and accepts and rejects according to his likes and dislikes, instead of his estimates of logical proof.—Leslie Stephen's Johnson.

HE that takes away reason to make way for revelation, puts out the light of both, and does much the same as if he would persuade a man to put out his eyes, the better to receive the remote light of an invisible star by a telescope.—John Locke.

Odds and Ends.

THE Whitehall Times remarks that Noah was the arkitect of his own fortunes.

COLLEGE professor (to class in mineralogy): "Can you recall a mineral occurring in the liquid form?" Apt student—"Milk; because it comes in quarts!"

LITTLE boy to juvenile neighbor: "My pa's a Christian an' reads the Bible every day an' prays to God; does yourn?" "Naw," (indignantly), "my fadder's a Democrat and swears by Gineral Jackson."

"WHAT did Cain say when the Lord asked him where his brother was?" asked a Sunday-school teacher. None of the boys answered, but the smallest boy in the class snapped his fingers and said: "I've done forgot what Cain said, but I know he sassed the Lord back."

IN a Sunday-school the teacher had been explaining the text, "Let your loins be girded." Wishing to see if they understood the explanation he said to a boy: "Well, tell me how and why we are commanded to gird up our loins?" "To keep up our breeches, sir," replied the youth.

"MAMMA, don't these little chickens hav no mothers?" asked a child at the Exhibition hatchery, the other day. "No, my love, they are hatched by machinery," replied the mother. "Children hav to hav mothers, don't they mamma?" "Yes darling." "Could't children be hatched by machinery, mamma?" "No, dear. Come on now."

A RELIGIOUS editor recentlv attempted to telegraph to friends in a neighboring town: "Cannot be down till Thursday—foreman drunk." He went down on Thursday and was astonished by the hilarious manner in which his friends received him. It came out that the telegram when received read: "Cannot come down till Thursday forenoon—drunk."

THIS is Bill Nye's advice as to the treatment of hydrophobia: Never seek a quarrel with a hydrophobic dog. Treat him well, but maintain a haughty reserve until you can get over the garden wall. Should a dog, who afterward turned out to be hydrophobic, eat away the calf of your leg, settle up your business affairs, bite some one whom you wish to hav remember you after you are gone, and get yourself measured for a funeral sermon. Death should never find us entirely unprepared.

A FEEBLE old darky struggled painfully in. "Boss," he said, "I'se an old, old man. I was bo'n in ole Vahginney an' libbed dar mos' onto ninety-eight years, an' I wants yo' ter assis' me er little dis mawnin' boss, ef yo' pleas' sah?" "You knew George Washington of course?" "No sah, I nebber seed him." "What! You lived in Virginia ninety-eight years, and never saw George Washington?" "Dat am de fac', boss. Ise an hones' old man, an' am too far gone in dis world fer to tell er lie. I nebber seed young George, but Lor', sah, his po' ole gran'fadder an' gran'mudder yuse ter think er pow'ful sight ob me, boss."

THE Sunday-school superintendent was lecturing the scholars last Sunday morning on the wickedness of stealing. After he had talked some time, he asked them questions on what he had said, in order to fix his good counsel in their minds. "Now, children," he said, "is it as wrong to steal a pin as it is a hundred thousand dollars?" "Yes, sir," they all cried. "And are those who steal made happy by it?" "No, sir," came the chorus. "Tell me, now, where do the bad people go who disobey the commandment and steal?" "Canada," squealed a little boy over in the corner, before the crowd had a chance to answer; and the superintendent had to leave the room for repairs.

THE telephone girl was out of humor about something, and when the fire alarm was given, she leisurely pinned up her back hair and looked at herself in the glass before replying. Then she went to the phone and rang a reply, and said: "Hello!" "Hello! Giv me Rev. Ebenezer Bellwhistle." The Rev. Ebenezer was at once switched on. "Hello, Dr. Bellwhistle, is this you?" "Yea, verily; this is myself." "Do you know where my wife is to night? Hav you seen her?" Here the cruel girl switched on a jockey who had charge of a good trotting mare and who was telling his employer about an attack of colic she had undergone, and the reply made the inquiring husband blue with rage. It was as follows: "Oh, you needn't worry about her. I've got her snugly bedded down in the stable, and hav been rubbing her legs and slapping her sides vigorously all the evening. You needn't be the least bit uneasy. I'll take just as good care of your darling as you would if you were here." Then the husband hung up his phone and rang off, and if he had not found his wife reading in the back yard there would hav been a tragedy. As it is, the preacher is on trial for drunkenness and lying.

"YOU didn't know that I was an inventer, did you boys?" inquired a drummer of his companions on a Panhandle train. "Well, I am, though. Hav got a big thing, too. Got it right here under my seat. It beats the Keely motor all to pieces. Do you see this little box? What if it isn't bigger than a hat box? I tell you there's power enough inside of it to blow up the boiler of the locomotiv ahead there, or knock this train from the track. It's powerful, and no mistake, and dangerous to handle. Killed two men in Indianapolis last week. Not long ago it tackled a big clothing house in Philadelphia and absolutely, ruined it. The week before that it wrecked a steamer in the Chesapeake bay. The pilot had been experimenting with it for several months, and finally got careless. No trouble about power, power enough to knock the earth of its axis. The trouble is to apply it. Now; I'll take the lid off and show you; oh, you fellows needn't jump off the train. I know how to handle it, and there ain't any danger." "What do you call it?" "It's a storage battery—the most perfect and powerful storage battery ever constructed. I had it made in New Jersey. Before taking the lid off I'll turn the box over and show you—come back here; I tell you there's no danger—and show you the label." The box was turned over and on its bottom the trembling drummers saw this inscription: "2 qts, N. J. applejack."

MR. PETRIE, the archæologist, has returned to England laden with rich spoils of his Egyptian investigations. Among the treasures are a hut of the time of Nero, embroideries of the Ptolemaic period, and a fine gilded slab of the time of Nectabanus.

THE Norristown Herald has observed that the seats in a Western church are set on pivots, like those in a dry goods store. This enables the fair worshiper, who sits pretty well in front, to turn around and count the number of new bonnets in the house without screwing her head off, almost, and going home with a stiff neck.

MRS. HENRY POTT has organized a propaganda in England with the object of proving that Bacon, not Shakspere, is the real author of the dramas foolishly credited to the Swan of Avon. At a recent meeting of the Baconites, Mrs. President Pott abused poor Shakspere in a style to make his bones move under their epitaph.

AMONG the instructions issued for the guidance of the proposed Nile expedition the following is found: "The camels are to be treated with consideration and kindness, their peculiarities are to be studied, and no ill-usage or foul language is to be resorted to." This is carrying the prevention of cruelty to animals to an extreme.

PROFESSOR JOHN TYNDALL realized thirteen thousand dollars on his lectures in this country in 1872, which he refused to take away. He left the money in the hands of trustees for the benefit of American students who wish to prepare themselvs abroad for original research in physics. As there has been a scarcity of suitable candidates, the fund has increased to about thirty thousand dollars.

Two hundred women of the city of Mexico, members of leading families of that city, says an account, went Monday to the sanctuary of Our Lady of Guadaloupe to pray the Holy Virgin for intercession to prevent cholera invading Mexico. Praying will never hav the effect to keep cholera out of any country where the inhabitants are habitually filthy. Bathing as a practice should be substituted.

WHEN the late bishop of London revisited the University Chapel at Cambridge after long absence, he found the same verger there whom he remembered in his college days, and said to him: "You hav much to be grateful for." "I hav, indeed, my lord," replied the old man, "for I hav heard every sermon that has been preached in the chapel for fifty years, and, bless the Lord, I am a Christisn still."

WHATEVER the Salvationists lack in taste, they are never wanting in attractiv titles. A Londoner says: "The other morning, Maud and I were coming out of a shop near Oxford circus, when a woman in a 'salvation bonnet' handed us a bit of paper. It lies on my pink blotting-paper now, and deeply outblushes it, as well it may. It contain an announcement of a 'demonstration' to be held, conducted by 'Commandant' H. Booth, assisted by certain 'staff-captains, staff-lieutenants, and sergeant-majors.' Among the attractions of the evening are announced as speakers, 'Jacko, the Transformed Giant, the Would-be Suicide; Moggie, the Camberwell Wonder; Billy Bray, 102; Tommy the Tramp, and the One-eyed Prophetess.'" Imagin the joy of a sinner saved through Jesus Christ and Tommy the Tramp!

SUNDAY theatricals are tolerated by law in five of the principal cities of the United States. They are San Francisco, Cincinnati, St. Louis, New Orleans, and Chicago. There are eleven regular theaters in Chicago, to say nothing of museums, panoramas, concert halls, and other resorts. If there is any difference to be found in them on Sunday nights, it is that the lights are brighter and the fun more uproarious. It is the custom to giv during the week eight performances, and with Sunday night it runs up to nine. In some theaters a matinee is given on Sunday afternoon.

THE old Schuyler mansion, which has just been sold at Albany, N. Y., was built in 1760 by the wife of General Philip Schuyler, and was a marvel of grandeur in its early days. Franklin, Lafayette, Aaron Burr, DeRochambeau were among its famous guests. Here General Burgoyne was held as prisoner after his surrender at Saratoga; here Alexander Hamilton, and, a generation later, President Fillmore were married. Here, in 1781, a desperate effort was made by Tories and Indians to capture General Schuyler, who gathered his family in an upper room and stood siege resolutely until relief came.

DR. SCHWENINGER, of Munich, has discovered a new mode of reducing the bulk of the human frame. It is never to eat and drink at the same time, but to let two hours intervene. He has, it is said, cured Prince Bismarck of a tendency to obesity in this way. Fat people hav now their choice between four systems. 1. The original Banting, which consists of eating nothing containing starch, sugar, or fat. 2. The German Banting, which allows fat, but forbids sugar or starch. 3. A Munich system, which consists of being clothed in wool and sleeping in flannel blankets instead of sheets. 4. Not eating and drinking at the same time.

HUXLEY givs the following table of what a full-grown man should weigh, and how this weight should be divided: Weight, 154 pounds. Made up thus: Muscles and their appurtenances, 68 pounds; skeleton, 24 pounds; skin, 10 1-2 pounds; fat, 28 pounds; brain, 3 pounds; thoraic viscera, 3 1-2 pounds; abdominal viscera, 11 pounds; blood which would drain from body, 7 pounds. This man ought to consume per diem: Lean beefsteak, 5,000 grains; bread, 6,000 grains; milk, 7,000 grains; potatoes, 3,000 grains; butter, 600 grains; and water, 22,900 grains. His heart should beat 75 times a minute, and he should breathe 15 times a minute. In 24 hours he would vitiate 1,750 cubic feet of pure air to the extent of 1 per cent; a man, therefore, of the weight mentioned, ought to hav 800 cubic feet of well-ventilated space. He would throw off by the skin 18 ounces of water, 300 grains of solid matter, and 400 grains of carbonic acid every 24 hours, and his total loss during the 24 hours would be 6 pounds of water, and a little above 2 pounds of other matter.

MR. BRADLAUGH'S immediately future course is thus outlined by him in a recent speech: "I now come to my personal position on October 23d. It is possible that the Tories might prefer to make delay to the Suffrage bill by a discussion on my right to sit and vote. I propose, with your permission, so far as it rests with me, to disappoint them, and this for two reasons. One, that this is a special session for the purpose of reintroducing the Franchise bill; and second, that the question as to my action on February 11th is still pending undecided before the courts of law. I therefore propose to tender almost the same undertaking that I tendered on my last election, i.e., that I will not present myself until one week after judgment has been delivered in the suit against me by the attorney-general. That judgment can hardly be delivered until I hav addressed the court for a week, including any reply I may hav to make to the attorney-general, and as the courts do not sit until October 24th, whilst the Parliamentary session commences October 23d, it would be unwise, in any case, for me to take any action at the commencement of the session. I cannot, of course, prevent Sir Stafford Northcote from moving a resolution against me, but I desire to put him in the wrong if he does so." Great cheering followed this, and hundreds went to Mr. Bradlaugh to renew their declarations of fidelity for the next election.

THE subject of Theosophy has, according to the Calcutta correspondent of the London Times, occupied a large share of the attention of the Indian press and public recently. It has been brought prominently forward by the publication in the Madras Christian College Magazine of a correspondence alleged to hav passed between Mme. Blavatsky and a Monsieur and Mme. Coulomb, who appear to hav been followers of her but who, having fallen out with the sect, hav placed the letters in the hands of the editor of the magazine. These letters, if genuin, are calculated to prove Mme. Blavatsky to be a consummate impostor, who, with the help of Coulomb, imposed upon the credulous by ingenious trickery. The so-called "astral body" of the Tibetian Mahatma, Koot Hoomi, is described as a crafty arrangement of bladders, muslin, and a mask, while the wonder-working shrine at Madras is said to be a mere conjurer's cabinet. The Theosophists indignantly declare the letters to be impudent forgeries, and state that the Coulombs were expelled from the society, and hav taken this means to revenge themselvs.

PERHAPS the best of the sermons preached in this city, last Sunday, was that by Heber Newton, the heretical Episcopalian. He spoke to the query, why crime increases. "Crime," he said, "is the result of disease in the social organism. It is the hight of folly to close our eyes to this disease. So deeply is it seated that in England crime costs $30,000,000 annually and over seventy-four thousand persons are engaged in detecting lawbreakers. In this country crime has increased beyond all proportion to the population. What makes crime? You answer, Bad men. What makes bad men? I answer, first, the hereditary tendency to evil; and, second, present environment. I place unhesitatingly as first of the influences which lead to crime in this country the present exaggerated estimate of wealth. Money is the one great talisman to social success. When Carlyle declared that the real hell which the average Englishman feared was poverty, he spoke a great truth. This false worship of wealth is forcing men into illegitimate channels to get it. Our business is gradually taking on a speculativ character. We hav constantly recurring hard times, and hosts of men are forced to spend the savings of years and choose poverty or crime. The low rate of wages for labor helps to make criminals. The average annual wage of laborers in this land of labor is $325. We look upon the social evil as the great source of crime. There are 20,000 working girls in this state, outside of domestic service, whose average wage is $6 a week. Oh, my God! Think of the temptation which haunts their every step in this Christian land. Again we hav the tenement houses to consider. What, with the commingling of the sexes, the promiscuous meetings in corridors and narrow stairways, the filth, the squalor, the nurtured ignorance—they are the nurseries and hothouses of crime in this city. Men and women of New York, you know this. If you don't you ought to, and you hav failed to do your duty. Poverty is the prolific mother of vice. One might take the prices of provisions and clothing for a year, and then giv the proportion of crime for that year. This all springs from our wretched and imperfect industrial system. Take the tramp and see who is responsible for his existence. Formerly the peasant farmers tilled the soil and reaped the harvests with their own hands. Now great gangs and regiments of men do this work for the bonanza farmers for two or three months a year. For the rest of the year these great bodies of men hav no employment, and they go forth homeless and penniless. Out of this system springs the Far Western tramp. The fountain-head of crime is our low industrial organization. The lack of good education makes crime. True education does not merely train the intellect, as our public schools are doing to-day."

The Affirmations of Secularism.

Secularism is a practical philosophy of daily life based on ethical culture, having no necessary associations with any of the theological systems of the world. Its theory is that this life and the world in which we liv demand and will reward our utmost cultivation; that the instruments of this cultivation are reason and social effort, and that the harvest to be reaped from it is happiness, general and individual. Secular practice is to regard Science as man's true Providence, and to urge that by persistent, careful study of Nature, and persistent application of the results of that study, this Providence can be made to yield ever richer and richer benefits to our race.

Secularism accepts the principle of general utility as the basis of its ethical code, and teaches that human nature is the source of all moral obligation, and the more that nature is improved by experience and cultivation, the better and stronger will be the moral source; that those actions only are moral which are beneficial to mankind, and which add to the welfare of society at large; that the sanctions of morality are the protection of the individual, and the debt he or she owes to the community for its protectiv service; that the incentivs to moral conduct are personal excellence, and the general happiness and well-being of the community; that the true authority of appeal is cultured reason aided by experience; and that truth should be faithfully observed, inasmuch as telling falsehoods tends to destroy that confidence between man an man which is so necessary to the stability and honor of society.

Secularism is twofold in its nature, constructiv and destructiv. As a constructiv system it prescribes definit rules to regulate human conduct, and supplies the means to sufficiently satisfy all the real needs of humanity. For this purpose it proclaims the necessity of truth, temperance, industry, justice, fortitude, magnanimity, benevolence, honor, wisdom, love, and a constant endeavor so to act that one's deeds do no harm to others, and leave no injurious effects upon the actor. Furthermore, to meet the requirements of our nature, Secularism teaches that it is imperativ to possess a knowledge of the laws upon which health depends, and to apply that knowledge in order that we may hav sound bodies, upon which a healthy mind so largely depends; that the intellectual faculties should be properly developed, as mental training induces lofty and ennobling conceptions of the duties of existence; that as differences of opinions are sure to obtain, and more particularly upon speculativ questions, therefore social harmony and friendship should never be disturbed and severed in consequence of such non-agreement; that our emotions and passions should be controlled by reason, and regulated by judgment; and, finally, that as morality is a more important factor in life's concerns than theology, it should be studied and accepted unfettered with the figments of the various churches. This is the constructiv aspect of our philosophy.

In its destructiv character Secularism seeks to remove from our midst all fancies, creeds, and dogmas that obstruct the carrying out of our Constructiv work. While shams are regarded as realities, and falsehood worshiped as truth, this phase of our advocacy will be necessary. All systems that hav lost all vitality, except for evil, need to be broken up; and theologies, which hav hitherto usurped judgment and reason, require to be refuted. The theologians claim to hav "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," and unless we walk in their paths, unless we accept their authority, unless we believe implicitly in all their teachings, we are at once condemned as a rebel against their God, as an outcast from society, and as an enemy of our fellow-men. While this cruel injustice exists, destructiv work will be necessary. So long as a mind-degrading theology seeks to rob man of his freedom of thought and his individuality of mind, so long as it threatens him with the curse of God for striving to realize the nobility of man, so long will it be our duty to labor earnestly to remove those obstacles which for ages hav stifled human thought, stultified the intellect of man, and impeded the progress of the world. Thus it will be seen that while Secularism enunciates positiv principles and duties, it is compelled, at times, through a domineering theology, to engage in a determined warfare; not indeed in one of steel and lead, and fire and blood, but demanding from its soldiers the moral courage and endurance which are so much nobler and rarer than the mere physical; demanding the zealous loyality to an Idea, which is so much more easy to render to a Man; demanding a constant devotion to Justice while it is so much more natural to yield to selfish Injustice; demanding the sacred fire of Love, which it is so much harder to kindle, so much easier to quench, than the unholy fire of Hate.

Secularism affirms: 1. That as this life is the only one of which we hav any knowledge, we seek to promote, by material means alone, the physical, moral, and intellectual condition of society. 2. That personal excellence and general usefulness in human affairs, being regarded by us as of greater importance than the consideration of theological speculations, and the adherence to alleged supernatural teachings, should be the chief object of human solicitude and labor. 3. That the basis of all conduct is the temporal well-being of the people, and the object of all action is the acquirement of all the great virtues of the mind, and also those which are commonly supposed to flow from the heart. 4. That reliance upon the discoveries of Science, and in the benefits arising from their application to the needs of mankind, are preferable to reposing trust in theological faiths and the teachings of the Bible. 5. That the motiv prompting to action should be the attainment of the highest possible happiness on earth. 6. That to select the good, and to reject the bad, in any and all religions, is a right that every person should be allowed honestly to exercise without having any fear of incurring any disadvantages here, or of meeting with any punishment hereafter. 7. That if there be a future life, honest skepticism, allied with integrity of conduct, will never deprive any one of the glories of a desirable immortality. Noble deeds and upright conduct, we affirm, should be better credentials to present to any just God than faith in creeds and dogmas, which, as a rule, is the result of accident of birth and locality of residence, rather than the outcome of reason and reflection.

This last affirmation has evoked more orthodox horror and condemnation than all the others. But why should it? The man who has learned how to liv well, has thereby prepared himself to die well. Upon the supposition, even, that there is a God and a future life, why should the Secularist fear death? God, we are told, is perfectly wise and just, and his loving kindness is infinit. How then can he punish one to whom, on earth, he did not think fit to vouchsafe the faculty of discerning his existence, for honestly avowing that he did not discern it; for not professing to see clearly when the eyes he thought fit to giv saw nothing? Would he not be apt, if at all, to punish those (and they are very numerous) who, not seeing, confidently assert distinct visions? If we act honestly and manfully according to the best light we can attain; if we love our fellow-men, whom we know, and try to be just in all our dealings, surely we are making the best preparation for any future life; the best preparation for the higher knowledge, the clearer vision, the eternal heavenly beatitudes. Though we are execrated and condemned by the tender mercies of human bigots, we may, if we hav lived as true Secularists, commit ourselvs without dread to any infinitly good and wise God, if he is the loving father of all his children. We can die without fear, as we hav lived without hypocrisy.

> "What if there be a God above,
> A God of truth, of light, and love;
> Will he condemn us? It was he
> Who gave the light that failed to see.
> If he be just who reigns on high,
> Why should the Secularist fear to die?"

Secularism affirms that while the orthodox conception of God is incompatible with either reason, justice, or love, it is quite possible for a certain class of Theists to do good Secular work. If a Theist believes that he can best serve and honor his God by serving, loving, and honoring his fellow-man, and by making the most in every intelligent and noble sense of this life, then he may be an admirable Secularist. No one who understands the real philosophy of Secularism, will declare dogmatically, as if he had sounded the abysses of Infinitude, "There is no God;" but many of us do limit ourselvs to the declaration that no arguments which we hav yet heard hav been strong enough to persuade us that his existence has been proved. Upon this point we are Agnostics.

Secularism affirms that the Bible is a merely human production, abounding in the errors and superstitions specially common to ancient human works, the venerable days of old being the infancy of mankind. The Bible we regard as a book composed of a large number of distinct and incongruous pamphlets, quite unauthenticated, written by various persons, nobody really knows by whom; at far distant periods, nobody exactly knows when; which hav been floated down to us, as the "accidents of time" determined, by oral traditions and written copies, subject to the all blunders and perversions of ignorant and fanatical men, in ages perfectly uncritical and unscrupulous; whose originals hav irretrievably perished; which frequently refer to prior authorities that hav utterly perished also, and whose various readings are counted by tens of thousands. The various books which compose the New Testament were first circulated at a time when ignorance was the rule, and knowledge the exception; when the critical spirit was non-existent, and when true believers accounted all forgeries in favor of their religion not only permissible but praiseworthy. The amount of falsification prevalent which can be demonstrated even now, when so many of the required testimonies are lost, is astounding and even appalling to one who newly enters upon the inquiry by studying the works of some competent and impartial scholar. Of these falsifications and uncertainties the ordinary Christian knows nothing; and the learned Christians who are thoroughly aware of them are anything but anxious to point them out to their less informed brethren. The Secularist, knowing these facts, together with the equally demonstrated truths that both the Old and New Testaments are contradictory in their statements and teachings, estimates the book by its merits, and not by its supposed authority. The Bible, like all books, should be our servant, and not our master. We therefore admire whatever truth it contains, and seek to profit by any lessons of usefulness it inculcates. Its moral precepts are none the less acceptable to us from the fact that the best of them flourished long before the Christian era. It is the glory and pride of Secularism that, to all books and all religions, it applies the eclectic principle, and, being bound by no authority save cultivated reason, the evil, folly, and errors of each are discarded, but the good, wise, and true are retained to assist in making a noble, dignified, and happy life for mankind on earth.

Secularism affirms certain rights which are denied by the orthodox Christianity of the churches and the New Testament. These are: 1. The right of a person to reject any or all of the religions in the world without fear of excommunication here, or condemnation hereafter. Christianity condemns this right in teaching, "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we hav preached unto you, let him be accursed" (Gal. i, 8). "He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark. xvi, 16). 2. The right to refuse to regard all that Christ is supposed to hav taught as "true gospel." Christianity denies this, and says to those who do not accept Christ's gospel, that he will come "in flaming fire, taking vengance on them" (2 Thess. i, 3). 3. The right to refuse to believe the whole of the Bible as the very word of a very God. Christianity does not concede this. If it did its "court of appeal" would be gone as an infallible authority. 4. The right of any one adhering to Freethought even if it culminates in the denial of the very foundation of the Christian faith. This is denied by Christianity, which says: "For whosoever will deny me before men, him will I also deny before my father which is in heaven" (Matt. v, 33). 5. The right to act upon the opinion that attention should be given to this world in preference to any other. Christianity discourages this right, inasmuch as it teaches, "Take no thought for your life." "But seek first the kingdom of God" (Matt. vi, 25, 33). 6. The right to regard Science as being more valuable than theological faith. The New Testament teaches the opposit to this in saying: "Is any sick among you?" "The prayer of faith shall save the sick" (James v, 14, 15). "By grace are ye saved through faith." "Not of works, lest any man should boast" (Eph. iii, 8, 9). 7. The right to deem salvation quite possible apart altogether from Christ. The scripture says no, "for there is none other name [except Christ's] under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts iv. 12).

Secularism affirms the necessity of an activ, progressiv policy, uncontrolled by the theological teachings of the past. Secular advocacy is chained and riveted to no stark dogmas; it has no infallible book like a millstone round its neck; it is imprisoned in no adamantine creeds and formulas. Secularism is constantly growing in thought with the constant growth of science; it is always open to the corrections of experience; it holds no theories so tenaciously that it is not ready to fling them away directly facts contradict them. It is ever-increasing in action with the ever-increasing intercommunication between the various countries of the world, and the ever-increasing common interests of their inhabitants. Secularism, recognizing evil and misery in the world, endeavors by hard work to decrease and, as far as possible, destroy them; it recognizes much good and happiness, and endeavors by wise work to increase and extend them, untrammeled in either case by obsolete myths or incredible dogmas. Looking through society, we behold poverty, ignorance, tyranny, in so far as the church is dominant; wealth, education, and freedom, in so far as the Secular power is supreme. The Protestant countries are far ahead of the truly papal ones; but why? Not because of their Christianity, but because of the Freethought and Secularism which leaven it, and are ever leavening it more and more. The United States do not recognize religion at all in their Constitution. Switzerland keeps the churches strictly subject to the state. Great Britain does the same, though, being the home of anomalies, it still has a state church. All the intelligence of France is Secularistic; the ignorant peasants and the Legitimist gentry being about the only faithful left. Germany is the most profoundly and solidly irreligious country in Europe, and we see what a position it has taken. Italy has risen in every other way just in proportion as she has cast off the papal yoke. Spain has been reduced from the first rank among nations by the infernal Inquisition. Austria's rehabilitation came with the abolition of the papal Concordat. From Australia, and even from India, we hear cheering news of the progress of Freethought. Considering the state of Christendom now, it is honeycombed with heresies compared with its state in the Dark Ages, when the church was supreme. Looking over the immense harvests which hav already been reaped from the growth of all the unchristian and Secular sciences and arts of life, and not forgetting the noble men and women whom the Christians imprisoned, and banished, and murdered for daring such unholy culture, it can well be said in the words of the eloquent DeQuincy, "These are the fields that, by the grandeur of their reaping, redeem the tears and blood in which they hav been sown."

Secularism affirms that, in many important instances, its teachings are superior to those taught by Christianity, as the following brief contrast will show: Christian conduct is controlled by the ancient and supposed infallible rules of the Bible; Secular action is regulated by modern requirements, and the scientific and philosophical discoveries of the practical age in which we liv. Christianity enjoins, as an essential duty of life, to prepare to die; Secularism says, Learn how to liv truthfully, honestly, and usefully, and you need not concern yourself with the "how" to die. Christianity proclaims that the world's redemption can only be achieved through the teachings of one person; Secularism avows that such teachings are too impracticable and limited in their influence for the attainment of the object claimed, and that improvement, general and individual, is the result of the brain power and physical exertions of the brave toilers of every country and every age, who hav labored for human advancement. Christianity threatens punishment in another world, for the rejection of speculativ views in this; Secularism teaches that no penalty should follow the holding of sincere opinions, inasmuch as uniformity of belief is impossible. According to Christianity, as taught in the churches and chapels, the approval of God and the rewards of heaven are to be secured only through faith in Jesus of Nazareth; whereas the philosophy of Secularism enunciates that no merit should be attached to such faith, but that fidelity to principle, and good service to man, should win the right to participate in any advantages either in this or in any other world. CHARLES WATTS.

Fleeing from Landlordism.

Twenty-five years ago the negroes of the South were constantly fleeing from slavery, leaving their friends and all that was dear to them on earth; and, at the risk of being caught by dogs and savage persecutors, they plunged into the unknown with the faint hope of reaching a land where they could be free from the tyranny of their masters, whom they dreaded more than wild beasts. Their sad condition excited the sympathy of the friends of freedom, both in this country and in Canada, and they were secretly assisted in their illegal efforts to gain their freedom. These events are now long in the past, and we look back with surprise to think that the government founded by Thomas Paine, and Washington, and Franklin, and Jefferson should hav tolerated such a system of injustice.

But a very similar state of things exists among us even to this day. The poor Irish hav for many years been fleeing to our shores from their nativ country much as the negroes of former days did from the South to Canada, and in not much better condition. They are not leaving Ireland because there is not room for them there. Ireland could support three times its present population well. But they are fleeing from the tyranny of landlords, whom they dread more than the snakes and wild beasts of America. Yes; Irish landlords are greater enemies of the poor people than wild beasts; for one may escape the fury of a wild beast, but there is no escaping the unmerciful tyranny of landlordism. These landlords are of no more use to the people of Ireland than a wolf is to a flock of sheep; they neither toil nor spin, but spend their lives in devouring the earnings of others.

But the evil is not confined to Ireland. When the Irishman arrives at New York, he finds the bloodhounds of landlordism waiting to devour him there. Neither the city nor the state of New York is troubled with over-population. There are hundreds of vacant lots in the city, and thousands of acres of idle lands in the state. But the Irishman seeks in vain for a spot on which he will not be forced to yield the last cent of his earnings to some landlord who has done nothing to earn it. If he has money enough left, he may take the cars for Chicago; but there the unmerciful landlord is prepared to receive him. There are thousands of vacant lots in Chicago, lying as they hav lain for thousands of years; but the fugitiv from landlordism in Ireland is not allowed to make a resting-place on any one of them. He continues his journey westward, and he arrives in this little city in Kansas where we are surrounded on every hand by the waving prairie-grass, and he says, "Surely now I hav reached the land of the free." But he finds that even here the sword of landlordism, like that of the angel that was placed at the gate of lost paradise, points towards him from every direction, forbidding him to enter. Then he says in anguish: "Where is the land of the free?" And he is told, Not where the white man liveth is there any such land. If you would wish to see the land of the free, then you must go and liv with the red men, the savage Indians. There only can you escape the unmerciful tyranny and devouring greed of landlordism. Then the fugitiv cries out, "Noble red man, let me make my home with thee!"

Yes, people are coming here from England, from Scotland, from Ireland, and from Germany, and they say they left all that was near and dear to them at home because land there was so dear that they could not buy it. There was plenty of idle land everywhere, but it was held at a high price. Even in the state of Michigan the young men are fleeing from the landlordism there to the far West. In Michigan, out of 36,000,000 acres of land in the state, only 6,000,000 are improved, and but 2,000,000 acres are public land; the remaining 28,000,000 acres are held in idleness by landlords, who will continue to hold them until the starving people will yield up their wealth to them for the lands.

Why is this thus? Why does the United States government persecute and punish thieves of the stripe of Jesse James for taking a few dollars from the people without earning them, and then assist landlords, as it formerly did slave-holders, to extract millions of dollars annually from the people without earning anything? The man who buys land and sells it at a profit without improving it, does not earn anything. Why, then, should he be allowed to make anything? It is a rule in political economy that whoever gets money without earning it, gets money which some other person or persons hav earned but did not get, and this is what is vulgarly called theft. Whenever every man shall be compelled to earn all he gets, then, and not till then, will every person get all he earns.

Why does land rise in value so that poor people cannot buy it and liv on it? When a man builds a house it commences to depreciate in value as soon as it is finished. Why then does land rise in value? Is it for the general good of the people that land should rise in value? Land of no commercial value will yield as much wheat, corn, or potatoes as it will after it has reached a price of a million dollars per acre; so also will buildings stand as securely upon the one as the other. Who is benefited by land rising in value? None but the owner of the land—the landlord. Who is injured by its rising in value? Every person who has none, since he is compelled to pay more for it or do without it. Now, since there are already in this country about twenty people who hav no land for every one who has, the rise of land injures twenty people for every one that it helps, and the person who is enriched by the rise of land gets his wealth without earning it.

Land rising in value is detrimental to the public good, and often causes large tracts of country to become depopulated. This was thoroughly understood by Sir Thomas Moore when he wrote "Utopia;" also by Oliver Goldsmith when he wrote "The Deserted Village," and is a matter of common observation among thinking men in all countries. It is the cause of driving men from their homes to endure the hardships and privations incident to pioneer life, and it is the cause of driving them from the rural districts into the large cities, to liv lives of poverty and degradation. It is the cause of men not marrying, because they cannot find homes for families, and is therefore the cause of prostitution, with all the evils associated therewith.

The question is thus simplified. Land should not rise in value. It should hav no commercial value, either in the cities or in the countries. The question is, How can this be accomplished? If this question should be put to school-children, instead of the many useless questions in algebra, etc., we would begin to hope that the "sweet by and bye" was near at hand. The question is simple, but there is only one way of solving it. There is but one answer to it. Land must be taxed so high that it will not rise in value. In other words, that which now goes to constitute the price of land must go to furnish public revenues, and all other taxes must be abolished.

This change would put an end to landlordism as thoroughly as Lincoln's proclamation did to slavery. Then would the wolf and the lamb lie down together in peace. Landlords could not then make money by speculating in land, and the poor would not then hav to bear both the burdens of taxation and the burdens of landlords too, as they do now. Land should be taxed up to its full value as land, and improvements should not be taxed at all. Then no person could afford to hold land in idleness, and then there would be land enough for all. This force would break the sword of the landlord, and this drug would poison his bloodhounds. J. G. MALCOLM.

Mrs. Brigham Mistaken.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hope you will pardon me for writing you on so small a subject as I am about to do; but I am a stranger in a strange land, and I hav been nearly taken in, but not quite. Last Sunday I heard Mrs. Brigham speak, and I think she said rather too much, or at least I hope that Mr. Charles Watts will prove so when he comes to New York. For in speaking of different creeds and religions, Mrs. Brigham said there was "room for all in New York, even for Materialism; yes, for that, but not much." Now, sir, I hope that Mr. Watts will prove that there is room, and plenty of room, for Materialism, perhaps more than Mrs. Brigham expects.

Sir, in closing this I wish to tender success to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and may it continue in its good work long after superstition has fallen.

DANIEL SHORE, Member of the N. S. S.

Our London Letter.

It might hav been thought that the opponents of Mr. Bradlaugh had long since exhausted the list of charges they had to bring against him, but it is not so. The last one will doubtless be considered the most powerful of all, it being to the effect that he receives money for lecturing. It is certainly a very serious accusation to bring against any man, because it is well known that lecturers never are paid for their services, but generally pay a considerable sum for being permitted to descant on any subject for public edification, amusement, or instruction. I fancy, however, he will be able to bear up under this attack, and, judging by his personal appearance last Sunday, when he was discoursing on the House of Lords, he did not appear particularly bowed down with shame. It might be wondered at that any person could be so absurd as to make that a reproach to a public man, who honestly earns every farthing he possesses, but the surprise may be somewhat lessened when we know so well the preachers of all denominations of the Christian church perform all their arduous labors for no remuneration here, looking for their reward after the toils of this world are over, and they hav laid down the heavy cross of poverty and persecution they hav borne for the sake of their beloved master, and receive the crown to which they so earnestly look, and are so anxious to reach; to secure which they so constantly pray that they may be removed from this mundane sphere at the earliest possible date, and go to be with Christ, which we are assured is far better, though what it is far better to we are not informed.

To return, however, to Mr. Bradlaugh, it is quite true, though so unusual, that he does receive payment for some of his lectures, and I believe he also makes something from his writings, though he ought properly to sell them at a loss. It is, however, a fact that he on many occasions has traveled long distances, paying his own expenses, for the purpose of addressing a miners' or other similar meeting, for which he has received not the slightest monetary consideration. I hav no doubt, however, that it could be proved by the same line of argument that is used to show the authenticity of the scriptures that in some mysterious manner, by the aid of the devil, perhaps, the money he spends for traveling and other expenses at such times finds its way again into his pockets considerably increased.

The continued increase of members to the various branches of the National Secular Society is highly gratifying to all friends of enlightenment; and if all those who hold our views would boldly stand out and declare themselvs by joining the cause, the expounders of the word would become panic-stricken, but so many shrink from having the words "Atheist" and "Infidel" applied to them, that they are afraid to confess their doubts even to themselvs. Perhaps it is as well, however, that such timid ones refrain from connecting themselvs with the Freethought party, as they might be more of a hindrance than a help to the advance of Liberal opinions.

Certain of the speakers at the Church Congress now in session, look very gloomy at the outlook, greatly deploring the continual and large falling off of members and attendants, more especially at the determined obstinacy of the laboring classes to be saved in the proper way; and it has been strongly urged that more missionaries are wanted for home work, so that they can hurry up and worry the working population. It is considered desirable that these missionaries should be superior sort of persons, well dressed, and always ready and even anxious to press with their soft, lily-white hands those horny and grimy ones possessed by the sons of toil. This was accepted as rather a fine idea, and I expect a new society will hav to be formed to work it properly, as shaking hands is to be the chief means used for converting these low working people. I suppose the "Hand-shakers," when they start business, will be looked upon by themselvs and their adherers as an entirely new and original species of martyrs. It is a very laudable scheme, showing the humility always so strikingly present in the followers of the lamb; and there is no doubt that Freethinkers, both here and in America, will subscribe largely to assist in founding and supporting so excellent a society. RUSSIAN society is rent with the throes of a religious excitement, and a split in the Greek church is imminent. Belief in the spiritual supremacy of the czar is at the bottom of it.

Communications.

Eloquence.

A late number of the Cleveland Leader contained a significant article under the above heading, which has been copied by several papers throughout the country. It commences with the statement of Sidney Smith "that America had produced no names in art, science, or literature since they became a nation capable of standing a minute's competition with those produced by England within the same period;" "nor in oratory or eloquence," he afterward added.

The editor of the Leader combats Mr. Smith's statement in an article of great merit and learning, and cites many names that hav conferred honor upon American art, science, literature and eloquence. He closes his interesting argument with the following remark, which, like the postscript of a lady's letter, is really the most pregnant assertion of the whole list, and plainly discovers the reason why the article was penned:

"Robert Ingersoll, of Illinois, is one of the most brilliant orators we hav ever had, and had he not attempted a revolution in religious matters, might hav had almost any office within the gift of the administration. Oh, the pity of it, Iago, the pity of it, that a man with such God-given gifts—a generous soul and a splendid mind, with a wondrous command of language—should use them to such unworthy purpose, and to the ruin of his honor, fame, and future happiness."

"You cannot seduce my admirers with your allurements," said the witty Sarah Bernhardt to Marie Columbier; and it is impossible, by the offer of political preferment, to seduce Col. Ingersoll from his advocacy of universal mental liberty. He adopted his views not because they were politic or popular, but because he believed them true; and earnest men like him, when once convinced, cannot be influenced by ignoble bribes of office, or appeals to selfish interests.

But the learned editor of the Leader is mistaken in asserting that Col. Ingersoll has used his brilliant talents to "the ruin of his honor, fame, and future happiness." His honor remains untainted and unimpeached; his fame is co-extensiv with the bounds of civilization; and whatever his future lot may be, it is certain that in his present state he enjoys the happiness which results from just and noble efforts. After a long and successful lecturing tour through California, Oregon, and the northern British possessions, he is now at his ranch, with his family and friends, enjoying a well-earned vacation. He has named his place "Maudeva," from the combined names of his daughters Maud and Eva. Here, it is said, he has erected a "palace in the wilderness," and here, surrounded by the noblest veiws of nature, he is secure from the strifes and wrangles of partisan politics, if not from the seductiv offers of party mandates, or the dolorous jeremiades of the Cleveland editor.

But the lamentations and pious plaints of the Ohio journalist will be in vain to convert the colonel. His threat of future punishment sounds childish, impotent, and puerile; and bribes of office can only influence base and sordid minds. "Get thee behind me, Satan," said Jesus when his tempter offered to him all the kingdoms of the world, and of which, by the way, his Satanic majesty had neither title nor possession. And pseudo-pious editors should bear in mind, when voiding their cant, that political offices are conferred only by the people, and not by ecclesiastical associations. They would also do well to remember that there is no office within the gift of the American people of which Robert G. Ingersoll is not worthy, and further, that there is but one office within their gift that is worthy of him.

There is great satisfaction in reflecting, philosophically, that party politics cannot descend forever, and that after the darkest night the jocund morn appears. There is really no presidential candidate in the field who can command the intelligent respect of the Liberals of our country. From the mediocre assortment they can only select the one they deem the least objectionable. They may select Cleveland, who illustrates his fitness for the presidency by writing pious and phenomenal nonsense about his alleged virtue to Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher; or they may choose the "plumed knight," who, it is said, is cold and selfish in his nature, and, when expediency or interest poises the scales, can ignore his former friends and allies; or they may prefer the rich Crœsus of Massachusetts, who so strangely represents the sons of toil, and who, perhaps, excels both his pious competitors in his marked deference to religious prejudice.

The trio are surely not immaculate, and each seems willing to

> "Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,
> When thrift may follow fawning."

Tertullian has bestowed much praise upon a Christian soldier in the Roman army, who threw down his crown of laurel and refused to burn incense to Jupiter or the other pagan gods. But while Christians applaud the independent spirit of this soldier, who upheld his religion at the risk of his life, they demand that Col. Ingersoll shall deny his faith and burn incense at Christian shrines, or be debarred forever from political influence. Our Constitution has proclaimed eternal divorce between church and state, and this doctrin is always upheld by Liberals. They do not interrogate a candidate for election in regard to his religious views, because religion has nothing to do with the administration of government. The fact that our late president, Gen. Garfield, was a member of the Campbellite church, did not, probably, lose him a single vote from Liberals in the Republican ranks; even Col. Ingersoll labored earnestly to secure his election. But now we are told by this Cleveland editor, who cannot comprehend free toleration, that the colonel's heterodoxy has sealed his political doom unless he recants and burns incense on the altars of Jupiter or some Christian representativ of effete paganism.

> Robert G., Robert G., "'tho' your heart's like a child,
> And your life like the new-driven snaw,
> Yet that winna save ye, auld Satan must hav ye,
> For preaching that three's ane an' twa."

The Liberals of the country are really in the majority, and hold a controling influence in the community. This is shown whenever an issue is forced by the churches. The ministers of our city recently made a combined protest against Sunday concerts in Central Park, and preached sermons of great length and eloquence, showing the depravity of music and the wickedness of enjoyment. Sixty thousand people promptly responded to the appeal by attending the next concert, and the pastors hav now chosen other subjects for their homilies. If so much good can be done by individual effort, what might not be achieved by organized action? Our system of guerrilla warfare has held the persecutors in check, and if the Liberals of the country were properly organized and acted in concert, they could efficiently rebuke all manifestations of religious intolerance, and protect our government from sectarian assaults. The priceless boon of religious liberty, bequeathed by the fathers of the Revolution, should be held sacred by their sons. None should be persecuted for religion, and none should be persecuted by it.

The time may come when the people will demand honesty and intelligence from their chosen representativs; when men with noble impulses, brave intellects, and clean hands will be asked to preside at the councils of the nation; and when that time arrives, the Agnostic, Robert G. Ingersoll, will be called upon to fill the presidential chair once honored by the occupancy of the Infidel, Thomas Jefferson.

PETER ECKLER.

Canadian Notes.

On Sunday evening, Oct. 19th, Mr. Watts gave the last of his course of lectures in Albert Hall. He will commence a second course early in December next. His subject was "Agnosticism, Atheism, and Theism," their positions defined and their points of difference pointed out. About eighteen months since, an article appeared in the Fortnightly Review, by Leslie Stephen, in which the term Agnostic was used. Professor Huxley claims that he was the first to make use of the word with its present signification. A discussion has been going on in England during this last year and half, as to who was the first to use the word Agnostic in the way in which at present is the custom; it is very generally attributed to Professor Huxley. The word Agnostic has been defined as meaning one of a school of thinkers who disclaim any knowledge of God, or of the origin of the universe, immortality or original causes. The school holds that the mind of man is limited to an a posteriori knowledge of phenomena, and the relativ, and that, therefore, the infinit, the absolute, and the unconditioned are beyond all experience, and consequently beyond its range. Professor Huxley says: "Some twenty years ago, or thereabout, I invented the word Agnostic, to denote people who, like myself, confess themselvs to be hopelessly ignorant concerning a variety of matters about which metaphysicians and theologians, both orthodox and heterodox, dogmatize with the utmost confidence; therefore I can state authentically what was originally meant by Agnosticism. Agnosticism is of the essence of science, whether ancient or modern; it simply means that a man shall not say he knows or believes that which he has no grounds for professing to know or believe. Agnosticism simply says that we know nothing of what may be beyond phenomena." Another writer says, "What that which appears to us as matter and force is, in itself, uncolored by consciousness, unmodified by the conditions of the perceiving and reflecting mind, independent of the constitutionally and organically imposed limitation of the intellect, we do not know."

At the conclusion of one of Mr. Watts's lectures at Hamilton, when discussion was invited, a clergyman stepped upon the platform, and reviewed the lecture of the evening on the subject of the comparativ merits of Secularism and Christianity. In rejoinder, Mr. Watts said that Christians are often so filled with fanaticism that it gets the better of their reason. When Christianity came it was accepted only by those whose reason had not been cultivated. It was rejected by the cultured minds of Greece and Rome; they rejected it for nearly four hundred years. During all that time Christianity made but little progress, and that principally among the lowest and most ignorant classes. It was only after the Roman world had sunk to a decayed and degraded condition, only after it had fallen to the lower level of Christianity, that it was possible for the latter to flourish. The New Testament teaches that salvation depends not upon conduct, but belief. Secularism teaches that conduct is the chief thing; that a man has a right to believe what he pleases, so long as his conduct is right. It is not Christianity, the Bible, and the pulpit which promote progress, but the schoolmaster and the printer who aided that civilization which had slept through the dark ages of priestcraft, and only awoke with the revival of learning.

An association has just been formed in Toronto to abolish the tax exemptions. A number of influential public men are activ in promoting the success of the society. Tax exemptions in Toronto amount to twelve millions of dollars—about one-sixth of the entire city assessment, and a very large proportion of the exemptions are on church property of the various sects of Christianity. The followers of the meek and lowly Jesus hang like a millstone of pauperism around the necks of the struggling, laboring, and producing classes of the community. How long, O patient and much-abused, deserving workers, how long will ye endure this grievous oppression at the hands of the Christian drones?

The Toronto Secular Society hav commenced their winter classes. On Tuesday last the science class had their first meeting, organized, elected officers, decided on their program of subjects, and held their first meeting, which proved to be a most successful one. On Wednesday the Dancing Class did likewise. On Friday the Elocution and Dramatic Class meet; on Saturday, music and singing; Sunday morning, debating; and Sunday evening, essay and debate.

The public interest in the Watts course of lectures continued unabated to the end of the last of the series. The hall was crowded every Sunday night, the last being as crowded as any one of the course.

It is surprising how much the growth of knowledge has civilized that barbarous religion, Christianity, and the Liberal things that are sometimes said from the pulpit in our day. A clergyman in Toronto not a great while ago said, in the course of his sermon, that when we consider the high moral character and vast scientific attainments of many of the advocates of Agnosticism and Atheism, and the elaborate treatises and arguments put forth by them, we must allow that as a matter of reason, apart from faith, they hav laid down reasonable grounds for doubting of the existence of a personal God." Another Toronto clergyman, in his pulpit addressing his congregation, said, "Hav any of you been confined indoors all the week, working in an unwholesome atmosphere, with no opportunity of inhaling the life-giving open air? If so, you hav no right to be here. If you hav no opportunity during the week, on Sundays you ought to take a walk out into the country and breathe the delightful fresh open air among the fields."

The Toronto Secular Society hav been in existence nearly ten years, and (with the exception of a lecture occasionally by a lecturer from the states) during the whole of that time they supplied their own platform by the amateur efforts of a few of their own members. For a number of years these amateur lectures were delivered in Albert Hall (the same lately used by Mr. Watts). And for a length of time the auditorium was crowded to overflowing. The society continues to flourish, and now has a library and rooms (a small lecture hall being one) which are open day and night, the week through, and year around. They hav a good piano and means of engaging in various games of amusement. When the society first started, ten years since, there was a difficulty in finding a place to meet in. Directly the owners knew it was for a Secular society, they refused to rent us halls or rooms on any terms whatever. And in some cases we were expelled after entering in possession, although we had a written lease. But we are outlaws in the legal sense, and cannot get any redress for wrongs. And this is Christianity in the nineteenth century. But during the last ten years' operations of the Secular Society, Christianity has become just a little more civilized than it was; we can get halls and rooms now. In like manner, when Secularism first started in Toronto, no newspaper would notice us in any way, neither would they take our money for advertisments. Now we can advertise and get notices in the daily press. Every town or village ought to start a Secular society; the mere fact of their meeting is doing a good and useful work; it is a protest on behalf of freedom of speech, and freedom of the mind; it has a tendency to win those rights of every man which the bigoted, intolerant, priest-ridden Christians hav robbed us of.

To the Liberals of New York and Vicinity.

Immediately after the presidential election, our own campaign for the Liberal cause will open. C. B. Reynolds, chairman of the executiv committee of the National League, will lecture before the Liberal Club of this city on Friday evening, November 14th, on "The Methods of Liberal Work." This will be followed up by a lecture on Sunday evening by Charles Watts, the first vice-president of the League, on "Agnosticism and Modern Thought." An address of welcome will also be made on that evening by the former president of the League, T. B. Wakeman. Then on Thursday evening of that week, on Nov. 20th, there will be a grand Liberal Sociable. The officers of the League will be present, and all prominent Liberals of New York city. There will be, first of all, a social entertainment —a feast of reason and a flow of soul; and, also, to conclude with music and dancing, so that the young folks as well as the old folks can hav their full share of the joy of the occasion. The greatest wisdom is that which combines both sobriety and festivity, and this we intend to do on the festival evening. So let the oldest and the youngest come and partake of the happy inspiration. One of the new things that Liberalism has to do in this country is to create a social life on its own basis, and thus make predominant the spirit of fraternity. We shall expect all the Liberals of New York to attend, and see how much splendid material we really hav for the new social order. Further notice of this will be given hereafter.

Nov. 9th, at Paine Hall, Boston, Mr. Watts will deliver a lecture afternoon and evening. Horace Seaver, of the Boston Investigator, will make the address of welcome. It is desirable that all Liberal Leagues in New England that purpose to secure Mr. Watts's services as lecturer should make arrangements for the week preceding, and the week succeeding Nov. 9th. Nov. 23d, Mr. Watts will lecture at Albany and Troy. Nov. 30th, at Philadelphia and vicinity. Dec. 6th and 12th, both Mr. Watts and the secretary of the League will be at Salamanca and Toronto, and various parts of Canada until Jan. 1st, when their work will be in the Great West for several months. A full account of the campaign will be published in the Liberal papers. There is no doubt of success.

Let us hear at once from all parts of the country in regard to lectures, conventions, the work of the League, etc. We wish communication with every place where there is a Liberal element. Samuel P. Putnam,

Secretary of the National Liberal League.

Correspondence.

O. H. Wheeler, of Bradford League, Pa.: Things work slowly, but surely.

F. C. Mende, Philadelphia: Please find inclosed $5.00 for the Campaign Fund, with my best wishes for your success.

Irving C. Terry, Syracuse, N. Y.: In reply will say that I am ready to do anything in my power to advance the interests of Freethought and the National Liberal League.

George Longford, secretary Liberal League 257, Philadelphia, Pa.: I hav hopes, when Mr. Putnam and Mr. Watts come here next month, that the Liberals will be shaken out of their lethargy, so that the star of Liberalism may shine brighter than ever before.

N. F. Griswold, Meriden Conn., sends one dollar for the National Liberal League fund, and writes: Our numbers are increasing, and I trust that the new converts will prove to be more practical Liberals than some we hav heretofore been favored with.

Melvie A. Clayton, late of Cato, now of Auburn, N. Y.: I favor a state meeting most heartily, and would attend and do all in my power to promote the interests of the National Liberal League, not only with my presence, but with what financial aid I can render, for the time has fully come for united, aggressiv action.

Julia A. P. Perkins, Baldwinsville, N. Y.: I send one poor little dollar for the League Fund. I only wish I could do more, and will sometime. [Not a poor little dollar by any means, but a splendid one rich with promis. It will bring many more flying to our treasury, I know. One bird-song is promis of a whole summer.—S. P. P.]

Henry Beichling, Garfield. Col.: Inclosed find $1 for the Campaign Fund. I hope that there will not be many that want to be carried to the sky on flowery beds of ease—that is, to the coming reign of Liberalism—whilst others fought to win the prize, and sent their cash and labor. I believe that there can be moncho stiwano done through this campaign.

L. Dewitt Griswold, Auburn, N. Y.: Brother Putnam's stirring and able appeal duly received and highly appreciated. He has outshone himself, and every sentence is characteristic of this grand-go-ahead-carry-the-war-into-Africa man. It has just the right ring to it, and I rejoice that something is going to be done, and the officers of the National Liberal League can rest assured that I am with them in this warfare.

D. B. Cozine, Lexington, Ky.: I want to ask if you and Mr. Watts cannot come to our city this winter and lecture and organize a League. There are enough Liberals in this place if they could only be brought to see the vast benefit of organization. There needs to be a true statement about which at present there are only lies and misapprehensions. We hav never had a Liberal lecture here, and I think it would do great good.

Samos Parsons, San Jose, Cal.: I hope to see the Liberals throughout the country fall into line. I am over eighty years of age. My hearing and eyesight are failing, but what influence I hav shall be in your favor. I wish I could duplicate the noble subscription of Courtlandt Palmer, or even the figures of Dr. Foote; but I can't now. But you may depend on me for forty dollars a year, payable quarterly, and I shall try some time to come up to the hundred-dollar figure if I can. I feel a deep interest in the spread of Freethought. I shall keep track of you and your noble compeer, and shall send for the best lectures and pamphlets which you may bring out from time to time. Keep up courage. We are gaining. Freethought is getting more and more popular. Success to you. My best wishes go with you.

J. T. Vitt, Union, Mo.: Inclosed I send $2 as my contribution to the fund for the National Liberal League. I feel greatly interested in the progress of Liberalism, and am convinced that the Liberal element is increasing, and wants more organization to accomplish the secularization of our government. I hav lived in this community fifty years (am now nearly seventy-five years old), and find a great many men who hav cut loose from the old superstition, when fifty years ago a friend of mine and myself were the only two outspoken Infidels in this settlement. This givs hope to me that before long a Liberal club may be organized, and something more accomplished for the object we hav in view. Your book, "Golden Throne," I hav read with satisfaction, and keep it circulating in my family. Wishing success to you and to the cause of mental liberty and humanity, I sign with friendly feelings.

J. Francis Ruggles, Bronson, Mich.: I send you $5 toward the Campaign Fund for spreading the gospel of Liberalism throughout the land. I am confident that the proposed plan of an activ personal canvass will be productiv of grander practical results in a few months' time than would be likely to ensue from a generation of office "circularizing," for it is the meeting face to face and the friendly hand-grasp that in a majority of cases is necessary to produce the requisit confidence and magnetic current that connects with the "treasury department," and calls forth the desired financial assistance. Among the many good things that the late D. M. Bennett taught his disciples was the practice of giving in aid of the great cause we all hav at heart, and Liberals will cheerfully continue to giv, providing they can hav assurance that their donations are destined to produce any appreciable results in bearing good fruits. I am truly gratified to see The Truth Seeker working for the League so earnestly, for our brilliant and thrifty journal means business in everything it undertakes. I thank the old officers of the League for the good they hav accomplished in their gallant struggle under discouraging circumstances, and extend to the new management my best wishes for their abundant triumph in the herculean task undertaken.

BEING DEAD, HE YET SPEAKETH.

The noble D. M. Bennett declared: "There are people enough of Liberal views in this country if they would only hav independence to 'speak out,' if they would let their 'light shine,' to be a power in the land. Yes, if the Liberals of America will 'hold up their heads,' boldly utter their honest convictions; if they will organize and work in concert, and hav due respect for themselvs and their honest opinions, they will be an influential body of men and women; they will be capable of doing a great amount of good, and be as thoroughly respected and honored by the upright and good as any organization in our country. The efficiency of any body or class of men is greatly increased by being duly organized. If Liberals wish to be useful in disseminating the benefits of light and truth among the less favored, organization is of the highest consequence. For social and instructiv advantages, also, it cannot be too highly commended. Every city, every village, every community where there are six, or ten, or more Liberals and Spiritualists, they ought to effect an organization, and meet as often as once a week for discussion and interchange of views, to listen to discourses or the reading of some instructiv matter that will elevate and improve the mind, and at all such meetings those seeking for truth should be freely invited. We urge our Liberal and Spiritualistic friends all over the country to effect these organizations in every locality. Great good and mutual benefit will grow out of them."

"We wish to see the Liberal element of the country, whether Spiritualistic or Materialistic, co-operate as far as practicable, and deal strong, well-aimed blows at priestcraft, sectarianism, and error. Let us not indulge in malice, jealousies, or bitterness. We can agree on common ground of enmity to the gross evils which afflict mankind, and to this extent we assuredly can work in accord and harmony."

HIS ONE ONLY PRAYER.

"If we were vouchsafed one prayer to the ruling powers of the universe, with the assurance it should be answered, it would be pretty much like this: 'Make the Liberal element of this country less impecunious; make them less apathetic and indifferent, and more disposed to aid the organs advocating their views.'" And let all the people say, Amen. O all ye that loved the noble old hero in his life, who so admired his spirit of self-sacrifice and devotion to the cause of Liberalism, will ye not heed his counsel? Will ye not profit by his example? Do not his words of wisdom and loving admonition apply to us to-day? The living and the dead join in the appeal for contributions to the National Liberal League fund, that the League may fulfil its noble mission. We desire the secularization of our government. How much hav we paid? How much hav we pledged? We desire the social and educational advantages for ourselvs and children the League affords, and how much hav we paid to secure it?

THE NEWARK LEAGUE.

Mr. E. W. Chamberlain lectured last Sunday afternoon before the Newark Liberal League on "The Life and Services to Liberalism of D. M. Bennett."

ENCOURAGING.

From the Investigator.

On our third page may be found some more encouraging notes from the secretary, Mr. Samuel P. Putnam. He is a good worker, able, zealous, and thoroughly in earnest; and his associate, Mr. Charles Watts, is just like him. These two friends hav begun a campaign for Liberalism which cannot fail to succeed, if the rank and file of the army but say the word. Let us all say it, and contribute! The League appears to be now on a satisfactory basis, and as "in union there is strength," let us all try to make a strong League.

Mr. Charles Watts's lecture engagements for the next month are: Sunday, 26th, and following week, Hamilton and the west; Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday, Nov. 2d, 3d, and 4th, Montreal. Mr. Watts will arrive in New York November 6th.

The God-in-the-Constitutionists.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I am glad to see that some of you good folks in the East are awake to the fact that the Constitution enthusiasts are earnest and activ in their attempt to still further Christianize our government and institutions. Your "Broadway contemporary," as you style Man, thinks that this movement is "fading out," but never was a man more mistaken than the philosopher who penned that sentence. So far is it from "fading out," that we may truthfully aver that it is stronger at this time than during any previous year of the existence of the National Reform Association. It has allied itself with the Prohibition party, and is thus gradually familiarizing many thousands of voters who accept the principles of the latter party with its theocratic aims, and overcoming such scruples as may yet linger in their minds regarding its principles and methods. Pomeroy has withdrawn in favor of St. John, saying, in substance, that the candidate of the sumptuary party is a good enough national reformer to suit the God-in-the-Constitution men. In fact, St. John said about a year and a half ago, in a letter to one of the secretaries of the Kansas and Iowa branch of the God party, that they "could not hav too much God in the Constitution" for him.

Aside from this most significant practical union of these two divisions of the tyrannists, we perceive an intense activity everywhere manifesting itself in the ranks of the theocratists. Conventions similar to the one reported from Indianola, Iowa, are held almost, if not every month, in Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska, and the sympathy of the Christian community is with the apostles of reaction, every time, as against the Secularists. They mean business? Do we? E. C. Walker.

Syracuse the Headquarters of Spirit Phenomena.

DEAR FRIENDS: I thought when I was in Boston at the Banner of Light office, and around among the noted mediums there, that I was at the headquarters of Spiritualism. But I find here more truly astounding phenomena than all I hav before seen through my whole experience since leaving Snowville for the abodes where spirits "do manifest themselvs in the flesh."

Last night, a Mr. Waldo called, and after a few moments' conversation, he and I started for the residence of Dr. S. C. Jasebrow*—Mr. Truesdell overtaking us on the way. We found Mr. Jasebrow and his wife and a medium named Mrs. Bennett sitting around a table, over which hung a lighted lamp. Mr. Truesdell introduced me, and they all said they knew me by repute, and seemed glad to make a personal acquaintance, and to know that I was seeking the truth concerning. Spiritualism. A circle was formed, Mr. Truesdell acting as medium. I took my slates which I had brought on from Boston, just as they were cleaned and tied up ready for being written upon by Mr. Caffray, but which he had refused to use on the plea that a cloth binding encircled them. Upon these slates I set a goblet which was two-thirds full of water, and under the bottom of it I laid a bit of pencil on the slates. Then I laid the whole thing (slates, goblet, and pencil) upon Mr. Truesdell's right hand, while his left hand lay upon the top of his head. He passed the slates under the table so that the top of the goblet pressed against the under surface of the bed of the table (said table having previously been thoroughly examined by us all, so as to preclude possibility of traps and tricks). Then a circle was formed by all but Mr. Truesdell joining hands, and singing was called for. After a while, Mr. Truesdell proposed I should giv the name of a spirit I wished a communication from. I gave D. M. Bennett. Pretty soon we heard the apparent scratching of the pencil, and finally I was told to come and take out the slates. I did so, and found them precisely as I had left them, and the water unspilled. On cutting the string and opening them, I saw on the inner surface of one slate, "It is true; I am here. D. M. Bennett." On the other slate was "J. H. Johnson," Truesdell's alleged control; also "Sky," who controls Mrs. Simpson, of Chicago, for similar phenomena.

How this was done I could not conjecture, but that it was done, and in a good, clear light, all present will testify. Then two slates belonging to Mr. Jasebrow were brought, and these I cleaned and marked and went through the same performance with, and requested the name of my grandfather, Peter Drake, to be written on them, or to be signed to a communication thereon. Old John Brown moldered awhile in the ground in a musical refrain, and finally, at Mr. Truesdell's request, I took up the slates, and, as before, found everything as it was. I cut the string, took them apart, and saw the name, "Peter Drake," legibly written four times over on the inside surfaces.

Then Mr. Truesdell produced two slates he had brought with him—cloth bound like mine, only smaller in size. These I examined, and so did the rest. I wiped them off to make sure, and laid them on top of the bare table; put a bit of pencil on top of my slates on top of those, and over all was placed my hat, so as to secure darkness for the spirits. The lamp was partly turned down, though there was plenty of light to show that no hand touched the slates. Singing, etc., went on; writing was heard. Mr. Jasebrow was shaking and trembling from the "influences"—giving out, as he afterward explained, power to enable the spirits to write. All seemed too perfectly plain and simple to admit of trick or fraud of any sort. I doubted if writing could possibly come under such strict tests. But to my surprise, on taking Mr. Truesdell's two slates apart, I found a couple of communications upon the inside surface of one of them—a message for Mr. Waldo from his father, and a long and beautifully written one for me, penciled in a female hand. The slate was actually full. I should hav been astounded had some strange medium done this, but coming from Mr. Truesdell, I knew it was a trick, though I could not contrive how it had been done. Mr. Jasebrow said that as spirit-writing had then and there been produced, he claimed that Mr. Truesdell had forfeited the $500 offered in "Bottom Facts." The question then arose as to whom the $500 should be given, admitting the work to be that of spirits. I then asked Mr. Jasebrow, who seemed to be greatly excited, if he claimed to be the medium. He said, "No, the spirits hav written through Mr. Truesdell." Mr. Truesdell replied, "While this is all simple legerdemain, for the sake of peace I will pay Mr. Truesdell (the medium) $500. Come to my office to-morrow and I will pay Mr. Truesdell, the medium, $500 dollars as per contract." "Do you claim," cried Mr. Jasebrow in great excitement, "that that writing was trickery." "Most certainly," replied Mr. Truesdell. "Then," said Mr. Jasebrow, "you owe to me, my wife, and to Mrs. Slenker, a full explanation as to how it was done." After making Mr. Jasebrow promis that he would not be angry, Mr. Truesdell unwrapped the slates which he had prepared ready to take home, and showed us that instead of only two slates there were three of them; that one of them had a false surface or pad fitted into the frame, and on this third slate the messages had been written before he left home; one of them by his niece, and the other by himself, thus securing two different specimens of handwriting. He said that while we were examining the slates, he had taken up one and looked at it too, and finally had dextrously substituted for it the prepared slate, which he had under his coat (under his arm).

Oh, such a hubbub as this unexpected revelation did create! I was really alarmed lest Mr. Jasebrow should do a personal injury to Mr. Truesdell. He raved and hissed at him, and called him all manner of names, and denounced him as a shameless trickster, etc. But suddenly Muhlenburg, Truesdell's control, took possession of him, and explained that it was not Truesdell himself who had so skillfully tricked us all, but that it was the Diakka, a mischievous spirit who often takes possession of a medium, and delights in making them perform all kinds of tricks, cheats, and frauds; that even the best and most reliable mediums were apt to be misused. Muhlenberg then gave us quite a discourse, and, to my surprise, Mr. Jasebrow and wife were completely modified and satisfied with the explanation.

Indeed I don't see how Mr. Jasebrow could deny the genuinness of Mr. Truesdell's controls while claiming the honestness of his own, for Mr. Jasebrow had given us a long discourse purporting to come from Thomas Paine, claiming that he had written the Declaration of Independence, the "Age of Reason," etc., and assuring me that he hoped I would be convinced of the truth of Spiritualism. That sounds Paine-like, don't it? We also had a dark circle where hands touched my head, back, and shoulders, and lights floated about the room while we all joined hands in a circle, and apparently no hand was free to perform the phenomena. But I had heard of this before, and so being forearmed I was not mystified; it was as I surmised. Mr. Truesdell confessed to me that he held my hand with two fingers of his, and held Mr. Waldo's with the rest of the same hand, thus leaving one of his (Truesdell's) free, with which he could produce the pattings, touches, and phosphorescent lights (from moist matches). I havn't space or time to tell of half the wonders of this one light-revealing seance.

I saw duplicated most of the wonders performed by Mrs. R. C. Simpson, during her seance with Rev. Minot J. Savage, as related in the R.-P. Journal, March 24, 1883, of which Mr. Savage says: "The tests seem to me to be perfect." Afterwards, Mr. Savage had a seance with Mr. Truesdell, of which he says: "In my study, one day in last March, he gave me a regular seance. It was in daylight. He produced the raps, read names on folded slips of paper, described departed friends in a trance, and produced the phenomena of slate-writing. Had he gone away declaring himself a genuin medium, I should hav been completely deceived. And I am not willing to confess myself easily duped either, for I hav detected many fine tricks of legerdemain, and hav made quite a study of all these things. But when it was over, he sat down and explained it all. From beginning to end it was pure and simple trickery."

I saw at Mr. Jasebrow's the wonderful stone spoken of in "Bottom Facts," page 116—a rock weighing about 80 pounds, which fell on the table during a seance at his house in the winter of 1876–77. This stone is declared to hav been materialized by 100,000 expert chemists from the "Royal Esthetical Laboratory of Spiritual Science." Yet there it was, lying carelessly on the floor in a little basement room, where any adroit thief might make off with the wonderful prize. One would think such a treasure worth more than its weight in gold to those who really had faith in its genuinness. But would our friends thus hav left a nugget of that size of the root of all evil thus lying around loose?

Only one thing now remains a mystery to all but the Diakka. This is how the writing got on the inside of my own closely-tied slates. This I could obtain no clue to from the powers that be, save that it was a trick.

One item more and I'm done. I hav it upon the authority of all present last night, that a few evenings since, Mr. Truesdell wrote a communication for Mr. Geo. F. A. Illidge, of Detroit, Michigan, upon a locked slate which was further fastened by said Illidge with a fine thread tied through and through the lock in a number of hard knots. The writing was done as I hav described above—with a goblet of water on the slates, all of which rested upon Mr. Truesdell's right hand, while his left was in plain sight in the center of the table. In this communication, and from a dead guess, he wrote the name, Mary Illidge, which proved to be Mr. Illidge's deceased sister's name. Remember, every guess of this kind which hits a mark neutralizes a host that miss fire.

I hope my spiritual friends will believe I am earnest in seeking real truth, even though I fail to find it leading me towards eternal individual identity. Life is so fair and sweet to me I would fain prolong it into a beautiful beyond if I could. But I must believe as evidence compels, and not as wishes lead.

THE LAST SEANCE.

I probably attented my last seance yesterday evening. A few friends were invited in, and the three mediums present were Mr. Truesdell, Mr. West, and Mr. Bonta. The spirits proved to be unusually deft and activ. Mr. Truesdell was made to put a small bullet into his eye and it would come out of his mouth. Or, if put into one ear, it would come out of the other one. Mr. Bonta would take half a dollar and, right before our eyes, it would become two half dollars, or disappear entirely, or, perhaps, be found in some person's lap, or go through his head and come out at the back of it. A goblet of water was brought, the half dollar was held with a handkerchief over it, punched up between my thumb and finger over the glass of water, when the control said: "Drop the money into the water." I did so, but though I plainly heard it fall into the glass, lo! it went clear through it, and the table, also, and rolled on the floor; at least, so it appeared to do. I then singled out one special piece from fifty squares of card-board, and touched it, and though Bonta was blindfolded, he was certain to tell by spirit power (!) precisely which piece I had touched. He would leave the room, and some person would go in any part of the house and hide a small article, and, though blindfolded, he would take the hands of a little girl who had witnessed the hiding, and by her, through magnetic control, he would be guided directly to the hidden article.

The most wonderful test of the evening was the great box phenomena. Mrs. Truesdell made a bag about six feet long, out of common white domestic, and a large box was brought in and thoroughly examined by us all. Just a common square box, with a hinged lid to it, and holes bored in the sides to let in air. This was then shut up and locked, and the key given to me. Then it was tied with ropes and the ends of the tying were again tied with small cords and all were sealed with wax. Then the bag was put on top of the box, and Mr. Bonta got into the bag and it was securely tied, and the tying was sealed with wax. All this was done in plain view of the audience. We then, every one of us, left the room and shut the door, so we knew he had no confederate to help him The proper "conditions" being secured by music's harmonious strains from the piano, in an incredible short space of time, the control announced that Mr. Bonta had been dematerialized and would be found rematerialized inside the box. We all rushed into the room to see if this were, indeed, possible. There, on top of the box, lay the bag, limp and empty but whole and intact, and even the knot sealed as we left it. I lifted one end of the box, and, sure enough, it was "heavy as lead." The strings were cut, the ropes taken off, and the box unlocked. When the lid was thrown back, there was Mr. Bonta, sound and whole, safely ensconced therein. His young wife, never before having witnessed such a performance, was nervous, anxious, and uneasy the whole time, and some of the friends even going so far as to to ask what she would do should the spirits fail to rematerialize her husband after dematerializing him. Half joking, and yet with a tremor in her voice, she said, "I'd gather up the pieces."

Then we had slate-writing performances under strict test conditions. Two slates were brought out and thoroughly cleaned and marked for identification, and tied together by Mrs. Bonta, and the knot sealed with hot wax. On these was placed a glass goblet of water. The two slates thus prepared, and under plain sight of us all, were laid by Mrs. Bonta on Mr. Truesdell's right hand, his left lying on the table, and his feet, and indeed his whole body, in sight of the entire circle. He then passed the slates under the edge of the table so that the top of the goblet rested upon the bed of it; then we took another look at the slates to see that all was fair and square. A circle was now formed, and then Mr. Truesdell told Mrs. Bonta to ask a question in the name of any person she chose, alive or dead, and the spirits would write the name and the answer on the tied-up slates. So she said, "Theodore, are you there?" A response was heard, and in a moment or two she was asked to look under the table and see if all was still right, and finding it was, she was told to take out the slates and put them upon the table. This she did. The knot was still perfect, and the water unspilled. The string was cut, and on the inside of the slates was written, "You bet, Theodore," plainly showing that he had been there when she inquired. You will see there could not hav been any previous preparation for this test, as Mrs. Bonta was an earnest investigator, and was incredulous of any reply as being possible to be written on the inside of the slates she had so well secured. The question and name were given after it was impossible for an exchange of slates, Mr. Truesdell's only chance to write being with the hand that held the slate and the glass goblet. It is all a perfect mystery to me how the writing got inside the slates.

*Cheseboro is the same as the Jasebrow of Bottom Facts," and I used the "Facts" spelling of it, so as not to confound readers,

It is true that Mrs. Simpson convinced the Rev. Minot J. Savage that the same thing was done in the same way through her mediumship, and he declared himself "well satisfied," saying it was "a remarkable test." Now, I hav seen it done even better than Mrs. Simpson did it, and it is all a complete mystery to me how it was done; yet I do not think it is spirits. I know it is not, for Mr. Truesdell told us, before he began, that it was pure legerdemain. But he refuses to giv the solution for two reasons; first, because other would-be mediums would learn the trick, and thus be enabled to deceive the credulous. And also because it would forestall a second edition of his book, wherein he intends to giv a more thorough revelation of the spiritual phenomena than he has as yet been able to do.

After this two more slates were brought and cleaned, marked, tied up, and sealed by Mrs. Bonta, as before. These were placed in plain sight on top of the table, in full light, Mr. Truesdell not touching them at all.

Mrs. Bonta and myself had each written a question to some dead friend, addressing him by name. We folded the slips of paper and kept them in our own hands, simply touching Mr. Truesdell's forehead an instant with the folded slips, and not letting go of them at all. Nor did anyone see the writing save ourselvs. The prepared slates were covered with a tureen cover; a circle was formed. The scratching of a pencil was heard, and finally the control pronounced the message written. Mrs. Bonta cut the string, and lo! there, neatly and plainly written, were the messages, and names to them, and even our questions fully answered. Mrs. Bonta was dumbfounded, and I wondered with almost incredulous surprise how it was possible, as I knew no one had the slightest clue to my question or the name, and I still held the slip of paper containing them in my own hand. After the seance Mr. Truesdell fully explained to me the box trick, and the last slate trick, and mind-reading; all of which are simple as A B C when you once see into them.

I am so sure that every seance might thus be ventilated by the mediums, were "conditions" favorable, that I no longer wonder why no one comes forward to claim Mr. Truesdell's five hundred dollars, or other sums of money that hav been offered from time to time by skeptics to spirit mediums.

I do not claim that all phenomena are explained, or even explainable under known laws, but when so much is done through pure legerdemain, and trick after trick is exploded all along the track taken by mediums, I feel that it only depends upon time to open up each one as it becomes developed. It is like "traps for the unwary"—the dropping of pocket-books and other city tricks performed upon the unsuspecting sight-seer from the country by some adroit city thief. You expose and ventilate some trick, and they get up another, and so it goes on. A new lock is invented, and the cracksman soon learns how to pick it, and another has to be gotten up. Thus there is a continual round of deception and fraud, of exposure and a rebuilding.

All we can do is to work for truth, sow our little seeds of facts, and let them go forth doing what good they may. We cannot reform the world, but we can do right ourselvs, and set a good example for others to follow if they will. We can giv our truths, and patiently await their acceptance.

If my trip has done ever so little towards proving spirit phenomena and spirit existence impossible, I am more than satisfied. All I want is the real and the true. Affectionately, ELMINA.

Syracuse, N. Y., Oct. 15, 1884.

W. F. Jamieson.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Beginning with the fall lecturing, it will not be amiss to send you reports of the progress of Liberalism in various parts of the country which I expect to visit this year. This will help carry out Mr. Parton's idea of news of the Liberal movement.

There are thousands of unorganized Liberals all over the West. Were they activ and aggressiv as they are numerous, there would not be a village nor city nor neighborhood where Freethought, in some form, as contradistinguished from "orthodoxy," would not be heard for at least a week at a time, once or twice a year.

There are neighborhoods where Freethinkers, from the habit of doing nothing in a public way for their cause most of the year, never wake up! Their children go to the Christmas Sunday-school, where many of them learn, between their lessons about King David, etc., what wicked and generally disreputable people their Infidel parents are. This is sober fact, repeated over and over, Sunday after Sunday.

It is true that Liberals lack zeal and the orthodox abound with it. Often Freethought, with its crumbling Leagues and dry-rot of apathy, appears like a "forlorn hope." But for one, instead of discouraging me, I feel like working all the harder for it. This season towns in the West are arousing themselvs to do something for humanity, as God appears to hav organized hosts of followers working for him, and the Liberal knows that if there is a king of the universe, he "needs but little here below."

I am now delivering a course of week-evening lectures in Salem, D. T., to good houses. In my experience in lecture-life, I find but little difficulty in securing a respectful and attentiv hearing; for, while abating nothing in freedom of expression, I endeavor to treat my fellow-beings, no matter what their views, with the courtesy their due. Dr. M. Ware, a Wisconsin friend, who has several times aided my work in Wisconsin, wrote me to come here.

Freethought is so immeasurably superior to Christianity, that it is not to be wondered at that our speakers hand out to the multitude very different pabulum from the regular Sunday bran-diet of theology.

Last night, after talking to the people a plump hour, the call was, "Go on! go on!" Whoever hears Christians, with all their zeal, after listening, half asleep, to a drowsy sermon, say, "Go on?"

From Salem I go to Wentworth, Dakota, to giv a series of lectures. Then I am expected to visit Marshall and Currie, Minn., again.

I hav not been able to get a minister of the Lord Jesus Christ to meet me in debate in about three years. I hav taken to coaxing them to come and show me my error. Even Elder Clark Braden, since I met him in the third debate three years ago, has given me over to the buffetings of Satan. And Livezey, the Catonsville Christian crank, after refusing in private to debate any of the vital issues as between Freethought and theology, hektographs the falsehood all over the country that he could not get me to debate; he had tried hard, but I would not discuss. This, too, after I had wrung from him the "confession" that he is about as much of an Infidel as I am.

Brethren, wherever there is a chance for debate with a "servant of the Lord," I will come and hold it, and if the fur does not fly it will not be my fault. If the clergy are all silenced, I am heartily sorry, for I'll miss a great deal of heaven on earth, which I used to enjoy when they were my activ opponents. A young minister in Salem last Sunday night said: "Don't argue. Nobody was ever converted to the Christian religion by argument." The young man spoke wiser than he knew.

I may be hereafter addressed at Lake City, Minn.

TRAVELING AND LECTURING.

I am booked here, Wentworth, Dak., for a course of lectures, having finished the series in Salem, Dak., Wednesday evening last. How refreshing is the outspoken Liberal! A man or woman that dares to run up the flag of freedom amid the jeers and jibes of "the just" members of the church! Dr. M. Ware, of Salem, is one of this kind. Mr. W. L. Horton, of Wentworth, one of your correspondents, is another.

I hav been staying by a little local independent paper for nearly a year, and hav succeeded in establishing it in spite of unrelenting opposition from the popular place-seekers in church and state. I am now able to place a trusty workman in charge of the publication, which again leaves me free to pursue my old avocation, lecturing wherever man or woman may "call" me. Several engagements for lectures already await me.

I very much admire the earnest, kindly, yet uncompromising spirit manifested by friends Watts and Putnam. In former years I had the pleasure of organizing a number of Liberal Leagues. Within the past four years I hav done nothing in that line, not because of lack of interest in the work, but because there grew up a false sentiment in the League membership, that a lecturer who had the temerity to change his mind ought to be tabooed! If the changling is a lecturer, dependent upon his lecturing profession mainly for subsistence, refuse to invite him to speak his convictions! "Great heavens!" (quoted) Is that Liberalism?

I hope no Liberal League in this country will refuse to giv George Chainey a call to speak, even if every member in it is a Materialist. Are we children of the church, in its method, in dealing with heresy? Shall we not rise above such petty, spiteful procedure? To-day Brother Chainey has abandoned Materialism to accept Spiritualism. Who shall usurp the claim to be his judge? Who shall say the man is not honest? Who can say that, to Chainey's mind, the "evidence" is not all-sufficient? I hav carefully read every word of his Caasadaga conversion address, and am compelled to say that it makes no impression whatever on my mind in favor of Spiritualism. But why should not every one of us take George's word for it, that he is a sincere convert?

Above all classes, Liberals appear to the poorest advantage in denying any man the undeniable right to change his mind. A person who seeks for truth must change his mind. He really has no choice in the matter. Are we sectarians, that we should constitute ourselvs a drum-head court martial to sit in judgment upon a brother's mental struggles, when we hav no means of knowing what they are, only as he may report?

Why not encourage George Chainey to tell his story in the presence of every Liberal League in America? Should we crowd him out of our assemblies because he imagins he has obtained a glimpse of some spiritual spheres, and because he has said "harsh things" about Materialists, or their views, or their lack of enthusiasm? Some of the harshness we may deserve, and so we ought to thank instead of curse him. No Liberal can curse a man on account of his conviction.

Six years ago I had the impudence to reject Spiritualism and accept Materialism. For three or four years even the Leagues I helped to organize, with the grand motto, "Justice for all, privilege for none," contained some members who used their influence, not against Materialists, as such, having a voice on their platform, but against a Materialist lecturer who had been activ in promulgating Spiritualism for nearly twenty years. This, too, from people who never wearied in singing praises to free speech and free press! For all that, I hav never harbored unkind feeling toward Spiritualists personally; but I will freely discuss their doctrins and so-called evidences, whenever I choose, and wherever I can. I hope to do so in the future, as I hav in the past, without acrimony or personal bitterness.

I now wish a valuable Freethought paper had published my friendly criticism of George Chainey's "Lecture Announcements," a little over a year ago. Mr. Chainey said to the public that he would deliver lectures that would not offend (!) church-members. I defied him to deliver his masterful lecture on "The Clergy" and fill any such contract. The editor of the esteemed journal in question wrote me, saying that Mr. Chainey requested that no replies or criticisms be published! That was a weak spot in George. W. F. JAMIESON.

Perry-scopics.

Things are made known to us in terms of force through the senses, and these manifestations of force are invariably certain and uniform, requiring no exceptional superior personal endowment or "mediumship" for their apprehension.

Real science does not therefore repel the doubter who asks hard conundrums; nor does she appeal for proof to some "seventh son of a seventh son," or to some extra-sensitiv of a shattered nervous system; or to some one who has "felt a soft hand on a fevered brow." She appeals to the experiment itself in the hands of the robust, clear-headed doubter himself.

When Brother Perry desires to prove to Brother Wettstein that the air supplies the substantial elements of vegetable growth, he refers him to an experiment in his own hands; but when he wishes to prove that spirits materialize "old clothes" from the same source, he puts himself on the witness stand, as having seen and heard something of a very ambiguous nature performed through the mediumship of some other third person.

When Brother Perry talks science, he only says what is well known, but when he assumes that there are disembodied human spirits; that they feed on the the rich abundance of the air; that the air is "their country;" that they hav wings, or other members or organs; or that these spirits are, or are not, subject to the law of gravity—when he makes any of these assertions, he cannot appeal to a single experiment for proof. Let him bring his scales, and, in something like the lemon-tree box experiment, prove that the substance of a "materialization" comes from the air, and not from the lock-up of the cabinet. But no one has ever made, or ever will make, such a test, for as soon as one of the circle becomes scientifically critical "the conditions are unfavorable."

Now, I know how it is, for we hav had the spirits at our house, and had them so bad that even the baby would giv the table a jolt, and with as cunning look as ever a little innocent sinner could put on, cry out, "See spi'ts! see spi'ts!"

Now the baby didn't want to lie; it only wanted the table to move; didn't want to see a failure. He wasn't a "crank," either, but he was willing to help a little rather than hav us disappointed. We got to be so dishonest I stopped the humbug. Excuse the details, for we hav enough of such things in print already; beginning with the "Transfiguration on the Mount," and ending with "Lillie Dove"—not to mention the Virgin Mary.

If Brother Perry must divert himself with erecting the superstructure of spirit-realism out of the debris of "the demolished gods of superstition," all I can say is that the material is suitable. Death is sad, but there are other and worse things; and to be an entire idiot, or a poor, disembodied table-tipping spirit, would, I think, be worse.

"Our world's as full of beauty
As other worlds above;
Did we but do our duty
It might be full of love."

How the Catholic Church Meets Heresy.

In a recent publication, advertised as blessed by the pope, is an article written especially for Catholic eyes. It is entitled, "The Duty of Catholics in the Face of Modern Unbelief." The main points of the paper are: 1. That "dogmatic Protestantism is moribund, if not practically dead, as a religion. . . . In country districts and in fashionable watering-places, the churches may still be frequented for respectability's sake, but Protestantism as a living, energizing power, ready to do battle against all opponents, has lost its former vitality, and thoughtful men are drifting away from it into some form or other of unbelief or Agnosticism. . . . Protestants . . no longer cherish the fundamental doctrins of Christianity with a personal and deeply-rooted affection. If they still call themselvs Christians, their Christianity hangs, for the most part, somewhat loosely about them. They do not feel hurt if it is assailed, or resent the covert sneers of the disciple of Strauss or Renan;" and, 2. That Catholicism is the only power left to cope with modern scientific unbelief. "She, and she alone, is regarded by the enemies of Christendom as an adversary to be feared."

In this broad statement, the writer has told the truth in a general way, and after allowing for his hatred of the followers of Luther, and his love for his own church, we may accept his propositions. The question he first raises is, Will the Catholic church always remain intact in organization and infallible in dogmatic religion? It is natural that he should contend for the affirmativ of these queries, but in his contention he admits facts which, in connection with history, overthrow himself. Everyone knows that the Romish church has lost country after country, until now it controls only the least progressiv nations and the most besotted, with a large element in the United States. There is no escaping the fact, however, that in this country Catholicism has multiplied with alarming rapidity through immigration and the prolific nature of its female votaries. But will these recruits always remain Catholics? While stoutly asserting—with a vehemence showing the wish to be father to the thought—that the church herself is in no danger, the writer admits that the advance of skepticism is pregnant with danger to Catholics: "Soldier in deed and in truth the Catholic must be in the present day, and many an assault he must encounter, many a battle he must fight against the countless foes who are arrayed in the livery of modern unbelief. In his daily paper, in his weekly or monthly magazine, among his associates in the school of medicin or of law, in office and counting house, in club and restaurant, on the railroad, at the hotel, at the private dinner-table, in every social or friendly meeting, he is liable to encounter plausible, ingenious, well-stated objections to Christianity and even to Theism. There is no shirking the contest; the enemy must be met. If we would avoid coming into contact with modern Infidelity, we must needs go out of the world. It is in the very air we breathe; it encircles us on every side; we may protect our children from it during childhood and early youth, but the day must come when they will be exposed to its attack. Every day it stalks abroad more fearlessly, emboldened by the overthrow of the dogmatic Protestant. How, then, are we to deal with it? What is the attitude of the Catholic, and especially of the educated Catholic, toward modern Infidelity?"

That is the case of his enemy admitted by the Jesuitical writer. How does he meet it? How does he propose to hav the average Catholic meet it? What reply does he propose to put into the mouths of his dupes when they are brought face to face with the opponent of Christianity? He meets it by acknowledging that in an intellectual controversy Catholics are not equal to their adversaries, and advises dodging. It being unwise, he says, as general rule, for the ordinary Catholic to enter upon a religious controversy, he should fall back upon the weight of authority. The writer continues:

"If a skeptic asks me (I speak in the character of an average educated Catholic layman) whether I really believe that my God is present in a wafer, when the evidence of every sense testifies to its being an ordinary piece of bread, and challenges me to prove the fact, my most rational answer is to ask him, by way of retort, whether he really believes that the earth moves and the sun stands still, when the evidence of his senses testifies to the contrary, and so challenge him to prove by arguments the scientific fact. He will, probably, reply that it has been proved again and again; and that, though he cannot bring forward the actual proof, yet he knows that they are sufficient to satisfy men of learning who are competent judges of the question. I answer that this is exactly my case with regard to the doctrin of the Blessed Eucharist. I cannot prove it, but I am satisfied to receive it on authority, just as he receives on authority the doctrin of the earth's revolution. The only difference is that he relies on human authority, and therefore makes an act of human faith. I rely only on divine authority as well as human, and therefore make an act of divine faith."

Is it any wonder, in the face of such public and authoritativ teaching, that men speak with contempt of the Catholic church, and sneer at Catholicism as not being within the field of serious philosophy? Suppose, however, the skeptic should giv the priest Newton's formulas by which the movements of the planets are demonstrated, what would he do then—deny the law of gravitation? If the priest compares the sacrament of the eucharist to the theory of gravitation, he must show that a stone does not fall when thrown into the air, or demonstrate in an equally obvious manner that God dwells in a wafer. This he would hav hard work to do, for he admits he cannot prove the "presence" in the eucharist to be more than imagination.

Another instance of how he would meet the skeptic is given:

"If a man begin to talk about the 'monstrous conception of eternal fire,' it may be a better answer to ask him to withhold his judgment until he has been there for a hundred years or so than to rouse him to fresh blasphemies by discussing the possibility of hell. We must be on our guard against exposing that which is holy to be trampled upon by the sensualist or torn by the unbeliever."

The man who wrote this dishonest plea for his church is a learned member of the Society of Jesus (or Jesuits). If this is the best he, a priest, educated and able, can do, we can easily yield the point he urges, that "it is not desirable to encourage in the average lay Catholic an eagerness for the fray in matters of religion." And as for the priests themselvs, their condition is patly described in the French saying, "They begin by being fools and end in becoming knaves."

Difference in Degree, Not in Kind.

The announcement made by our Canadian correspondent that the customs officers hav proceeded to burn the books confiscated by them a year and two years ago, recalls the proclamation made by the preachers at the time. At one of the meetings of the Toronto Clerical Association it was unanimously resolved:

"That the members of the Toronto Clerical Association, many of whom hav examined the works lately confiscated by the collector of customs in Toronto, desire to express their entire approbation of his action as being strictly in accordance with the wholesome laws of the country, which exclude all indecent and immoral literature; and their conviction that he could hav taken no other course without failing in the obligations which his office lay upon him.

"Further, the members of the association desire to record their thanks to that officer for his fearless performance of his duty, and their persuasion that he deserves the cordial sympathy and support of all the friends of public morality."

The books seized, and of which the foregoing resolution speaks, were Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" and Voltaire's "Pocket Theology," sent from this office to Mr. Cooke. Ingersoll's works were also condemned and refused clearance on the same ground—"indecent and immoral literature!"

Who does not believe that if the preachers of Canada had the power they would gladly consign the authors of these books to a dungeon cell, if not to the flames that consumed the books!

In the province of Quebec if the bishops desire to build a church they can assess every man in the parish, and sell his farm if he refuses to pay, their claim taking precedence of even a mortgage. And the Free-thinker who invades the province to protest against this condition of things literally takes his life in his hand. Lower Canada is called the priests' paradise. The church owns about two-thirds of the real estate of the city of Quebec.

What an anomaly is presented across the borders! Government in one province burning books, instigated and applauded by Protestant preachers; in the other the Catholic church ruling everthing. Civilization decades behind in both! Yet can we boast, when in enlightened Massachusetts, and many other states, an Atheist is flung out of court; when in New York the official order of a state officer is openly defied by the church-controled school boards; and when, in every state but one, Freethinkers are made to pay for Christian worship in church and Congress? We may be indignant at the tyranny of the church in Canada, but let us not forget the ecclesiastical usurpations in our own land.

Clericals everywhere must be stripped of power. Turn the rascals out.

Church and State Partnership, East and West.

A story comes from Constantinople which revives recollections of the devilishness of the church in all lands and climes. The tale well illustrates the double rule under which the Eastern Christians still liv, and under which all peoples would liv, were not so large a portion of the claims of the church rejected by them. A young lady living in a small town in Asia Minor had been affianced, according to the barbarous custom still prevalent in the country, at a very tender age, to the son of a neighbor. Upon attaining riper years, she loathed the individual selected for her as a husband, and prevailed upon her parents to cancel the contract. She then engaged to marry a young man whom she loved. The parish priest here made his appearance, declaring that the first contract must be fulfilled, as the elders of the community demanded it. In vain the father besought these people not to interfere. He then telegraphed to the archbishop, the Armenian prelate, who wields papal authority over half the Catholics of Asia Minor. But this ecclesiastic, when he made his appearance, not only took sides with the elders, but arranged with them a plan for executing their purpose. The girl was seized and carried to a convent by a lot of ruffians hired for the work, where she was placed in a cell, and submitted to the most rigorous treatment with the hope of overcoming her resistance. She continued firm, however, and the bishop finally decided to marry her to the brute who sought her hand, by force. "Proceeding to her prison cell with all the necessaries, accompanied by the animal, burning with his vile desire to possess her, and the ruffians bought with his gold, the prelate commenced to read the service. At sight of the leering crowd the poor girl fainted. Brought to again, she fell at the knees of the bishop, and, with tears, implored him to desist. In vain she struggled to escape. Held fast by two of the ruffians as she lay upon the floor, for she could not be kept upon her feet, the horrid sacrilege was completed by the nuptial benediction being pronounced while she still loudly protested against it. The matter did not end here. The so-called husband, left with the young girl in order that by the consummation of the marriage all opposition might cease, found the strength of the unwilling bride too much for him, and so the hired ruffians came to his assistance. Some six hours afterward the poor victim, more dead than alive, was carried off to her brutal master's residence."

The father of the victim has appealed to the British and French consuls, and for this his life has been threatened by the bishop, and he has found it necessary to leave his home. The girl's life is threatened as well. The letter giving the account states that the key to this affair is "no doubt to be found in the jealousy with which the progress made by the American missionaries in that part of Asia Minor is regarded by the Armenian clergy."

So here we hav a repetition of the old, old story—the people must suffer in the quarrels of the church. Everywhere, in all religions, the priests arrogate to themselvs the right of controling the domestic affairs of their flocks. They claim that the "morals" of a nation are theirs to regulate, as the civil or physical duties are the state's. It is a partnership they hav held for centuries, and still hold in eastern countries, and in those in which ignorance rules in the western hemisphere.

This brutal outrage, now exposed to the public, will no doubt be adequately punished by the interference of foreign powers. But the claims of the church that she is the divinely appointed guardian of the people's moral and domestic affairs will not be less vociferously made.

Catholics are not alone in their endeavors to regulate the living of the people, though they may in this exceed in violence and boldness as they did in the systematic suppression by fire and sword. In our own country, who knows what crimes are committed in the convents and nunneries? But here the Protestants are the chief tyrants, because they comprise the chief portion of the population. Ecclesiastical societies to perform police duties are common, and the reason given for their existence is that it is the duty of the church to protect the morals of the people. The consideration of this claim brings us to the outrage at home.

During the present political campaign, the ecclesiastics are extraordinarily busy. We are in receipt of an anonymous circular of a most scurrilous and defamatory character, which has been compiled and mailed by the Protestant preachers. It purports to be "the result of the investigation by clergymen of the city of Buffalo," and says, in big black letters, that the evidence against a certain gentleman is ready for the public. It demands that we "hav an investigation by the clergy of the whole country." The reason given why the clergy take such an interest in the matter is, that "this is a moral question, not a political one." The anonymous scoundrels who got this circular up are all clergymen, we are told. If so, they must be depraved wretches, fit to figure in Billings's "Crimes of Preachers," or in Comstock's huge volume, and they are not one whit cleaner or better than the Armenian bishop who authorized, and personally abetted, the outrage of a girl, that he might be revenged upon his clerical enemies. The Independent, a religious newspaper, calls to its aid a string, a third of a column long, of ministers to defame the same gentleman, to whom it is politically opposed. The animus of the proceeding, and the gross abuse by the clergy of their position as moral censors, is seen in the fact that when the breath of slander blew against another gentleman, the preachers did not shout themselvs hoarse for "an investigation by the clergy of the whole country." The same religious paper also demands that every pulpiteer in the country shall denounce its opponent from their pulpits, because "it is a moral question," and the clergy are the keepers of morality.

This is carrying religion into politics with a vengeance. If the people acquiesce in the position taken by the church in the matter, and allow the preachers to be the final court in questions of this kind, the unification of church and state is as complete as though "God" was in every statute of every state of the Union. It is just what the church wants—to be acknowledged as the partner of the state, and absolute in the province of morals. And "morals" not only mean to it the sins charged to the Buffalo gentleman, but all matters pertaining to marriage, to Sunday recreations, to literature, to art, to religious observances, and to habits of the people formerly regulated by sumptuary laws. All these come under the head of morality, and the preachers would be tyrants in all departments as well as in one.

If this country is not to be reduced to the double-headed government of Asia Minor, the preachers must be made to realize that the people will accept them in no shape or manner as authoritativ on any question; and certainly not in one in which their motivs are so suspiciously plain as are those of the Buffalo Ministerial Association. That clergymen hav a natural aptitude for dirty scandals no one doubts who knows how often ministers figure in "woman scrapes," but their qualifications to decide moral questions is no greater on that account.

Down with state Protestantism as well as Catholicism!

Quarreling Over the Raw Material.

A dispatch from Trenton, N. J., of the 24th, says it was asserted in the Presbyterian Synod of that state at its annual meeting last week that distinctiv privileges were accorded to Roman Catholic priests in the Reform School at Jamesburg; that priests were permitted to hav separate services, such as celebrating the mass, establishing the confessional, and teaching their catechism to those children who they assert hav a parentage in that church; that they were permitted to withdraw those boys from the general moral and religious instruction of the schools and to place them under their special instruction and control, and that the instruction was not confined to the Catholic inmates alone. The Synod passed a resolution that "In the judgment of this Synod, such action on the part of our state officials is contrary to the genius of our government, calculated to foster a sectarian spirit, giv undue advantage to a particular denomination, and tends to impair the government and disciplin of the institution in question. We therefore protest against such action, and call on all in authority whose duty it is to appoint and direct such affairs to see to it that it be rescinded, and such objectionable privileges no longer be encouraged and allowed."

In a recent talk with a reporter of the Albany Argus, Mr. Baker, the superintendent of prisons in this state, called attention to the appropriation of fifteen hundred dollars which was contained in the Supply bill passed last winter for the purpose of compensating Catholic priests who conduct services in the prisons of the state. This bill took effect at the beginning of the fiscal year, Oct. 15th. A similar appropriation, he said, has been contained in numerous supply bills, passed by former legislatures, but has always heretofore been vetoed, and was approved for the first time by Gov. Cleveland. The matter of allowing Roman Catholics to hold services in the state prisons every Sunday has been strongly urged by prominent Catholics throughout the state for a long time past. Heretofore they hav been permitted to hold services every third Sunday, or one Sunday in each month. "I had found," he continued, "on looking into the matter, that two services, one Protestant and one Catholic, were held each Sunday in the foreign prisons. If I find that the system works well in Auburn prison, it will be established in all the state prisons later on. The $1,500 appropriation will be divided equally among the priests in the three prison parishes, or, in other words, each priest in whose parish a state prison is located, will hav $500 for holding services."

Thus the Catholic church is slowly getting a stronger foothold in our institutions. One would think it was enough that the church contributes so largely to the number of inmates of the state prisons and reformatories without asking the state to pay her priests for making recruits. But so long as it is easy to make a good churchman out of a poor thief, we presume the legislature will be besieged to allow the opportunity. Until our government is secularized from the top to bottom, and the prisons disconnected with politics, it is likely the Freethinkers will be compelled to help pay priests in our punitiv establishments.

Editorial Notes.

"EDGEWORTH'S" article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 11th, entitled "The New Land Projects," says Liberty, is one of the best and most original criticisms of Henry George's proposal to nationalize the land that has ever appeared in print.

GEORGE ALFRED TOWNSEND writes to his paper that Carl Schurz is an Infidel. This is an isolated instance of truthfulness on the part of "Gath," which would not hav occurred had he not thought the announcement would contract Mr. Schurz's political influence.

SOME of the Republican Liberals of Ohio, who worked earnestly for Garfield in 1880, are now doubtful about voting for Blaine. The Liberals of that state are numerous enough to demand respect from any presidential candidate, and hav a right to know how he stands in regard to the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

IN his lecture in Victoria, Col. Ingersoll said: "Let us forget our little ologies and our little isms; let us forget our belief that God made the earth to raise Methodists and Presbyterians on, and that the next world is an everlasting museum of Methodist mummies, Baptist barnacles, and Presbyterian petrifactions. The man with a new fact who will raise his fellow-men nearer to the sublime knowledge, is the only priest who can stand at the great altar in the church of humanity."

WE learn incidentally, through an eastern paper, that the people of Wyoming Territory are to vote upon the 4th inst. on the question of taxing church property. We know not what steps the Liberals of the territory hav taken to make this vote favorable; perhaps they hav done all that is possible; but the attention of the officers of the National Liberal League ought to hav been called to the matter that they might hav aided in the work. If the vote shall be adverse a great opportunity has been lost.

THE agitation against Christianity in the schools has extended to India, where many of the schools attached to missions hav managed to get subsidies from the state. It is now proposed that, in all schools aided by the government, attendance on religious instruction be made optional. This the missionaries protest against, and the result may be that state grants will be refused entirely. This would throw the Christians upon their own resources, and might end in closing several of the superstition manufactories now open.

A RECENT letter from a Liberal friend now in St. Thomas, West Indies, says: "Freethought (Infidelity) is making rapid progress in this town, population about twelve thousand. A dozen years ago I was about the only outspoken Infidel in the place; now there are scores. I happened to hav with me a copy of the Ingersoll-Black-Fisher debate, which has been made to do good service. It has been read by a score or more of our best people with splendid results. I consider it the best work of the kind extant."

THE Association for the Propagation of the Faith, of France, gave some three millions of dollars to the church in this country when it was young. A Catholic writer recently urged that the Catholics of this country return to it at least the interest on that amount to enable it to aid missions now in need. If a heretic may be allowed to interpose a word, we would suggest that the church pay Archbishop Purcell's debts to the poor people he defrauded by his three-million-dollar failure that the glory of God may more abound. We make this suggestion with due humility, and hope we shall not be excommunicated for it.

THE story of the "faith cure" of a Mrs. Wimpy, of Norcross, Ga., is being widely circulated. R. A. Smiley called our attention to it, and we asked for information. "H. A. T.," of the Pittsburgh Truth, writes that he obtained the following from a reliable informant: "It is a shameful imposition, and is the direct result of hysteria and religious fanaticism. Mrs. Wimpy is of a weak and hysterical disposition. Eight years ago she was taken under medical treatment, and subsequently discharged well and in good health; but owing to an accident she was again brought under medical treatment, and again discharged and considered by herself and her husband as cured. As proof of this I offer as evidence a certificate published in the Atlanta Daily Constitution from Mr. Wimpy, to the effect that a certain doctor had performed a miraculous cure on Mrs. Wimpy. Within the same period of time she has borne several children, and has at times walked and rode out whenever an occasion suited, and has been met on the streets of Atlanta apparently in good health." In connection with this Christian lie, we may quote another from across the water. Mrs. Besant relates it in the National Reformer: "Another instance of the complete truthlessness which characterizes earnest Christians has just come to my notice. A Freethinker writes me that some Salvationists are boasting of having 'at last converted one of Bradlaugh's men, an Infidel who used to lecture at the Hall of Science;' he had been very well off at one time, but owing to his belief and drink, etc., had been reduced to such straits that he had to part with his glasses for a few pence, and that while in this plight the devil tempted him to go back to his old friend, Mrs. Besant, and to lecture against the Army again; he however resisted this temptation. The Freethinker asked, first, for his name; second, the date when he used to lecture for the Infidels at the Hall of Science; third, when and where was he converted. All the reply he has got is: 'The captain does not know; but his name is Llewellyn, 8 Crawford street, Camberwell, and he was converted at 8 o'clock on a Tuesday night at Camberwell Barracks about three months back.' Of course this is a sheer invention. I never heard of any 'Llewellyn,' and he has most certainly not lectured at the Hall of Science since I hav been in the party, i. e., for ten years. To speak of me as 'his old friend, Mrs. Besant,' shows that Salvationism and lying are quite compatible." Mrs. Besant adds an account of a scare cure which was sent her from a cis-Atlantic friend. The writer is a Mr. Holmes, who says: "Over 66 years ago I witnessed a scare cure of a bedridden patient that for the quickness, thoroughness, and permanency of its operation exceeded any faith cure which has ever come under my notice. An activ and well educated man was attacked with inflammatory rheumatism, which assumed an alarming form, accompanied by agonizing torture. Days, weeks, and even months brought little relief. By order of his doctor and the persuasion of his friends, he was one day induced to allow himself to be placed in a reclining chair, supported by blankets and pillows, and was moved through two or three large rooms to one in which was a large open fire of wood; over this fire a kettle with two or three pails of water had been placed for heating. As the younger 'call boy' in the house, I was placed by the attendant who went out of the room, to signal any needs of the patient. Suddenly the kettle was upset, and the water, poured into the activ fire, caused a cloud of steam and ashes to pervade the room. Like an arrow from a bow our invalid leaped from his chair and made good time to his bed-room. In about ten minutes he arose and dressed, declaring that he felt no pain, and in a few days he was about his regular business. I knew him intimately for ten years later, and he continued strong and healthy, a firm believer in the scare cure."

W. F. JAMIESON will deliver a course of lectures in the Opera Hall of Seward, Neb., beginning on Sunday, Nov. 9th, at 2 o'clock P.M. The course will last through the week.

A Note from Mr. Charles Watts.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just read in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER the remarks of Mr. Chainey in reference to myself, which are in some instances thoroughly inaccurate, and in others entirely misleading. I cannot think that friend Chainey would intentionally misrepresent the facts of the case as he has done; and therefore, as he insists upon my further noticing him, I will, with your permission, pen a correction of his errors for your columns next week. I would do so now, but I am just leaving for Hamilton, where I lecture to-morrow. Personally, my esteem for my old colleague is so great that I wish he had not rendered it necessary for me to say anything more upon the subject. To remain silent, however, after his statements last week would be disrespectful to him, unfair to your readers, and unjust to myself. Yours faithfully,

Toronto, Oct. 25, 1884. CHARLES WATTS.

Letters from Friends.

HAMILTON, ONT., Oct. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: At the request of Mr. Watts, who has been lecturing in our city for the last two evenings, I write you a short account of his reception, and the progress we are making with the aid of his valuable services. Since his arrival in Canada this season, we hav been favored with his presence on five evenings—and well has he used them. I am pleased to tell you that his audiences are again assuming the proportions they did last winter, when he stirred up the orthodox bile, and scared the ministerial association so that they will not allow their champion, Dr. Sexton, whom they hav had lecturing here, to meet Mr. Watts in debate on the relativ merits of Secularism and Christianity. One clerical gentleman, the Rev. W. H. Parsons, of Michigan, being in the city, essayed to reply at the close of one of Mr. Watts's lectures. He never attempted to reply to the subject-matter of the lecture, but to berate the audience for applauding Mr. Watts. He then put a few questions to our champion, and in sitting down made some allusion to "long ears," and made use of the word "ass." Those who heard Mr. Watts reply, both orthodox and heterodox, will as long as they liv never forget it. Our champion "mopped the floor" with his clerical opponent, and he appeared the sickest-looking man that ever got upon a platform. Whilst this was going on, the door of the hall was assailed by six stalwart members of that latest excrescence on Christianity, the Salvation Army. During Mr. Watts's lecture he read a letter he had received that morning, advising him that a yawning hell lay at his feet, and that he was about to tumble into it, and that his days were short, and further advising him to attend at their barracks, and to bring with him two other gentlemen whose names they gave, as they, too, were on the road to hell. This hocus-pocus was signed, "Happy Tommy Stout." Whilst the clerical gentleman above referred to was on the platform, those warriors of Jesus filed into the hall, and the leader proved to be Mr. Stout himself, who advanced to the front of the audience and demanded that Mr. Watts should read the letter in his presence. Tommy had fire in his eye, but as the clergyman had the floor the warrior had to wait, until the fire dimmed somewhat, as by the time Mr. Watts had flayed his opponent Tommy's courage forsook him, and he lied for Christ's sake by denying the authorship of the letter; but the subject-matter it contained he believed to be true—whereupon he and his semi-lunatic friends left the hall. No doubt you will hav it served up in their next War Cry, of the grand attack the 3d Canadian blood and fire boys made upon the devil in Hamilton. But they will not tell that two of their members who attended our lectures, on being chided by their captain for doing so, told that person that they were going again to the camp of the enemy, whereupon they were ejected from the building something after the style of Jesus and the money-changers in the temple.

I am pleased with the prospect of our having a strong Secular Society. This very orthodox city teems with skeptics, and they only want stirring up by such lectures as we are getting from Mr. Watts. One of the surest signs of our eventual success is the increasing number of ladies who attend our lectures, and the very great interest evinced by them after the meetings in purchasing tracts and Freethought literature.

We hav thirty-seven names on our roll of membership, but that is not a tithe of those who are eligible, but whose business connections preclude the possibility, as they say, of identifying themselvs with us at present, until we can popularize the movement. Hoping and trusting the good work may go on, I remain, Yours for the truth,

GEO. MADDOCKS, Sec. Hamilton Secular Society.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Oct. 22, 1884.

TO THE REV. F. M. BOWMAN, Pastor of the Baptist church, Columbus, Kan., Dear Sir: You published in the Columbus papers that you would show up the origin and character of Spiritualism and Infidelity, on Sunday, September 14th. I was present and heard myself and Infidels and Spiritualists disparaged, abused, misrepresented, denounced, and damned by your assertions and biblical quotations. You called the Infidels and Spiritualists, in and around Columbus, a bad set, devilish, infernal, and nefarious, and said that Spiritualism was the worst form of Infidelity. You said if they were present to hear you, they could not sit still, "but I did without an effort."

I sent you a polite invitation to discuss with me, in public, the relativ character and merits of Infidelity and Christianity, and the power of each to bless and save humanity, and you refused to "come down" to me and leave your "great work," and, therefore, I send you this published letter. You invited critics to come and hear you, and now you refuse to be criticised and reviewed in public, and retreat behind your "coward's castle," the pulpit, as a "tongue-valiant warrior."

If you loved truth and humanity, you would welcome free speech and criticism face to face with Infidelity and Spiritualism.

Sir, it is most strange and inconsistent for Christians to oppose and denounce Spiritualists, for they both believe in and try to prove a future life, upon which all your pulpit efforts are based.

You say they "are lost, and, therefore, we so earnestly warn them of the coming danger." If you are so solicitous for my salvation from hell—your orthodox hell—why do you not come to me and talk to me, and not evade me in priest-and-Levite style? You quote, "O generation of vipers," and, "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can you escape the damnation of hell?" and these prove that I, and all Infidels and Spiritualists, are serpents, vipers, and "hell-bound." Again you quote for me, "Ye are of your father—the devil." Well, I prefer his fathership, to the fathership of a God who (see Numbers xxxi) told Moses to go down and kill, and rob, and ravish the Midianites, and leave none alive but the thirty-two thousand virgins, etc., a most horrid, revolting, and inhuman chapter of your God's character, whom you worship (?) and quote as authority, and pray to and "glorify."

You say your God is more severe and denouncing of Spiritualists than you are, and quote from Deut. xviii, 10 and 11, against them, and say that "God ordered those ancient mediums put to death;" and you seem to sanction the order; and, perhaps, if you had been one of the God-like Puritans in Salem in 1692, you would hav aided in the torture and murder of those poor wizards and witches, which was done by the same authority and command of God.

Do you think such preaching, and such quotations, in which you seem to glory and delight, will make the world better, and save it, in any sense? No, sir; true humanity and manhood, and all that is high and good, revolts against it, and it will make all lovers of truth, justice, and humanity Infidels to all such inhuman authorities and absurdities. You forget how Baptists were ostracized and persecuted by the God-like Puritans, but you show the same spirit toward Infidels and Spiritualists; and you prayed to your God that Columbus might be clear of them, or words to that effect. I hav no doubt you want "God in the Constitution," and orthodox religion established by law. You are a church-and-state man, and, if you had the power, we Infidels would be prevented from utterance, if not banished, tortured, or murdered.

Well it is that the Christians are not all of one sect, and that through natural growth, parentage, and education, humanity is coming to the light and liberty of a higher life in spite of mythology, bigotry, superstition, priestcraft, and fabricated gods, devils, witches, ghosts, heavens, hells, etc.

You quote for me, "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God; and I will add that all nature and all science confirm it. I mean a personal God that you said you could prove from nature. In the domain of science, God is not to be found. The more people worship and glorify such a God, the less they care for, and the more they persecute and oppress and enslave, humanity. Laplace told Napoleon that he had no place for God in his philosophy; and the word God is not found in "Humboldt's Cosmos." Thomas Jefferson said God was a hocus-pocus and a phantom; and, sir, some of the best men and women living believe the same. Gods belong to the childhood of human development; and believe in them if you will, but do not denounce me because I do not, or quote any Bible to prove my destiny. I am an individual, and do my own thinking. I hav no opinions which I am afraid to discuss with you, or anyone, or to subject to the most rigid logic and morality. I will advocate and practice, as far as possible, anything and everything that is for the good and happiness of humanity.

There are good and bad men and women in and out of the churches, because they are organized so. Are the members of your church any better in their practical life and conduct than the same number of Infidels, on the average? I could quote many passages from Christ that might fit you in your zeal to make proselytes, as you hav quoted to show me up, but I will not. You quote Nehemiah vi, 2, 3, to prove that you are up and I down far beneath you; and that you would hav to come down to discuss with me. If that is so, I would advise you to stay up, as you might not get back again! You say you are doing "a great work;" yes, I think you are making more Infidels than converts. Well, all I ask of you is, that you tolerate me as I do you; giv me my natural rights as I freely acknowledge yours, and ask no aid of the state to force my opinions upon others. I am, with best wishes, yours for truth, justice, humanity, and liberty, PROFESSOR J. H. COOK.

DUNNVILLE, ONT., Oct. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: A lecture on "Christianity—Its Claims Examined," was delivered in the Opera Hall of this town Oct. 15th. The speaker, Mr. Watts, a true type of the English gentleman, of handsome physique and dignified bearing, inspired the audience at once with confidence in his ability to handle the subject selected for him; and in this they were not disappointed, judging from the numerous manifestations of applause throughout, and the snatches of comments that reached your correspondent's ears while the crowd were dispersing, such as, "A scholar, unmistakably;" "A perfect gentleman;" "A keen logician;" "A master mind, sound, original, decidedly convincing, simply unanswerable," etc. One elderly gentleman, of undoubted integrity, with high attainments, classical and otherwise, a professor of Christianity also, very candidly expressed himself as intensely interested and thoroughly awakened by the, to him, new views of the Bible and its reputed authors, together with the many hard hits made by the able speaker on the popular theological delusions of the day. This is new soil wherein to plant Secularism, and the faithful laborer may find it difficult to break up, and will certainly require time and patience to uproot the old seeds of error and cultivate to a condition congenial to the growth of the new; but if we are fortunate enough to secure the services of Mr. Watts (which we hope to do in the near future), we bespeak a new era for Dunnville, from which we may date the dawning of a brighter intellectual light and an honest effort at least to break the fetters of superstitious thraldom in which many of us hav so long been held.

The lecturer very kindly and reasonably invited discussion at the close, but only one individual availed himself of the privilege. This person, who had been busily taking notes throughout the evening, sprang upon the stage in true tragic style, and, until he opened his mouth, impressed the audience with the opinion that he was about to annihilate his predecessor by his overwhelming antagonistic arguments, but to the indignation and disgust of all they consisted of gross misrepresentations of the speaker's assertions, notwithstanding the notes; of personal criticism, without a particle of bearing upon the subject in question, and abuse which we would hardly look for from a prize-fighter, say nothing of one professing, as he does, to be "shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace," to carry in his hand the "sword of the spirit;" a follower of the lowly Nazarene; in fact, one who has "crucified the lusts of the flesh," drowned the old man with his deeds in the waters of Christian baptism, and is now acting the part of pastor to a little flock of sheep. The lecturer, in responding to this specimen of saintly warfare, by his refined but pungent wit soon made his hearers feel that this nominal Christian teacher had better hav sat at the feet of the Infidel as learner (of the ordinary rules of politeness, if nothing more) than to assume the role of critic. But thus the world wags, and we hav had one more proof that "fools rush in where angels fear to tread." I understand that a lady will be prepared to meet him on the occasion of his next lecture. SARA E. DERBY-POST.

BOZEMAN, MON. TER.

MR. EDITOR: The "champion blasphemer of America" delivered his first lecture in this city last night to a crowded house at $1.50 per head, and then could not accommodate the demand. Such an enthusiastic reception as he received never greeted any man here before. Beecher was here, but his reception was nothing compared to that of the great Infidel. This morning everybody speaks his praise. There is no question of doubt that he is the finest orator in America. He held that vast audience spellbound for two and a half hours. One minute you could hav heard a pin drop; the next you couldn't hear it thunder. One moment you were ready to shed tears; the next you were bursting with laughter. His subject was "Orthodoxy." He spoke entirely without notes, and only read the creed of the Congregational church as his text. On the stage were W. Alderson, the editor of our foremost paper; two officers with their ladies from Fort Ellis, Nelson Story and lady, the millionaire of Bozeman, and a prominent Liberal, and a score of other distinguished citizens. Were it possible, I would report that lecture, but I dare not attempt that. Could I hav been able to write shorthand I was so enthusiastic that I could not hav written. But there were a few things so good I must giv them. He told us how the preachers were called. He said the parents had one poor weakly son, who had not constitution enough to be wicked, nor sense enough to commit a sin. His parents sent him to Andover, where the first thing he did was to swear not to think; and when he went from there, to teach the people not to think. He said as soon as people began to think, they began to doubt, and doubts led them into ranks of heresy; that the only man who had the dead sure thing of being saved was the lunatic. The bigger the fool the better the chance he had; that nearly all the great men who had benefited mankind had gone to hell; that Voltaire, Shakspere, Humboldt, Robert Burns, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, Abraham Lincoln, and thousands of patriot soldiers of the war of the Revolution that gave us liberty, of 1812 that gave us a free sea, these lads were in hell, without a drop of water since; those gallant boys of the Rebellion, who preserved our nation a place on the map of the world, and loosened the shackles of slavery that the Christian Bible upheld, these were all in hell, to the torture of which the suffering at Andersonville was paradise; that Thomas Paine, the greatest patriot of all, was down there these hundred years; that he thought if he could get the attention of God long enough to point to the American flag, he would certainly open the door and turn him out.

Well, in order to appreciate this, the greatest orator of modern times, he must be heard. I hav read nearly all his written lectures, but while they are excellent, his orations are far better.

The Liberal cause is flourishing. Dr. York has organized a Liberal Union here, and delivered a series of lectures. That is the way to keep the ball rolling. Let us move on the works of ignorance and superstition all along the line, and victory will crown our endeavors. DR. W. J. STOVER.

GARFIELD, COL., Oct. 6, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $4, for which send me one copy of Darwin's "Journal of Researches," and $1.50 apply to my TRUTH SEEKER, and fifty cents for a three months' trial subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER to the Madonna Library Society. I make this donation to said library myself, and I think when this trial subscription runs out they will renew it themselvs. Several of the committee connected with the library are Freethinkers. Some of their books are, I understand, ordered from the TRUTH SEEKER company. I hav made the library a present of "Russian Nihilism and Exile Life in Siberia," and a copy of "Orthodoxy," by R. G. Ingersoll. Any person having any book or books they wish to make the library a present of, can do so by addressing them to the Madonna Library Society, Monarch, Col. This library is situated near timber-line, and it may be that the gods will come down from their abode and spend a few hours with the miners and hav a jolly chat.

A few days ago I came in conversation with a colored would-be clergyman, who thought he was intimately acquainted with the gods, and as our conversation ran along I said to him that there was no end to space, and he replied by saying that there was; and then I asked him what was beyond space. He said that a power was beyond space, and that power was God; and then I stuck him by saying that Moses must hav had a good sight when he saw God's back. And I also told him that we should be afraid of the clergy; that they were a source of danger to the people; and that even the yellow-legged chickens had them spotted, for when they saw a preacher they would skip for a place where they thought they would be safe. And when I thought he was getting on his ear I would commence telling a story on the Irish, and then he would tell one, and then we would take a good laugh, and then he would be in good humor; and then I would jump onto his theology all spraddled out; and at last I made him a present of "Orthodoxy," by R. G. Ingersoll.

Respectfully yours, HENRY BEICHLING.

ROCKFORD, ILL., Oct. 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find petition, which we started some time ago, and hav kept it, thinking we could get a few more names. There are plenty would sign it, from the way they think and talk, but just evade doing it.

There being a good deal of talk about Spiritualism, Occultism, man's soul, etc., it appears to me the question is, Has man soul? Let us say yes, as that is the way the majority would answer. Then, what is it? Most people would agree that it is that part of man that enables him to think. Now, what enables a man to think? The most reasonable answer is, memory, imagination, and judgment. What are they? They are the mental faculties growing out of

The Instincts.	Consciousness. Desire to liv. Attachment of the sexes. Fondness of young.	The Appetites.	Suffocation. Hunger. Thirst. Fatigue.
The Senses.	Feeling. Tasting. Seeing. Hearing. Smelling.	The Passions.	Joy in good. Grief in evil. Love to good. Hatred to evil. Hope of good. Fear of evil.

It is therefore the same as the mind. The mind is dependent upon the brain; the brain is dependent upon the body. They both grow together and die at the same time. Life is energy, directed by sensibility, or a machinery directed by sensibility. A dead body has no sensibility, and all is a result of matter. Thinking no subject too sacred for investigation, I find in one of Gladstone's speeches that he said deity exists, but has no practical relations with man. Can any one tell the use of such a deity, and is not that a genuin denial of revelation? I think the truth of the subject is shown in the scientific declaration that neither matter nor force can be increased or diminished; that force does not exist apart from matter; that matter exists only in connection with force, consequently a force apart from matter and superior to nature is a demonstrated impossibility. THOMAS BEALE.

BURR OAK, MICH., Oct. 11, 284.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 4th, E. N. Kingsley givs us what he calls "Orthodoxy Improved." I was disappointed. The improvement was so exceedingly slight that I need a microscope to see it. He says, "Who knows that nature cannot change mankind to unfleshed intellectual spirit beings?" etc. That is not the question for us. Our lives are too brief to spend any part of them speculating upon what nature cannot do. It is what nature does do that concerns us. He speaks of nature changing creeping worms to butterflies, and intimates that those spirit beings may range from planet to planet, from system to system, from world to world, as beautiful, happy butterflies go from flower to flower, and asks if mankind may not thus be "forever progressing while eternity unrolls its never-ending line." Between the process of change from a worm to a butterfly, and the alleged freeing of spirit, there is no analogy whatever. The former is simply one of the forms of evolution. It seems strange to us, because it is not common. But few species of the animal kingdom undergo that kind of transformation. The butterfly is subject to the influences of natural forces, the power of gravitation, the motion of the air, etc., the same as the worm. But man's spirit is not regarded as a changed form of his body, but is a perfect, conscious being that exists just the same before the death of the body as after. It simply leaves the body, without change of form, and instantly becomes independent of matter and all the known forces of nature. And we are asked to believe that this flitting from planet to planet indicates progression. Progression in what? Surely it does not indicate moral and intellectual progression. We hav many mortals here on this planet who flit from place to place like butterflies from flower to flower, bent only on their own enjoyment. But these are not pointed to as illustrations of the theory of progression. On the contrary, most of them are brainless idlers who hav not raised a hand to benefit their race, physically, morally, or intellectually. If the theory of future progression rests upon nothing stronger than the supposed power of locomotion, it must fall, and "fall like Lucifer, never to hope again."

Spiritualists tells us that Shakspere, more than two and a half centuries after his death, has gone to writing poetry through a young American girl. Shade of Calliope! Where is the progression? Why doesn't he write something superior to anything he ever wrote while living, instead of something that looks suspiciously like a skilful commingling of the words he wrote while here, with a few others to fill up gaps and make it appear fresh? When a greater dramatic poet than Shakspere appears here in the flesh, and writes with his own hand, we shall hav something in that line superior to anything that has ever been written, and not till then, in my opinion. Butterflies are beautiful to most people, but how does my friend know that they are happy? The butterfly goes about in a zigzag, erratic course, because his instinct prompts him to move in that way; but as he has never given his testimony; never told "what the Lord has done for him," how do we know that he is happier than the worm? Has one which has "passed over" communicated with a table-tipping medium? I think our friend will admit that it is mere conjecture. After speaking of the long journeys which the spirits are supposed to make, comes the question: "Is not this a more pleasing prospect than endless misery?" Orthodoxy doesn't offer endless misery. It double-discounts Spiritualism in its offer of gems, and sparkling waters, and shining plains, and golden streets, and "rings, and things, and fine array." But you can't hav these things by being good. If a man givs you a rap on the side of the head, you must turn round and blandly request him to preserve the symmetry of your cranium by giving you another whack of equal force on the other side. If you see him walking off with your broadcloth coat, call him back and tell him he has forgotten something. Tell him his admirable dexterity has entitled him to a cloak to wear in rough weather. If you havn't one, borrow one from your wife for him. If she happens to be minus, giv him a pair of old pants and express regrets that he has necessarily been scurvily treated. In short, you must secure the above-mentioned nice things through the merits of Christ.

The best minds of the world are not in search of a "pleasing prospect." They are seeking for truth. They are striving to know more of this universe as a whole, the complex combination of its constituents and the laws that govern phenomena. I am sorry to say that that pleasing prospect is one of the two chief pillars that support all the abominable superstitions of the world. It is one of the sources from which rivers of blood hav flowed over this earth. It helped to fasten a chain on the intellect untold ages before Christ. It has been a curse to the earth since the first gleam of the idea of immortality entered the dwarfish brain of savage man. The fear of punishment, and the hope of reward—between these two pillars lies the narrow road to the orthodox heaven. Of late, I never put pen to paper, but I feel impelled to combat that pernicious doctrin that man is entitled to a home of eternal happiness. It was born of selfishness, and has lived too long already. It is a vain delusion. The hallucination of a world where all wrongs shall be righted, all sorrow recompensed or forgotten, is a pleasing one, but it warps the judgment and clogs the wheels of energy. There is not the slightest warrant for any such belief. I shall do what I can to destroy it. Humanity is robbed by the myths of the clouds. The doctrin of facts is the need of the world. Too long it has been ignored. When Spiritualism has become a demonstrated scientific fact, the discussion of its truth or falsity will cease. The only question will then be, How to make the newly-acquired knowledge of greatest benefit to man. Until then, it must continue to exist as it now exists, a series of emotional imaginings superposed on the manifestations of occult forces, acting under certain conditions. Unless friend Kingsley has a patent on his improvement, I fear it will be unprofitable.

THE KEY TO UNIVERSOLOGY.

MR. EDITOR: A number of persons hav asked me about the science of Universology, as presented by S. P. Andrews at the Liberal Club in New York. I am not sufficiently posted to answer, except that it givs its discoverer a great power to analyze and to present the relativ value of every subject which he discusses, and that the key to Universology consists in the right understanding of the following three words: unism, dualism, and triunism. By way of illustration, the globe upon which we liv as a whole is a unism, but when only the north and south poles are considered, it is a dualism; then, when the equator in connection with the poles is considered, it is triunism. This givs an all-sided view which is applicable to every conceivable thing from the center to the circumference of the entire universe.

I write this with the hope that this great science may show the real truth in our present political conflicts. Thus the object, as a whole, is for a good president of the United States. That is a unism. Cleveland, with his tariffs, and Blaine, with his free trade, make the dual; and Butler, with his Anti-monopoly, composes the triunism. Now, in proportion as each party views the other from its own standpoint, they mislead the people, and yet may be perfectly honest and patriotic. Hence the science of Universology shows how to take an impartial view of all sides of every subject which we discuss. And hence the common remark that "Truth lies between the two extremes." If we would know the relativ worth of two sides, we must look from the center with an impartial eye at each. This will aid us to see that Anti-monopoly accords best with the declaration that all men are endowed by their maker with the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and that tariffs obstruct commerce, imperil peace, and prevent an equal plenty for all the nations of the earth. Therefore tariffs cannot be otherwise than unjust, and adverse to the best interests of every nation that adopts them. They are directly against the noble words of Thomas Paine, the author-hero: "The world is my country; all men are my brothers; to do good is my religion." From this view, Butler, with his Anti-monopoly, is the man that should hav the vote of every lover of his country and of his kind.

Americans who hav thus far monopolized the land of the Indians, and the rights of the women, can now free themselvs from the guilt and the shame of these wrongs. For Butler will sustain the equal rights of all humanity, and abolish all tariffs when international arrangements can be made for that end. JOHN BEESON.

CANNIBALISM.

ORWELL, VT., Oct. 12, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In your paper of Oct. 11th, Mr. John R. Kelso, on "Cannibalism," says: "I refer to that form which is practiced almost weekly by the well-dressed and well-fed crowds that throng those gorgeous bazars of fashion, superstition, and bigotry, called churches, cathedrals, etc." And he adds: "These crowds are wont, in a public and ostentatious manner, to eat the flesh and to drink the blood of an executed person called Jesus." The doctrin of the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist had its origin in the ignorance and superstition of the early fathers of the church. St. Justin suffered martyrdom at Rome about the year 166. He says that we hav been taught that the food which has been blessed by the prayer of the words that he spoke, and by which our blood and flesh, in the change, are nourished, is the flesh and blood of that Jesus incarnate (Apol. i, ad inper. Anton). St. Irenæus, expostulating with the heretics of his day, says: "How can they prove that the bread, over which the words of thanksgiving hav been pronounced, is the body of their Lord, and the cup, his blood," while they do not admit that he is the son, that is, the word of the creator of the world? (Advers. Haer., lib. iv.) St. Justin, in Dialog. cum. Tryphon, says: "Christ instituted a sacrifice in bread and wine, which Christians offer up in every place." St. Irenæus, in the second century, writes, "Christ, in consecrating bread and wine, has instituted the sacrifice of the New Law, which the church received from the apostles, according to the prophecy of Malachi" (L. iv, 82).

There is abundant evidence that the early fathers were ignorant of the simplest facts and laws of nature. Barnabas believed that the hyena changed its sex every year, being alternately male and female (Epistle of Barnabas, ix, 8). Clement of Rome taught, as true, the fable of the phenix. Tertullian and Origen believed the same absurdity. Justin Martyr believed that demons were a hybrid between angels and men. Origen taught that the sun and moon are living beings endowed with reason and free will. And Origen says of the Eucharist, "Manna was formerly given as a figure, but now the flesh and blood of the son of God is specifically given and is real food" (Hom. vii, in Levit.). This doctrin has been taught and believed throughout the Catholic church ever since the commencement of Christianity, and it is the blind faith of 200,000,000 of Christians in this our day. When men learn to study the Bible and Christianity by the best help of modern criticism, the monstrous doctrins of a Bible, verbally and infallibly inspired by God, and sacramental cannibalism, will be things of the past. C. C.

NEW YORK, Oct. 20, 1884.

TO THE REVEREND JAMES KAY APPLEBEE, Sir: In the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I notice your note to the editor. Presuming the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER can fight his own battles with the clergy, and even giv them odds, I only write for information. You say, "Editors, like most other old women, are fond of having the last word, and their position enables them to get it." It really does not become a priest, who, for so many dollars and cents, gets up in the pulpit and tells credulous people what he knows about another world and what man will do after he is dead, when he knows nothing himself, neither can know, to thus place himself in the role of a fortune-teller; and in the pulpit, not only having the last word, but the first word and all the words, giving his hearers no choice for their money. But why old women? Must all women die young to meet with your approbation? What time do women usually get to talk until they get to be old women? In fact, they become old women generally before they find out what humbugs the priests are. No wonder they giv vent, and don't want to stop. Was the mother who nursed you an old woman, and if so, what was her last word? Is she who nightly presses the couch by your side to become an old woman, if not already; and does she usually get the last word? Who cooks your daily food; who makes your priestly couch but women? Really left to your own resources, would you not be the most contemptible of creatures? Indeed, you must be now to undertake to explain the Bible for pay, "when it is so plain a fool needn't err."

Suppose Christ had said to the multitude, "Behold my sister and my brother; my father and the 'old woman;'" could you, with closed eyes, in canting tones, drawl it out in the pulpit with any effect on the imagination, which is the sum total of your capital? GEO. M. DAVENPORT.

SEWARD, NEB., Oct. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Having put in my hands a copy of your journal of Oct. 4th, I was very much interested and pleased with its contents generally, with one exception, and will it be deemed presumptuous as a non-subscriber should I offer a criticism? For about twenty years I hav been called an Infidel and Liberalist, and for the latter name I hav great respect, and it is my great respect for true Liberalism which suggests my remarks. I would refer my remarks to a communication from Pomona, California, in which the writer has been greatly aggrieved because of being ousted from a jury on account of his Infidel views, and fires his anathemas upon the author of his trouble in such language as to place himself on the same level with his opponent. The best interests of true Liberalism are always degraded in the eyes of the world by such language as used by said writer; the spirit of hate, blackguardism, bigotry, and all that has no place in our ranks. We can convince no one by spitting in their faces, and I feel anxious to see less of that spirit among people who cry so loud for free thought and common decency in the discussion of important questions. It would be reasonable to infer from the spirit of the Pomona letter that the writer had been so ungentlemanly in his manner and opinions toward his opponent as to rouse the same spirit in him, and the consequent expulsion.

The truth seeker, wherever he may be, is supposed to be climbing up out of the mud, gasping for the pure air and sunlight of harmony, exhibiting no spirit of hate to his less fortunate brother who remains behind.

I hav recently settled in this little town on the prairies, and find a very large Liberal element here. Measures are being taken to organize and secure a series of lectures on the most vital questions of the day. L. J. BUMSTEAD.

POWDER RIVER, WY. TERR., Oct. 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Once more I will write you a few lines. My TRUTH SEEKER comes to me regularly, and helps to pass away many a lonely hour, for here on a cow-ranch we hav not the means of amusement that are available to the most of our Liberal friends in the more favored communities. We are not bothered here with the hireling politician or the canting sky-pilot. I myself hav not had the opportunity of hearing myself damned from the pulpit for over ten years, but still I hardly think I am much hurt by it. But what strikes me as being the most inconsistent of all things is the manner that so-called Liberals are quarreling over political matters. What Liberality is there in Wallace Moore's letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER? He wants all to believe as he does, and all to see as he does. He wants to mount on some high pinnacle, and wave the bloody shirt in the face of all who do not believe as he does. Oh, what Liberality! I myself do not profess to know much, and scarcely that, but still it looks to me as though we Liberals must practice what we preach or else step down and out, and forever be silent. There is no Liberality in calling your neighbor a murderer because he does not believe as you do, or in saying he is a traitor to his country because his political views are not the same as yours. Allow me to say in conclusion to Mr. Moore and all others of his mind, if you cannot be more Liberal, instead of calling yourself a Spiritualistic Infidel, it would be more appropriate to call yourself an ecclesiastical bigot, and say, "Come one and all and believe as I do or to hell with you." A COWBOY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Mother's Room.

I'm awfully sorry for poor Jack Roe;
He's the boy that lived with his aunt, you know.
And he says his house is filled with gloom
Because it has got no "mother's room."
I tell you what, it is fine enough
To talk of "boudoirs," and such fancy stuff,
But the room of rooms that seems best to me,
The room where I'd always rather be,
Is mother's room, where a fellow can rest,
And talk of the things his heart loves best.

What if I do get dirt about,
And sometimes startle my aunt with a shout;
It is mother's room, and if she don't mind,
To the hints of others I'm always blind.
Maybe I lose my things—what then?
In mother's room I find them again.
And I've never denied that I litter the floor
With marbles and tops and many things more,
But I tell you, for boys with a tired head,
It is jolly to rest it on mother's bed.

Now poor Jack Roe, when he visits me,
I take him to mother's room, you see.
Because it's the nicest place to go
When a fellow's spirits are getting low.
And mother she's always kind and sweet,
And there's always a smile poor Jack to greet,
And somehow the sunbeams seem to glow
More brightly in mother's room, I know,
Than anywhere else, and you'll never find gloom
Or any old shadow in mother's room.

Jack—A Mendicant.—Concluded.

This winter of 1881 tried Jack and Caleb sorely. In the summer things had been a little better with them; people had a little more money to spend, and a few more halfpence would find their way into Caleb's hat; and Jack also would sometimes get a pat on the head and a biscuit or two thrown to him; but in the winter things began to go very hardly with them. Not that the people of the house were ever unkind to them. Poor souls! they were kind enough, as far as they had wherewithal to be kind; and one, who remembered the old man's wife, would come in and clean up his room for him; and another, who remembered the blue-eyed Matties, would patch up his old clothes for him; and all would giv a kind word or a pat to the faithful Jack, now the old man's sole companion and protector. More than this they couldn't do. You see, when people hav hard work to keep their own and their children's bodies and souls together, they can't be expected to go about distributing loaves of bread, or hav many remnants of meals to put down in their gutters to feed stray dogs and cats.

When the long frost set in in January, many and many a night did Jack and Caleb go dinnerless and supperless to bed. "Times are a little rough just now, but we'll see them out together, eh, old friend?" Caleb would say when Jack came to lick his hand by way of good-night, and to testify his opinion that, whatever happened, his master was in no sense to blame. Then they would turn in together, Caleb on his straw (the mattress had gone the way of his bedstead) with his head on an old box for a pillow, and the faithful Jack huddled up on his feet.

Would the frost never come to an end? It was all very well for ladies wrapped in their warm sealskins and velvets to say what a healthy winter it was, and for young people with rosy cheek, as they looked out their skates and pulled on their thick gauntlets, to descant on the glories of a "fine frost;" Caleb and Jack taking their stand against the wall—sunshiny, alas! no longer—would hav told a different story. Ah, surely never did east wind sweep down so ruthlessly before, never before did snowstorm last so long, never before were streets so forlorn and empty of passers-by. Caleb and Jack went home one terrible day at least one hour earlier than usual—it was useless waiting there any longer for alms—Caleb with one halfpenny in his hat, and that the gift of a poor frozen-out crossing-sweeper who rightly judged the old man to be worse off than himself.

Part of a loaf was all Caleb's food that day. "Eh, old doggie, thou shalt hav thy bite of it," he said, feeding Jack with crumbs in the hollow of his hand, "for it's little enough thou'lt find for thyself in the gutters." Little enough, indeed, anywhere, save snow and ice; and Jack may hunt high and Jack may hunt low, and thrust his patient old nose into all sorts of odd corners that seem to hav a faint scent of red herring or haddock, but there's little enough of supper he'll get to-night.

What was it made him so late an this particular windy, frosty, snowy afternoon? Had he lost himself in a snow-drift? thought Caleb, setting open wide his door and listening in vain for the patter and scramble of the four little feet up the carpetless stairs. Six—seven—eight o'clock came and went, and still no sign of Jack; and Caleb crept to bed at last, shivering and forlorn, and with a sense of utter desolation and loneliness at his heart which he had never known before.

Frost, snow, sleet, and east wind, went on through the night and began again with the dawn. "Nay, but you're not going out, friend?" said a kindly old body, meeting Caleb on the stairs as the old man wearily and slowly was feeling his way down. "There'll not be a soul in the streets with a penny to spare; you'll not get your bread that way to-day."

"It's my Jack I'm going to look for to-day," said the old man, "not my bread, it may be he lost his way in the snow last night and he's waiting for me now in the old place by the wall. Giv me a hand, neighbor, and help me along a bit, will ye?" So the woman helped him along to the wall, through the biting wind and snow, but no sign of Jack when they got there.

"We'll try the baker's shop," said Caleb, thinking of their old haunts, and whether it were possible that the baker's wife, who sometimes threw Jack a broken biscuit, had taken him in, out of pity, for the night.

And while they were in the shop asking after the dog, there came in two children who had a strange story to tell, a story which froze Caleb's blood in his veins as he stood and listened. They had seen a dog—a dog for all the world as like Jack as could be, being led along the day before by two men who came out of a public-house, and who talked and laughed loudly as they went along. Said one, "It doesn't pay to be too tender-hearted in these hard times; human flesh and blood reckons before dog's flesh and blood any day in the week." Said the other, "And the doctor will giv us a good 'arf-crown for him safe enough, and no questions to ask into the bargain."

Caleb trembled from head to foot. "Take me to his house," he said, in a voice that startled the children, for it vibrated and twanged like any old harpsichord with all the music gone out of it.

At the doctor's door the two children left him standing on the door-step, they themselvs running away and peeping at him round the corner of the street. A man-servant answered Caleb's ring. "My dog!" said the old blind man, in the same harsh, trembling voice, "What hav you done with him? He's white-haired like me, and thin like me; you can count every rib in his body."

Ugh! how cold it was! The east wind and sleet blew in the servant's face, and how could he be expected to stand there talking with an old blind man on the door-step? He half shut the door. "Your dog, old man?" he said; "we know nothing about dogs here." He would hav shut the door in Caleb's face, but the old man was too quick for him, and had put his stick across the threshold. "My dog!" he repeated, louder and louder; "white-haired, thin like me; you could count every rib he had."

A gentleman was coming down stairs at this moment. He was dressed in the glossiest of black with the whitest of ties. He had a gleaming smile, a thick, square jaw, and eyes that changed as you looked at them. "What is it?" he said, tranquilly, coming toward the door. Does the man want money? I do not like a disturbance on my door-step. A dog, did you say—white-haired—thin! Oh yes, I had him with two colleys yesterday afternoon. The brute! he wasn't worth the money I paid for him; he howled so we had to cut his windpipe before we could do anything with him. I wouldn't hav had him if I could hav got a third colley; they are so much more quiet and patient. Villain! did you say, old man? No, I'm a physiologist—you shouldn't be abusiv; the law protects me, and we must hav subjects. There, that'll do," and he waved his hand gracefully. "Go away now. Wants his body!" This to the man-servant, "Oh, by all means, Joseph, giv him what's left of him—it's in the back yard." And the physiologist, member of at least one-half the scientific societies of Europe, and with a high repute throughout the British Isles for his learning and humanity, went calmly into his study to finish writing down the results of his experiments over night, on the two colleys and poor, white-haired Jack.

Caleb took the mangled body of his old friend reverently into his arms, he passed his hand tenderly over the strained eyeballs, the blood-stained throat, the severed ribs. "My God," he said, standing there in the snow and east wind outside the closed door, "I can thank thee now that I hav no sight wherewith to see the wickedness these thy creatures hav wrought."

The children came from round the corner and led him home again, Caleb still tenderly carrying Jack with his thin, ragged, handkerchief spread over the poor torn body.

Hours after, the neighbors wondered why there was not a sound of movement in the old man's room, and went up, fearing he might be ill, and there was he seated on the floor with Jack's body on his knee, and the words of thanksgiving still on his lips, "God, I thank thee that I hav no eyes to see this devil's work!"

Yes, he livs on, this old man, companionless and alone; the neighbors do what they can for him, and he rarely wants a loaf of bread or a cup of tea now. Every evening, as the clock strikes five, he gets up from his rickety chair, opens his door, and stands listening for the patter and scramble of old Jack's feet upon the carpetless stairs. Silly! do you say?—he has gone silly! It may be so; I do not know. Often we are wisest when most we are called foolish, and foolish when we are thought to be most wise. I only know that old Caleb stands daily, blind and silent, at his open door listening for the footsteps that will never return.

Some day perhaps one may enter in with a message for him—the Angel of Death.—Selected.

Don't Say It.

When you feel a little ruffled or angered with your fellows, hot words, stinging, cross words, are very apt to leap to your lips. You feel, perhaps, that you hav been wronged, and you think you must say something very ill-natured. But don't say it. Keep your tongue still at such a time. You will feel better for it afterwards and always.

Sometimes in talking you hear unpleasant remarks made about some one you know, and, maybe, you think the remarks are correct, and, possibly, you feel like indorsing the sentiments by a word of your own. Don't say it. It is bad enough, probably, as it is, without the addition of that which you may say.

A sneer, a harsh criticism, is spoken in your presence of some person of your acquaintance. A word leaps to your tongue that would add, if spoken, to the person's discredit. Don't say it. Enough has been spoken without your added thought.

Scandal, slander, often arise, not from a mischief-making spirit, but from a habit of joining in the conversation, the having something to say upon the general topic. Unthinking people say many things that hurt like barbed arrows, simply because they hav contracted a silly way of gossiping about neighbors and friends, instead of books, rules, principles.

Some acquire a bad habit of using profane or unchaste language. It sounds badly, and is, in a great degree, demoralizing and degrading. When tempted to utter such language, be careful, think a moment, and—don't say it.

Become acquainted with general laws, with good books, and discuss them instead of living people, who never are wholly bad nor wholly good. When inclined to pass judgment upon anyone, think over it an hour, and in many cases you will believe it better not to say the unkind or reproachful word. Be kind, charitable, thoughtful, and when a naughty, improper, unkind, or impure word rises, don't say it.

METAGRAMIC CHARADE.—A PERAMBULATING FENCE.

My First, though with us, is not near;
My Second names what may appear,
An object still to thought, eye, ear;
My Third a drink, somewhat like beer.

1. To headless First, fine skill to show,
Affixed, the Second's head bestow;
But added both before, behind,
2. A kind of pie or pastry find,
Beheaded and curtailed, my Second,
3. A Hebrew liquid measure, reckoned;
But if it be curtailed alone,
4. Then tenuous is the meaning shown.
To third prefix me Second's last,
5. And lo! an atmospheric blast.

Curtail my First and Second, too,
Two intertwining words we view—
Quite opposit, as may be seen—
6. The first means fat, the other, lean.

My First unto my Second join,
7. And find the fraction of a coin;
That all may know just what is meant,
In value it is half a cent;
But if these parts as two words stand,
They speak a distant star or laud,
8. Or aught that, in the distant space,
Eludes possession or embrace.

Now all my parts in one combine,
And see the ancient Crinoline;
Derived from French, its primal sense
Is "virtue's guard," or "virtue's fence."
A Fence indeed! and fashion's laws
Made it the lady's hight across!
A virtue that needs "fencing in"
Can only yield a crop of sin;
For virtue's only sure defense
Is nativ modesty and sense.
Not iron rails, whale-bone or wood,
Can serve to make one truly good.
I put but little confidence
In such Perambulating Fence.

ANSWERS TO PUZZLES IN CHILDREN'S CORNER OF OCT. 18, 1884.

1. Oak. 2. Ingot. 3. A-mule-t.

Solvers, H. E Juergens, Kate Pillsbury, Annie Strout, Robert Bernheim.

[A correspondent inquires if Mr. Juergens is a wizard. She says he makes puzzles that nobody can find out, and finds the solution of all other puzzles at sight. We do not believe Mr. Juergens has the attributes ascribed to wizards, but is well acquainted in the world of puzzledom, as his little book, "Puzzledom in a Nutshell," indicates, and which he kindly offered as a prize some weeks since to anyone finding the answers to his puzzles in our Puzzle Box at that time, but to which no correct solution has yet been forwarded. Our puzzlers, though few in number, are bright and wide awake, and we are very proud of them, and thank them kindly for their interest in this department of the Corner, which we regard as important in an educational sense. By study, effort, and experience our younger friends may one day equal Mr. Juergens, and Mr. Baker also, in the line of puzzling.—ED.]

Poetry.

Poor Little Old Man!

Poor little old man, poor little old man!
Your spirit is fine as a mortal's can be,
And you hail from the home of our Highlander's clan,
That's why your plaid skirt comes but to your knee,
Poor little old man!

Poor little old man, poor little old man!
Across the lone waters what mavis may sing
As she sang to you there where the lavrock began
Her lay, that had n ver a sad note to ring.
Poor little old man!

Poor little old man, poor little old man!
Your forbears once played on the bagpipe and horn,
Down the wild mountain glen where the swift torrent ran,
And blue were the mists yet blent in the morn.
Poor little old man!

Poor little old man, poor little old man!
Tho' the strife in the Lowlands was bitter and long,
You bear in your bosom away from our ken
A heart that sings low as your own "mither's" song.
Poor little old man!

Poor little old man, poor little old man!
Whose twa een are blue as the bleaberry braes,
Where the hawthorn was white in the deep, birken glen,
And the brown heather hung out her bells on the ways.
Poor little old man!

Poor little old man, poor little old man!
No song is as sweet as our own minstrel's strain,
Nor Campbell or Scott in this cold, foreign lan',
Nor Burns has been born whose heart was pour "ain."
Poor little old man!

Poor little old man, poor little old man!
There rest your head so on my shoulder to-day,
For my race came down from a Highlander's clan,
And my plaide be yours forever and aye.
Poor little old man!

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINOH.

Death of Matthew Algie.

Matthew Algie, of Alton, Ont., died on Thursday, Oct. 2d, at his late residence in Alton, after a painful illness of five or six weeks. He was a young man, not yet thirty, who made his home, his business, and his principles the ruling features of his life. About two years ago he married, and now leaves a wife and child to mourn his loss. His affectionate disposition bound him to parents, brothers, and sisters in a much closer union than is often experienced in large families, and drew to him a large number of friends. His death is the first break in a family circle whose links are bound together by strong affections and sympathies. Both his parents are Freethinkers and Secularists, whose lives hav been marked by fidelity to their convictions in teaching their principles to a large family of children, in spite of their unpopular character, and the social ostracism they brought upon themselvs by so doing. Hence the children hav no remnant of a superstitious fear of the supernatural and unknown, either in their character or belief. During the illness of the deceased many of his Christian neighbors had strong faith that in his last moments he would ask for a Christian minister to administer the consolations of Christianity; that the principles that had been his comfort and support through life would break as a reed in the hour of death; but in this they were disappointed. He particularly requested his brother William, with his latest breath, to say a few words over his grave, and he concluded his request in these words, the last that passed his lips: "You know what I want you to say, Will—I am going to nature." The deceased was buried on the Saturday following his death. A large number of neighbors and friends from abroad, including Chas. Watts and others from Toronto, assembled to pay the last respects to his dead body. The Foresters, of which society the deceased was a member, also took part in the funeral ceremony. Shortly before one o'clock the relativs and friends gathered at his late residence to take a parting look at his features. The coffin-lid was then closed down, and the pall-bearers—six friends from Toronto, George town, and Riverdale—bore the last remains to the hearse. The Foresters led the funeral march to the cemetery, followed by the hearse, then came the long procession of mourning relativs and friends. At the cemetery the coffin was lowered silently and softly into the grave. William Algie, in compliance with the last wish of his brother, then spoke a few words that touched the hearts and feelings of all present. The speaker felt that he was unequal to the task, as his delivery was interrupted by evident manifestations of grief that could not be controled. In reporting the proceedings for publication, he cautioned the writer to explain that "the address is largely extracts from the writings of that intellectual sun of America, R. G. Ingersoll." He spoke as follows:

ADDRESS OF WILLIAM ALGIE AT HIS BROTHER'S GRAVE.

"Kind Friends: Over the open grave of my dead brother, on behalf of the wife, father, mother, brothers, and sisters, I thank you for assembling here to-day to pay the last respects to one who was a dutiful son, an affectionate brother, a loving husband, a fond father, a good citizen, and an honest man. These words, when truthfully spoken, smooth the pillows of the death-bed, and build a monument of glory over the humblest grave. In the very May of life another heart has ceased to beat; but he lived, he loved, he was loved. Wife, child, and friends pressed their kisses on his lips; this is enough; the longest life contains no more; this fills the cup of joy. From the wonderful tree of life the buds and blossoms fall with the ripened friut, and in the common bed of earth the patriarchs and babes sleep side by side, and we do not know which is the more fortunate, the child dying in its mother's arms before its lips hav learned to form a word, or he who travels all the length of life's uneven road, painfully taking the last slow steps with staff and crutch. For six long weeks he struggled bravely and cheerfully for existence, surrounded day and night by the loving hands and watchful eyes of those who were near and dear to him. Finally, when he felt and knew that death claimed him, he put his house in order, bade his weeping friends good-bye, and with a smile upon his lips, as calmly as a sleeping babe he passed away into that dreamless sleep that kisses down his eyelids still. His last request was that I should speak a few words over his grave, and in obedience to that wish I speak to you to-day with a bursting heart. Life is a short, narrow, and winding road, along which we travel but a few short steps—just from the cradle with the lullaby of love, to this quiet and narrow wayside inn, where all at last must sleep, and where the only salutation is, 'Good-night.' He is the first broken link in a family who hav from boyhood to manhood fought in the battle of life arm in arm and shoulder to shoulder, united in bonds of fraternal sympathy and love. The stronger the affection that exists between the members of a family the more keenly is a separation felt. Upon the tenderest heart the deepest shadows fall.

"'To liv, to know, to love, and then to part,
Makes up life's tale to many a bleeding heart.'

However, we cannot say that death is an evil, because it may be the mother of love. If those we press and strain against our hearts could never die, perhaps that love would wither from the earth. And it is better to liv and love where death is king than hav eternal life where love is not.

"Although he was a man in years, he was a child in affection; and as he dearly loved flowers, the emblem of beauty and purity, we to-day offer to his memory a few of nature's perfumed gems. [Here flowers were cast into the grave.] His brother Foresters, among whom he lived and labored, take a mournful pleasure in laying on his coffin the sprigs of evergreen in the name of liberty, benevolence, and concord.

"We need no inky cloak or mourning suits to convince ourselvs that we mourn in sadness for him who sleeps here. We part with him in sorrow, but not in fear, for we feel and know that he who has done his duty honestly and honorably in this life has no need to fear another life if there is one. And if there is none, his good qualities and kind actions will remain bright and green in the memory of those who knew and loved him.

"He was not a Christian. He lived and died a Freethinker, but before dying he wished me to express his heartfelt thanks to the many Christian friends who day after day made anxious and solicitous inquiries for his welfare. He hoped that he would be freely forgiven by any whom he had knowingly or unknowingly wronged, as he freely forgave any who had wronged him.

"'One touch of nature makes the whole world kin;' and in the presence of death how dogmas wither and decay; how loving words and deeds burst into blossom. All antipathies and animosities end here. When a soldier can shed a tear of pity over the grave of a dead enemy, it is natural for us to weep over the grave of a dead friend.

"We leave our dead with nature, the mother of us all; and if, in her eternal procession of cause and effect, we should ever meet again, the meeting will be as happy as the parting has been sad. All should be brave enough to meet what all the dead hav met. Life is sweet, and yet to all a time may come when the parched and fevered lips will long for the cool, delicious kiss of death. When tired of the glare of day, we will hear with joy the rustling garments of night.

"He lived a useful, loving life, and exemplified the advice of Buddha—the Light of Asia—who said to the new-born infant: 'Little child, you come into the world weeping, while all around you smile. Liv so that you may go out of the world smiling, while all around you weep.'

"Husband, father, son, brother, friend, farewell!"

Charles Watts, late of England, now of Toronto, followed with a few remarks that evidently made a deep impression on the large number of friends and strangers at the grave. His address was delivered extempore, and was not taken down—a fact which the writer and many of those present hav since regretted.

The Foresters then concluded the ceremony by reading a part of the burial service contained in their ritual. The friends then dispersed, and left the lifeless clay to its everlasting sleep.

The universal testimony is, that the life and character of the deceased was noble and worthy, and will bear good fruit in the minds and hearts of those who knew him.

Gems of Thought.

A CHILD whose parents are always mild, gentle, patient, reasonable, and forbearing will grow up with an amiable disposition, and with a decided tendency to good conduct and a good life, unless its organization is an unfortunate one, and then that influence is far more beneficial than its opposit. It would be well could parents always realize the great responsibility that rests upon them in molding and forming the habits and characters of their children. Children are much what their parents make them. It is the same with the older children of a family with regard to the younger. The power of example is so strong that the little tender minds are bent and inclined by the examples and influences which surround them.—D. M. Bennett.

"ARE we yet Christians?" is the momentous question of the day, which is being asked everywhere in a variety of forms. It is the question asked, and answered in the negativ, in the last remarkable and unsatisfactory volume of Strauss, "On the Old and New Faith." It is a question which is forcing itself upon the minds of all students of the tone and temper of the times, who cannot fail to recognize, with anxious speculation as to the results, that a vast proportion of the higher and stronger intellect of the age in nearly all branches of science and thought, as well as large bodies, if not the mass, of the most energetic section of the working classes, is day by day more and more decidedly and avowedly shaking itself free from every form and variety of established creeds.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

NEITHER is the second fruit of friendship, in opening the understanding, restrained only to such friends as are able to giv a man counsel (they indeed are best), but even without that a man learneth of himself, and bringeth his own thoughts to light, and whetteth his wits as against a stone, which itself cuts not. In a word, a man were better relate himself to a statue or picture than to suffer his thoughts to pass in smother.—Bacon's Essays.

WHAT changes are wrought, not by time, but yet in time! For not mankind only, but all that mankind does or beholds, is in continual growth, regenesis and self-perfecting vitality. Cast forth thy act, thy word, into the ever-living, ever-working universe; it is a seed-grain that cannot die: unnoticed to-day, it will be found flourishing as a banyan grove (perhaps, also, as a hemlock forest) after a thousand years.—Sartor Resartus.

THE majority of Orientals are no more religious than the majority of Europeans. They believe the teachings of the Koran as Neapolitans believe the teaching of their priests, or as Londoners believe the precepts of the Bible, but they do not act on it. All Mussulmans accept the idea that if they perish in battle with the Infidel, they go to heaven, just as all Christians accept the idea that they ought to forgiv their enemies, and love those who despitefully use them; but very few act in their belief in either case.—London Spectator (Sept. 16, 1882).

WHO sups with the devil should hav a long spoon. The devil could not be burnt, fire being his element; but it was quite otherwise with those poor old women who were reported to hav wrought by his aid those very evils, such as maladies, hail-storms, etc., which Luther scrupled not to ascribe to Satan. And while trials for witchcraft form one of the most horrible and shameful records of Christianity, one of its ugliest features is the belief in the devil; and the degree in which this formidable caricature still rules people's minds, or has been ejected thence, is a very fair measure of their civilization.—Strauss's Old and New Faith.

THAT writer does the most who givs his reader the most knowledge and takes from him the least time. That short period of a short existence which is rationally employed is that which alone deserves the name of life, and that portion of our life is most rationally employed which is occupied in enlarging our stock of truth and of wisdom.—Colton's Lacon

How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
To rust unburnished, not to shine in use!
As though to breathe were life. Life piled on life
Were all too little, and of one to me
Little remains; but every hour is saved
From that eternal silence, something more,
A bringer of new things; and vile it were,
For some three suns to store and hoard myself,
And this gray spirit yearning in desire
To follow knowledge like a sinking star,
Beyond the utmost bound of human thought.
—Tennyson's Ulysses.

WHEN Galileo dared to assert that a weight of ten pounds would fall no faster than a weight of one pound, it was so far against the prevailing doctrin that he had to prove it by ascending the leaning tower of Pisa, and, in the presence of all the professors of the university, let fall the weights simultaneously, which fell in the same time, according to his prediction. That was the first step in the emancipation of science. It was then clearly and definitly proved that the authority of Aristotle was no longer to be trusted; and since then thought has step by step gone forward.—W. B Carpenter.

NOT only may one now-a-days affirm the revolution of the earth around the sun without being imprisoned and put to the torture, but one may even deny the divinity of Christ without any risk of being burnt at the stake. There is a limit, however. No man is now burnt alive for seeing in Jesus only a mere man, for refusing to acknowledge God's personality, for not believing in a future life, or for declining to attach himself in present life to any Christian organization of what creed soever; but yet these things are noted down against him, and when he brings his views and the arguments for them before the public, he finds himself in disgrace. He has set himself above the conventional fashions of thought and life, has offended against good taste, and must not be surprised if people in dealing with him leave good taste out of consideration.—Strauss's Old and New Faith.

A MAN must serve his time to every trade,
Save censure—critics all are ready made.
—Byron.

Odds and Ends.

A CONFIDENCE man—the father confessor.

THE man who paints the town red at night generally feels blue in the morning.

IN a political campaign both parties can be described as having "watched and parade."

MINISTERS are sometimes called doctors of divinity, because they can set the commandments when they get broken.

AN ancient maiden subscribed for an agricultural paper because she had heard its "Notes on Husbandry" well spoken of.

WHAT a tale is told in the few words of a recent obituary notice, which announced to the world that "the deceased had accumulated a little money and ten children."

THE Mother Hub is of such hideous mien
That to be hated needs but to be seen,
But when surmounted by a pretty face,
We first endure—then pity—then embrace.

"AH, Mr. Hebbleton, I hear that you hav been called to the ministry." "Well," was the reply, "I can hardly term it a call; it's a sort of a whisper. They only offer me five hundred a year."

A MINISTER'S son once said to his father: "Pa, St. Paul was a Yank-e." "How so, my son?" "Why, in Romans, eighth chapter, and eighteenth verse, he says: 'For I reckon,' and none but Yankees ever reckon."

"How are you coming out in your parish?" asked an Episcopal bishop of one of his rectors. The rector, who was a speculator in cotton before he became converted, lifted up his eyes and said: "I am long on slippers and book marks, but rather short on suspenders."

MRS. PUGMIRE read in a fashion paper that "Bustles are coming to the front." "That's just horrid," said she, "and I won't wear mine that way, not even if Queen Victoria herself does. It's bad enough to wear 'em at all; but how would you and me look, Mrs. Tarbox, at our age, with bustles in front? Let younger women wear 'em that way if they want to, but I vow I won't."

THE following school composition, says the Washington Capital, was submitted at a late examination and graduation by an artless little lady of nine. It was entitled, "True Love Rewarded:" "A very poor young man loved a beautiful young lady whose parents would not let their daughter marry the poor young man, of course not. He was very handsome, and drew a prize out of a lottery which made him very rich, and then they became willing. So they were married, and lived very happy. But they did not hav any children, and this grieved the husband very much, and the fond wife sympathized with her dearly beloved. Soon after this a war came, and the handsome young man went to it and defended his native country for five long, long years. When he came back home, after the war was over, imagin his surprise when his beautiful wife called his attention to three lovely infants she had received during his absence. Thus true love often meets with deserved reward."

OLD Dabs is the proprietor of a boarding house where negro draymen and other homeless colored gentlemen take their meals. Old Dabs is a very religious man, and is more successful as a revivalist than he is as a boarding house keeper. He keeps the house well enough, but he fails to provide variety of food. Old Nicholas, who boards with Dabs, is something of an epicure, and looks with contempt on the bench of the humble. The other day at dinner, old Dabs, as usual, bowed his head, and asked a blessing. Nicholas, who had been thoughtfully handling his knife, looked at Dabs until he had finished the petition for mercy, and said: "Dabs, I'se stood this heah ez long ez I kin. De man whut would ax five blessin's ober de same piece o' tough sheep oughter be whipped an' I'se de representer o' good guberment whut am prepared ter do it." A contest followed, but it was brief. Dabs was vanquished. "Now," said Nicholas, taking his seat at the table, "when yer axes yer blessin' take off dat sheep, 'case it hav been prayed ober er nuff. Pass de hoe-cake, Mr. Jiner."

OLD Widower Billings went the other day to make a declaration of love to Miss Agatha, a venerable but rich maiden, who was anxiously expecting him. She had decided that her time of gentle honeymoon was drawing near, and in that sweet languor so characteristic of a maiden lady's mood of contemplation, she reclined on a sofa and viewed through her half-closed eyes of dreamy sentiment the golden fruits on the tree of a new life. Mr. Billings entered the room. "Good evening, Miss Agatha. I hope I do not disturb thoughts which, with such an abode, must be enjoyable?" "Oh, no, sir," arising. "Hav this chair." "No, I prefer to sit on this old-fashioned cushion," drawing back a large rocking-chair and sitting down on what he took to be a cushion, but which proved to be the family cat and three kittens. Now, a cat takes no note of accidents, and it makes no difference whether a man sits on her through design or mistake; and, without waiting for apology, she begins the fulfilment of an improvised and exceedingly hot contract. Some people think that a cat carries out the most of her contracts with the fore feet, but, in fact, she transacts her heaviest business with her hind feet. This cat seized Mr. Billings with her mouth and began to curry him with her "back paws." Did you ever see the old-time people hackle flax? Well, it makes no difference. The kittens seized the legs of the unfortunate gentleman and climbed around with fiery touch, but the cat continued to do business at the old stand. Miss Agatha seized a broom and tried to sweep off the tormentors, but Mr. Billings danced such a fantastic jig that the only effectiv work she did was to crack him severely on the head with the broom-handle. Modesty demanded an unqualified retirement, and leaping through the doorway, Mr. Billings struck a gallop in the direction of home, while the shreds of his clothing streamed back at the sport of a wind which whistled a sad requiem to a dead hope. This is the reason Mr. Poindexter Billings stood up at church the following Sunday.

THE first woman ever admitted to membership in the Massachusetts State Medical Society is Dr. Emma L. Call.

IT is announced that Col. Ingersoll will be the orator at the unveiling of the Kit Carson statue at Santa Fe, New Mexico.

THE pastor of a Methodist church in Saxony and some of his people hav been fined 160 marks for meeting to sing on Sunday at the hour of service in the state church.

HERBERT SPENCER, in an appendix to the re-edited tractate against Auguste Comte, presents the leading doctrins of the Spencerian system of philosophy in sixteen propositions.

IN Lord Malmesbury's "Recollections" there are several amusing answers of children. This is one of the best: A child being asked what at baptism was the outward and visible sign, replied, "The baby."

THE Roman Catholic Congress of Germany was convened this year in a Bavarian town. The resolutions passed demand the recall of the exiled monastic orders of Germany and the restitution of the secular power of the papal see.

THERE is sound philosophy in this remark from Texas Siftings: "A common aphorism is, 'Nothing is sure in this world.' Now, if nothing is sure in this world, we can't be sure that anything is sure, consequently, we are not sure that nothing is sure."

THE Edinburgh Encyclopedia, conducted by David Brewster, LL.D., says that, "when the denial of a God is openly avowed, we believe the most suitable punishment would be to devote the offender, as a dangerous maniac, to solitary confinement."

THE wife of the jailer at Oconta, Wis., was left on guard, and armed for the day with a pistol, which her son doubted she had the courage to discharge. He made a test by putting on a prisoner's costume and whooping at her. He is slowly recovering.

IF you sleep in a conspicuous place in the church, you not only produce a depressing effect upon the preacher, but you run the risk of making yourself the laughing-stock of that considerable class of people who come to church to amuse themselvs.—Religious Herald.

As the late Professor Hamilton was one day walking near Aberdeen, he met a well-known individual of weak intellect. "Pray," said the professor, "how long can a person liv without brains?" "I dinna ken," replied Jemmy, scratching his head; "how auld are ye yoursel'?"

IN an article on the religious exaltations of the Orient, Dr. Zambaco describes the sect of Refaio who in their religious ceremonies jump, dance, oscillate, and shriek for two hours at a time, or until they fall into convulsions. When the excitement is at its hight their power of feeling physical pain appears to be lost, for they pierce their limbs and bodies with sharp knives, and often swallow broken glass, living scorpions, and cactus leaves armed with thorns.

A TUNNEL, measuring about 5,000 feet long, and constructed at least nine centuries before the Christian era, has just been discovered by the governor of the island of Samos. Herodotus mentions this tunnel, which served for providing the old seaport with drinking water. It is completely preserved, and contains water tubes of about ten inches in diameter, each one provided with a lateral aperture for cleansing purposes. The tunnel is not quite straight.

HE is a hard-hearted man who will neglect the sick. "Oh, dear," sighed a farmer's wife wearily, as she dropped into a chair after a hard day's work. "I feel just as if I were going to be sick. My head throbs, and my back aches dreadfully, and— "By gosh," interrupted the farmer, starting up and seizing his hat, "that reminds me. I forgot to giv the two-year-old colt his condition powders tonight, an' he's been a wheezin' all day," and he hurried to the barn.

A CURIOUS conversion is reported from St Petersburg. The convert is Count Valoieff, and his new cult is mysticism. He was at one time a minister in the imperial cabinet, but he is Liberal in sentiment, and his portfolio was taken away from him. He has some renown as a writer, and has published two or three novels at his own expense. He now chooses to become an apostle of the doctrins of Brahma, and to assume the position of a teacher of the students of the Red Slayer. He has in print a book of prayers and religious reflections, which will be issued within a few weeks. "How touching," Col. Ingersoll once remarked, "when the learned and wise crawl back in cribs and ask to hear the rhymes and fables once again!"

A NEGRO girl in Georgia wanted to go to church a few Sundays ago, but her father, who was not a Christian, would not consent, and for a long time they argued, but the father would not giv in. At last the girl made up her mind that she must go to church or she couldn't go to heaven, and so she went out into the woodshed and procured an ax. This she tried on a stick of wood to see if it was sharp, and then stepping up behind her unchristian-like father, smote him a smite with the weapon that split him wide open. The girl will now be able to attend church regular every Sunday, but it will be at the prison chapel, for she has been sentenced for life.

"THE shadow of the fires of the Inquisition are daily outlined behind the idea of prohibition. All regulation of private morals by statute law and the policeman's club presupposes union of church and state, decay of virtue, the death of liberty, and return of barbarism"—Anti-Monopolist. Well said, Brother Anti-Monopolist, but you take the risk of being called a "lunatic," a "whisky man," and a "b-a-d influoence," when you say it. At least that is our experience. We hav been saying the same in substance for months, and there are Liberals so blind as to condemn us for pointing out the viper that is hidden in the prohibition nosegay. The church Prohibitionists, of course, condemn and execrate those who do not agree with them, but Liberals should be liberal.—Worthington Advance.

THE British mercantile marine is composed of some 21,500 vessels, including 3,650 steamers, with an aggregate measurement of about 9,200,000 tons, while that of France consists of about 2,900 vessels, including 700 steamers, with an aggregate measurement of 1,055,000 tons. The number of steam vessels of war, including transports, despatch boats, etc., which are available for the protection of the respectiv merchant navies are 337 vessels, with 2,058 guns, for that of England, and 317 vessels, with 1,680 guns, for that of France. It will thus be seen that, whereas the French mercantile marine is protected in the ratio of one ship of war to nine merchantmen, no less than sixty merchantmen are allotted to the care of each British war vessel. In order to place the British merchant navy on an equal footing with that of France as regards man-of-war protection, it would be necessary to add 2,053 vessels to the royal navy.

THE Rev. Dr. Rylance, rector of St. Mark's church on Stuyvesant street, this city, preached last Sunday night on "The Church and Workingmen." "The Bible tells us," he said, "that the common people heard Christ gladly. But the workingmen, the common people of to-day, with perhaps the exception of the Roman Catholics, are the reverse of friendly in their attitude toward the church. The workingman prefers to spend his Sunday in roaming through the fields rather than fall asleep under the drowsy hum from the pulpit. Only 20,000 persons out of a population of a million in Berlin are church-goers, and the statistics in all the large cities of Europe and America are alarming in this respect. Many churches are so equipped that workingmen cannot, and are not supposed to, enter them. The principal reason that things are so changed from what they were in the days when Christ was on earth is that we do not know how to win the sympathies of the workingman. Religion nowadays is a cold, formal, juiceless thing, offering few attractions to the weary toiler."

MR. KENNETH CORNISH, who has just pnblished a pamphlet on cholera treatment and cure, is an unbeliever in the germ theory of Dr. Koch. Believing that the symptoms of the disease are the result of a paralysis of the pneumo-gastric nerves—those nerves that influence the functions of the lungs and stomach—Mr. Cornish recommends that the patient should be treated with heroic doses of laudanum in boiling water. He saved his own life and those of his mother and sister in 1854, when violently attacked with cholera, by this daring treatment; and the only difficulty Mr. Cornish anticipates is the very obvious one that the Pharmacy act renders it impossible for people to procure sufficient quantities of laudanum. To meet that difficulty, however, he suggests that in the event of an outbreak of cholera in England the Pharmacy act should be temporarily suspended, so far as the sale of laudanum is concerned, or that the suitability of chlorodyne should be tested.

L'Etoile Belge says that the Society of Jesus includes a number of laymen, known as "Jesuits of the short robe," whose business it is to do the work of the society in civil life. Of this number were four out of seven members of the old Belgian Cabinet. The present Cabinet is as strongly Catholic as the old ministry. The spirit of the Catholic priesthood is shown by the words of some of the leaders in this country. Bishop O'Connor said, "Religious liberty is merely endured until the opposit can be carried into effect." The archbishop of St. Louis is the author of this traitorous sentiment: "If the Catholics ever gain, which they surely will do, though at a distant day, an immense numerical superiority, religious freedom is at an end." Father Hecker took this roseate view of the future of his church: "There is ere long to be a state religion in this country, and that state religion is to be Roman Catholic." While we of the United States are sympathizing with Belgian Liberals, let us not forget our own danger.

CIVILIZATION may strike Kansas City one of these days. There seems, however, to be no immediate danger. Kansas City newspapers hav flowed fervently for a year or more over Kansas City's "lyceum." With much ado it was announced a couple of weeks ago that Kansas City's lyceum had prepared an intellectual treat for the nativs; that "Professor R. A. Proctor, the distinguished astronomer, will try to convince us that there are other worlds than ours." But Professor Proctor will not come. Not that Professor Proctor treasures any malice against Kansas City; not that he thinks the nativ needs no information. He won't go because Kansas City don't want him. Kansas City has "triumphed over schoolboyishness," as one of the local prints puts it, and in Kansas City not enough interest can be awakened to open the lyceum to discuss such effete topics as the moon and the stars. In the mean time Kansas City culture thrills over the promis of a visit from the renowned Mr. Charles Mitchell, a scientist of this lower sphere, a slugger from England.

AUTUMN COLORS.

The autumn's a gorgeous golden cup,
With a warm, empurpled rim;
The sunset lavishly fills it up
With rosy wine to the brim

And while the wind so wearily grieves
Through the grasses parched and dead,
It spills the wine on the trembling leaves,
And turns them yellow and red.

The field is russet and purple,
The wood is scarlet and gold;
A river of flaming color
Makes warm the dreary wold.

And when by the dancing sunbeams
The landscape is all begilt,
It seems that old Dame Nature
Is making a crazy quilt.

When comes the autumn of the year,
And South the redbreast goes,
Old nature in her fingers sere
Carries a burning rose.

A rustling polonaise of gold
She round herself doth fling,
And rouges like a woman old
In honor of the spring.

A NUMBER of clergymen preached last Sunday on the aspects of the political campaign, and devoted their discourses principally to suggesting to their hearers that they should vote in accordance with the dictates of a Christian conscience. Next Sunday we may perhaps hear whether the result is agreeable to that sort of conscience.

AT a meeting of the Bethany Baptist church, in Newark, N. J., last Sunday, Pastor Jackson announced himself ready to wade through blood; Trustee Coleman knocked Brother Nordick off the platform, and Sister Logan whacked Brother Smith over the head with a cane. This came about through a discussion of the question as to who was pastor of the church. The disturbance was quelled by the elimination of the belligerents by the police.

BLAINE received the benefit of the clergy at the Fifth Avenue Hotel last week, being waited upon by a committee of about two hundred Protestant ministers. The chairman, the Rev. Dr. Burchard, assured Mr. Blaine that they were loyal to him, and had no sympathy with the opposit party, which had always been the party of Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion. Mr. Blaine thanked the reverend gentlemen for their sympathy; and challenged the world to point out an act of his own or of the party he represented that could not receive the sanction of the clergy, the church, and the Almighty. Mr. Blaine closed his campaign last Saturday by speaking in the chief cities of Connecticut. Cleveland's time was taken up in reviewing the largest political processions ever seen in New York city and Brooklyn. Butler's canvass was apparently lost sight of as election day approached.

Agnostic Metaphysics.

A REPLY TO HERBERT SPENCER'S CRITICISM OF POSITIVISM.

BY FREDERIC HARRISON.

I.

Ten years ago I warned Mr. Herbert Spencer that his Religion of the Unknowable was certain to lead him into strange company. "To invoke the Unknowable," I said, "is to re-open the whole range of Metaphysics; and the entire apparatus of Theology will follow through the breach." I quoted Mr. G. Lewes's admirable remark ("Problems of Life and Mind," vol. i, Preface.), "that the foundations of a Creed can rest only on the Known and the Knowable." We see the result. Mr. Spencer has developed his Unknowable into an "Infinit and Eternal Energy, by which all things are created and sustained." He has discovered it to be the Ultimate Cause, the All-Being, the Creativ Power, and all the other "alternativ impossibilities of thought" which he once cast in the teeth of the older theologies. Naturally there is joy over one philosopher that repenteth. The Christian World claims this as equivalent to the assertion that God is the mind and spirit of the universe; and the Christian World says these words might hav been used by Butler or Paley (The Christian World, June 5 and July 3, 1884). This is, indeed, very true; but it is strange to find the philosophy of one who makes it a point of conscience not to enter a church described as "the fitting and natural introduction to inspiration."

The admirers of Mr. Spencer's genius—and I count myself amongst the earliest—will not regret that he has been induced to lay aside his vast task of philosophic synthesis, in order more fully to explain his views about Religion. This is, indeed, for the thoughtful, as well as the practical world, the great question of our age; and the discussion that was started by his paper (H. Spencer, in Nineteenth Century, January and July, 1884) and by mine (F. Harrison, in Nineteenth Century, March, 1884) has opened many topics of general interest. Mr. Spencer has been led to giv to some of his views a certainly new development, and he has treated of matters which he had not previously touched. Various critics hav joined the debate. Sir James Stephen (Sir J. Stephen, in Nineteenth Century, June, 1884) has brought into play his Nasmyth hammer of Common Sense, and has asked the bold and truly characteristic question: "Can we not do just as well without any religion at all?" The weekly reviews, I am told, hav been poking at us their somewhat hebdomadal fun. And then Mr. Wilfrid Ward (W. Ward, in National Review, June, 1884), "the rising hope of the stern and unbending" Papists, steps in to remind us of the ancient maxim, extra Ecclesiam nulla salus.

I cannot altogether agree with a friend who tells me that controversy is pure evil. It is not so when it leads to a closer sifting of important doctrins; when it is inspired with friendly feeling, and has no other object than to arrive at the truth. There were no mere "compliments" in my expressions of respect for Mr. Spencer and his work. I habitually speak of him as the only living Englishman who can fairly lay claim to the name of philosopher; nay, he is, I believe, the only man in Europe, now living, who has constructed a real system of philosophy. Very much in that philosophy I willingly adopt; as a philosophical theory I accept his idea of the Unknowable. My rejection of it as the basis of Religion is no new thing. The substance of my essay on the "Ghost of Religion" I hav long ago taught at Newton Hall. The difference between Mr. Spencer and myself as to what religion means is vital and profound. So deep is it that it justifies me in returning to these questions, and still further disturbing his philosophic labor. But our long friendship I trust will survive the inevitable dispute.

It will clear up much at issue between us if it be remembered that to me this question is one primarily of religion; to Mr. Spencer, one primarily of philosophy. He is dealing with transcendental conceptions, intelligible only to certain trained metaphysicians; I hav been dealing with religion as it affects the lives of men and women in the world. Hence, if I admit with him that philosophy points to an unknowable and inconceivable Reality behind phenomena, I insist that, to ordinary men and women, an unknowable and inconceivable Reality is practically an Unreality. The Everlasting Yes which the Evolutionist metaphysician is conscious of, but cannot conceive, is in effect on the public a mere Everlasting No; and a religion which begins and ends with the mystery of the Unknowable is not religion at all, but a mere logician's formula. This is how it comes about that Mr. Spencer complains that I hav misunderstood him or hav not read his books, that I fail to represent him, or even misrepresent him. I cannot admit that I hav either misunderstood him or misrepresented him on any single point. I hav studied his books part by part, and chapter by chapter, and hav examined the authorities on which he relies.

He seems to think that all hesitation to accept his views will disappear if men will only turn to his "First Principles," his "Principles of Sociology," and his "Descriptiv Sociology," where he has "proved" this and "disproved" that, and arrayed the arguments and the evidence for every doctrin in turn. Now, for my part, I hav studied all this to my great pleasure and profit, since the first number of "A Synthetic Philosophy" appeared. Mr. Spencer objects to discipleship, or I would say that I am, in very many things, one of his disciples myself. But, in this matter of religion, I hold still, as I hav held from the first, that Mr. Spencer is mistaken as to the history, the nature, and the function of religion. It is quite true that he and I are at opposit poles in what relates to the work of religion on man and on life. In all he has written, he treats religion as mainly a thing of the mind, and concerned essentially with mystery. I say—and here I am on my own grounnd—that religion is mainly a thing of feeling and of conduct, and is concerned essentially with duty. I agree that religion has also an intellectual base; but here I insist that this intellectual basis must rest on something that can be known and conceived and at least partly understood; and that it cannot be found at all in what is unknowable, inconceivable, and in no way whatever to be understood.

Now, in maintaining this, I hav with me almost the whole of the competent minds which hav dealt with this question. Mr. Spencer puts it rather as if it were merely fanaticism on my part which prevents me from accepting his theory of Religion; as if Sir James Stephen's difficulties would disappear if he could be induced to read the "Principles of Sociology," and the rest. Mr. Spencer must remember that in his Religion of the Unknowable he stands almost alone. He is, in fact, insisting to mankind, in a matter where all men hav some opinion, on one of the most gigantic paradoxes in the history of thought. I know myself of no single thinker in Europe who has come forward to support this religion of an Unknowable Cause, which cannot be presented in terms of consciousness, to which the words emotion, will, intelligence, cannot be applied with any meaning, and yet which stands in the place of a supposed anthropomorphic Creator. Mr. George H. Lewes, who of all modern philosophers was the closest to Mr. Spencer, and of recent English philosophers the most nearly his equal, wrote ten years ago: "Deeply as we may feel the mystery of the universe and the limitations of our faculties, the foundations of a creed can only rest on the Known and the Knowable." With that I believe every school of thought but a few dreamy mystics hav agreed. Every religious teacher, movement, or body, has equally started from that. For myself, I feel that I stand alongside of the religious spirits of every time and of every church in claiming for religion some intelligible object of reverence, and the field of feeling and of conduct, as well as that of awe. Every notice of my criticism of Mr. Spencer which has fallen under my eye adopted my view of the hollowness of the Unknowable as a basis of Religion. So say Agnostics, Materialists, Skeptics, Christians, Catholics, Theists, and Positivists. All with one consent disclaim making a Religion of the Unknowable. Mr. Herbert Spencer may construct an Athanasian Creed of the "Inscrutable Existence"—which is neither God nor being—but he stands as yet Athanasius contra mundum. It is not therefore, through the hardness of my heart and the stiffness of my neck that I cannot follow him here.

Let us now sum up the various positions which Mr. Spencer would impose on us as to Religion. After his two articles and the recent discussion we can hardly mistake him, and they justify my saying that they form a gigantic paradox. Mr. Spencer maintains that:

1. The proper object of Religion is a Something which can never be known, or conceived, or understood; to which we cannot apply the terms emotion, will, intelligence; of which we cannot affirm or deny that it is either person, or being, or mind, or matter, or indeed anything else.

2. All that we can say of it is, that it is an Inscrutable Existence or an Unknowable Cause; we can neither know nor conceive what it is, nor how it came about, nor how it operates. It is, notwithstanding, the Ultimate Cause, the All-Being, the Creativ Power.

3. The essential business of Religion, so understood, is to keep alive the consciousness of a mystery that cannot be fathomed.

4. We are not concerned with the question, "What effect this religion will hav as a moral agent?" or, "Whether it will make good men and women?" Religion has to do with mystery, not with morals.

These are the paradoxes to which my fanaticism refuses to assent.

Now these were the views about Religion which I found in Mr. Spencer's first article, and they certainly are repeated in his second. He says: "The Power which transcends phenomena cannot be brought within the forms of our finite thought." "The Ultimate Power is not representable in terms of human consciousness." "The attributes of personality cannot be conceived by us as attributes of the Unknown Cause of things." "The nature of the Reality transcending appearances cannot be known, yet its existence is necessarily implied." "No conception of this Reality can be framed by us." "This Inscrutable Existence which Science, in the last resort, is compelled to recognize as unreached by its deepest analyses of matter, motion, thought, and feeling." "In ascribing to the Unknowable Cause of things such human attributes as emotion, will, intelligence, we are using words which, when thus applied, hav no corresponding ideas." There can be no kind of doubt about all this. I said Mr. Spencer proposes, as the object of religion, an abstraction which we cannot conceive, or present in thought, or regard as having personality, or as capable of feeling, purpose, or thought—in familiar words, I said it was "a sort of a something, about which we can know nothing."

Mr. Spencer complains that I called this Something a negation, an All-Nothingness, an (x^n), and an Everlasting No. He now says that this Something is the All-Being. The Unknowable is the Ultimate Reality—the sole existence; the entire Cosmos, as we are conscious of it, being a mere show. In familiar words: "Everything is nought, and the Unknowable is the only real Thing." I quite agree that this is Mr. Spencer's position as a metaphysician. It is not at all new to me, for it is worked out in his "First Principles" most distinctly. Ten years ago, when I reviewed Mr. Lewes's "Problems of Life and Mind," I criticised Mr. Spencer's Transfigured Realism as being too absolute (Fortnightly Review, 1874, p. 89). I then stated my own philosophical position to be that, "our scientific conceptions within hav a good working correspondence with an (assumed) reality without—we having no means of knowing whether the absolute correspondence between them be great or small, or whether there be any absolute correspondence at all." To that I adhere; and, whilst I accept the doctrin of an Unknown substratum, I cannot assent to the doctrin that the Unknowable is the Absolute Reality. But I am quite aware that he holds it, nor hav I ever said that he did not. On the contrary, I granted that it might be the first axiom of science or the universal postulate of philosophy. But it is not a religion. (My words were that, "although the Unknowable is logically said to be Something, yet the something of which we neither know nor conceive anything is practically nothing. This is speaking from the point of view of religion.")

I said then, and I say still, speaking with regard to religion, and from the religious point of view, that the Metaphysician's Unknowable is tantamount to a Nothing. The philosopher may choose to say that there is an Ultimate Reality which we cannot conceive, or know, or liken to anything we do know. But these subtleties of speculation are utterly unintelligible to the ordinary public. And to tell them that they are to worship this Unknowable is equivalent to telling them to worship nothing. I quite agree that Mr. Spencer, or any metaphysician, is entitled to assert that the Unknowable is the sole Reality. But religion is not a matter for Metaphysicians, but for men, women, and children. And to them the Unknowable is Nothing. Sir James Stephen calls the distinctions of Mr. Spencer "an unmeaning play of words." I do not say that they are unmeaning to the philosophers working on metaphysics. But to the public, seeking for a religion, the Reality or the Unreality of the Unknowable is certainly an unmeaning play of words.

Even supposing that Evolution ever could bring the people to comprehend the subtlety of the All-Being, of which all things we know are only shows, the Unknowable is still incapable of supplying the very elements of Religion. Mr. Spencer thinks otherwise. He says that although we cannot know or conceive it, or apply to it any of the terms of life, or of consciousness, "it leaves unchanged certain of the sentiments comprehended under the name religion." "Whatever components of the religious sentiment disappear, there must ever survive those which are appropriate to the consciousness of a Mystery!" Certain of the religious sentiments are left unchanged! The consciousness of a Mystery is to survive! Is that all? "We are not concerned," says he, "to know what effect this religious sentiment will hav as a moral agent!" A religion without anything to be known, with nothing to teach, with no moral power, with some rags of religious sentiment surviving, mainly the consciousness of Mystery; this is, indeed, the mockery of Religion.

Forced, as it seems, to clothe the nakedness of the Unknowable with some shreds of sentiment, Mr. Spencer has given it a positiv character, which for every step that it advances toward Religion recedes from sound Philosophy. The Unknowable was at first spoken of as an "unthinkable abstraction," and so undoubtedly it is. But it finally emerges as the Ultimate Reality, the Ultimate Cause, the All-Being, the Absolute Power, the Unknown Cause, the Inscrutable Existence, the Infinit and Eternal Energy, from which all things proceed, the Creativ Power, "the Infinit and Eternal Energy, by which all things are created and sustained." It is "to stand in substantially the same relation toward our general conception of things as does the Creativ Power asserted by Theology." "It stands toward the Universe, and toward ourselvs, in the same relation as an anthropomorphic Creator was supposed to stand, bears a like relation with it, not only to human thought but to human feeling." In other words, the Unknowable is the Creator; subject to this, that we cannot assert or deny that he, she, or it, is Person, or Being, or can feel, think, or act, or do anything else that we can either know or imagin, or is such that we can ascribe to Him, Her, or It anything whatever within the realm of consciousness.

Now the Unknowable, so qualified and explained, offends against all the canons of criticism, so admirably set forth in "First Principles," and especially those of Dean Mansel, therein quoted and adopted. The Unknowable is not unknowable if we know that "it creates and sustains all things." One need not repeat all the metaphysical objections arrayed by Mr. Spencer himself against connecting the ideas of the Absolute, the Infinit, First Cause, and Creator with that of any one Power. How can Absolute Power create? How can the Absolute be a Cause? The Absolute excludes the relativ; and Creation and Cause both imply relation. How can the Infinit be a Cause, or create? For if there be effect distinct from cause, or if there be something uncreated, the Infinit would be thereby limited. What is the meaning of All-Being? Does it include, or not, its own manifestation? If the Cosmos is a mere show of an Unknown Cause, then the Unknown Cause is not Infinit, for it does not include the Cosmos; and not Absolute, for the Universe is its manifestation, and all things proceed from it. That is to say, the Absolute is in relation to the Universe, as Cause and Effect. Again, if the "very notions, beginning and end, cause and purpose, relativ notions belonging to human thought, are probably irrelevant to the Ultimate Reality transcending human thought" (Spencer, Nineteenth Century, p. 12), how can we speak of the Ultimate Cause, or indeed of Infinit and Eternal? The philosophical difficulties of imagining a First Cause, so admirably put by Mr. Spencer years ago, are not greater than those of imagining an Ultimate Cause. The objections he states to the idea of Creation are not removed by talking of a Creativ Power rather than a Creator God. If Mr. Spencer's new Creativ Power "stands toward our general conception of things in substantially the same relation as the Creativ Power of Theology," it is open to all the metaphysical dilemmas so admirably stated in "First Principles." Mr. Spencer cannot hav it both ways. If his Unknowable be the Creativ Power, and Ultimate Cause, it simply renews all the mystification of the old theologies. If his Unknowable be unknowable, then it is idle to talk of Infinit and Eternal Energy, sole Reality, All-Being, and Creativ Power. This is the slip-slop of theologians which Mr. Spencer, as much as any man living, has finally torn to shreds.

In what way does the notion of Ultimate Cause avoid the difficulties in the way of First Cause, and how is Creativ Power an idea more logical than Creator? And if, as Mr. Spencer says ("First Principles," p. 35), "the three different suppositions respecting the origin of things turn out to be literally unthinkable, what does he mean by asserting that a Creativ Power is the one great Reality? Mr. Spencer seems to suggest that, though all idea of First Cause, of Creator, of Absolute Existence, is unthinkable, the difficulty in the way of predicating them of anything is got over by asserting that the unthinkable and the unknowable is the ultimate reality. He said ("First Principles," p. 110), "Every supposition respecting the genesis of the Universe commits us to alternativ impossibilities of thought;" and again, "We are not permitted to know—nay, we are not even permitted to conceive—that Reality which is behind the veil of Appearance." Quite so! On that ground we hav long rested firmly, accepting Mr. Spencer's teaching. It is to violate that rule if we now go on to call it Creativ Power, Ultimate Cause, and the rest. It comes, then, to this: Mr. Spencer says to the theologians, "I cannot allow you to speak of a First Cause, or a Creator, or an All-Being, or an Absolute Existence, because you mean something intelligible and conceivable by these terms, and I tell you that they stand for ideas that are unthinkable and inconceivable. But," he adds, "I hav a perfect right to talk of an Ultimate Cause and a Creativ Power, and an Absolute Existence, and an All-Being, because I mean nothing by these terms—at least, nothing that can be either thought of or conceived of, and I know that I am not talking of anything intelligible or conceivable. That is the faith of an Agnostic, which except a man believe faithfully he cannot be saved."

Beyond the region of the knowable and the conceivable we hav no right to assume an infinit energy more than an infinit series of energies, or an infinit series of infinit things or nothings. We hav no right to assume one Ultimate Cause, or any cause, more than an infinit series of Causes, or something which is not Cause at all. We hav no right to assume that anything beyond the knowable is eternal, or infinit, or anything else; we hav no right to assume that it is the Ultimate Reality. There may be an endless circle of realities, or there may be no Reality at all. Once leave the region of the knowable and the conceivable, and every positiv assertion is unwarranted. The forms of our consciousness prove to us, says Mr. Spencer, that what lies behind the region of consciousness is not merely unknown but unknowable, that it is one, and that it is Real. The laws of mind, I reply, do not hold good in the region of the unthinkable; the forms of our consciousness cannot limit the Unknowable. All positiv assertions about that "which cannot be brought within the forms of our finite thought" are therefore unphilosophical. We hav always held this of the theological Creation, and we must hold it equally of the evolutionist Creation. Here is the difference between Positiv Philosophy and Agnostic Metaphysics.

But if this Realism of the Unknowable offends against sound philosophy, the Worship of the Unknowable is abhorrent to every instinct of genuin Religion. There is something startling in Mr. Spencer's assertion that he "is not concerned to show what effect this religious sentiment will hav as a moral agent." As in "First Principles," so now, he represents the business of religion to be to keep alive the consciousness of a Mystery. The recognition of this supreme verity has been from the first, he says, the vital element of Religion. From the beginning it has dimly discerned this ultimate verity; and that supreme and ultimate verity is, that there is an inscrutable Mystery. If this be not retrogressiv Religion, what is? Religion is not indeed to be discarded; but, in its final and perfect form, all that it ever has had of reverence, gratitude, love, and sympathy is to be shriveled up into the recognition of a Mystery. Morality, duty, goodness are no longer to be within its sphere. It will neither touch the heart of men nor mold the conduct; it will perpetually remind the intelligence that there is a great Enigma, which, it tells us, can never be solved. Not only is religion reduced to a purely mental sphere, but its task in that sphere is one practically imbecil.

Mr. Spencer complains that I called his Unknowable "an ever-present conundrum to be everlastingly given up." But he uses words almost exactly the same; he himself speaks of "the great Enigma which he [man] knows cannot be solved." The business of the religious sentiment is with "a consciousness of a Mystery that cannot be fathomed." It would be difficult to find for Religion a lower and more idle part to play in human life than that of continually presenting to man a conundrum, which he is told he must continually giv up. One would take all this to be a bit from "Alice in Wonderland," rather than the first chapter of "Synthetic Philosophy."

I turn to some of the points on which Mr. Spencer thinks that I misunderstand or misrepresent his meaning. I cannot admit any one of these cases. In calling the Unknowable a pure negation, I spoke from the standpoint of Religion, not of Metaphysics. It may be a logical postulate, but that of which we can know nothing, and of which we can form no conception, I shall continue to call a pure negation, as an object of worship, even if I am told (as I now am), that it is that "by which all things are created and sustained." Such is the view of Sir James Stephen, and of every other critic who has joined in this discussion.

With respect to Dean Mansel I made no mistake; the mistake is Mr. Spencer's, not mine. I said that of all modern theologians the dean came the nearest to him. As we all know, in "First Principles," Mr. Spencer quotes and adopts four pages from Mansel's "Bampton Lectures." But I said, "There is a gulf which separates even his all-negativ deity from Mr. Spencer's impersonal, unconscious, unthinking, and unthinkable Energy." Mr. Spencer says that I misrepresent him and transpose his doctrin and Mansel's, because he regards the Absolute as positiv and the dean regarded it as negativ. If Mr. Spencer will look at my words again, he will see that I was speaking of Mansel's Theology, not of his Ontology. I said "deity," not the Absolute. Mansel, as a metaphysician, no doubt spoke of the Absolute as negativ, whilst Mr. Spencer speaks of it as positiv. But Mansel's idea of deity is personal, whilst Mr. Spencer's Energy is not personal. That is strictly accurate. Dean Mansel's words are, "It is our duty to think of God as personal;" Mr. Spencer's words are, "Duty requires us neither to affirm nor deny personality" of the Unknown Cause. That is to say, the dean called his First Cause God; Mr. Spencer prefers to call it Energy. Both describe this First Cause negativly; but whilst the dean calls it a Person, Mr. Spencer will not say that it is person, conscious, or thinking. Mr. Spencer's impression, then, that I misrepresented him in this matter is simply his own rather hasty reading of my words.

It is quite legitimate in a question of religion and an object of worship to speak of this Unknowable Energy, described as Mr. Spencer describes it, as "impersonal, unconscious, unthinking, and unthinkable." The distinction that, since we neither affirm nor deny of it personality, consciousness, or thought, it is not therefore impersonal, is a metaphysical subtlety. That which cannot be presented in terms of human consciousness is neither personal, conscious, nor thinking, but properly unthinkable. To the ordinary mind it is a logical formula, it is apart from man, it is impersonal and unconscious. And to tell us that this conundrum is "the power which manifests itself in consciousness," that man and the world are but its products and manifestations, that it may hav (for aught we know) something higher than personality and something grander than intelligence, is to talk theologico-metaphysical jargon, but is not to giv the average man and woman any positiv idea at all, and certainly not a religious idea. In religion, at any rate, that which can only be described by negations is negativ; that which cannot be presented in terms of consciousness is unconscious.

I shall say but little about Mr. Spencer's Ghost theory as the historical source of all religion; because it is, after all, a subordinate matter, and would lead to a wide digression. I am sorry that he will not accept my (not very serious) invitation to him to modify the paradoxes thereon to be read in his "Principles of Sociology." I hav always held it to be one of the most unlucky of all his sociologic doctrins, and that on psychological as well as on historical grounds. Mr. Spencer asserts that all forms of religious sentiment spring from the primitiv idea of a disembodied double of a dead man. I assert that this is a rather complicated and developed form of thought; and that the simplest and earliest form of religious sentiment is the idea of the rudest savage, that visible objects around him—animal, vegetable, and inorganic—hav quasi-human feelings and powers, which he regards with gratitude and awe. Mr. Spencer says that man only began to worship a river or a volcano when he began to imagin them as the abode of dead men's spirits. I say that he began to fear or adore them so soon as he thought the river or the volcano had the feelings and powers of living beings, and that was from the dawn of the human intelligence. The latter view is, I maintain, far the simpler and more obvious explanation, and it is a fault in logic to construct a complicated explanation when a simple one answers the facts. Animals think inert things of a peculiar form to be animal; so do infants. The dog barks at a shadow; the horse dreads a steam-engin; the baby loves her doll, feeds her, nurses her, and buries her. The savage thinks the river, or the mountain beside which he livs, the most beneficent, awful, powerful of beings. There is the germ of religion. To assure us that the savage has no feeling of awe and affection for the river and the mountain until he has evolved the elaborate idea of disembodied spirits of dead men dwelling invisibly inside them, is as idle as it would be to assure us that the love and the terror of the dog, the horse, and the baby are due to their perceiving some disembodied spirit inside the shadow, the steam-engin, or the doll.

I think it a little hard that I may not hold this common-sense view of the matter along with almost all who hav studied the question, without being told that it comes of "persistent thinking along defined grooves," and that I should accept the Ghost theory of Religion were it not for my fanatical discipleship. Does not Mr. Spencer himself persistently think along defined grooves; and does not every systematic thinker do the same? But it so happens that the Ghost theory leads to conclusions that outrage common sense. If Dr. Tylor has finally adopted it, I am sorry. But it is certain that the believers in the Ghost theory as the origin of all forms of Religion are few and far between. The difficulties in the way of it are enormous. Mr. Spencer laboriously tries to persuade us that the worship of the Sun and the Moon arose, not from man's natural reverence for these great and beautiful powers of Nature, but solely as they were thought to be the abodes of the disembodied spirits of dead ancestors. Animal worship, tree and plant worship, fetichism, the Confucian worship of heaven, all, he would hav us believe, take their origin entirely from the idea that these objects contain the spirits of the dead. If this is not "persistent thinking along defined grooves," I know not what it is.

The case of China is decisiv. There we hav a religion of vast antiquity and extent, perfectly clear and well ascertained. It rests entirely on worship of Heaven and Earth, and objects of Nature regarded as organized beings, and not as the abode of human spirits. There is in the religion and philosophy of China, no notion of human spirits disembodied and detached from the dead person conceived as living in objects and distinct from dead bodies. The dead are the dead; not the spiritual denizens of other things. In the face of this, the vague language of missionaries and travelers as to the beliefs of savages must be treated with caution. Mr. Spencer speaks in too confident language of his having "proved" and "disproved" and "shown" all these things in his "Descriptiv Sociology" and in his "Principles of Sociology." How many competent persons has he convinced? Assuredly, for my part, I read and re-read all that he there says about the genesis of religion with amazement. We read these authorities for ourselvs, and we cannot see that they bear out his conclusions. It was a pity to refer to the tables in the "Descriptiv Sociology," perhaps the least successful of all Mr. Spencer's works. That work is a huge file of cuttings from various travelers of all classes, extracted by three gentlemen whom Mr. Spencer employed. Of course these intelligent gentlemen had little difficulty in clipping from hundreds of books about foreign races sentences which seem to support Mr. Spencer's doctrins. The whole proceeding is too much like that of a famous lawyer who wrote a law-book, and then gave it to his pupils to find the "cases" which supported his law. It is a little suspicious that we find so often at the head of each "superstition" of the lower races a heading in almost the same words to the effect: "Dreams regarded as visits from the spirits of departed relations." The intelligent gentlemen employed hav done their work very well, but of course one can find in this medley of tables almost any view. And I find facts which make for my view as often as any other.

Fetichism, says Mr. Spencer, is not found in the lowest races. Be that as it may, it is found wherever we can trace the germs of religion. Well, I read in the "Descriptiv Sociology" that Mr. Burton, perhaps the most capable of all African travelers, declares that "fetichism is still the only faith known in East Africa." In other places we read of the sun and moon, forests, trees, stones, snakes, and the like regarded with religious reverence by the savages of Central Africa. "The Damaras attribute the origin of the sheep to a large stone." They regard a big tree as the origin of Damaras. "Cattle of a certain color are venerated by the Damaras." "To the Bechuanas rain appears as the giver of all good." "The negro whips or throws away a worthless fetich." "The Hottentots and Bushmen shoot poisoned arrows at the lightning and throw old shoes at it." Exactly. And do these Damaras, Bechuanas, and Bushmen do this solely because they think that the sun and moon, the lightning, the rain, the trees, the cattle, and the snakes are the abodes of the disembodied spirits of their dead relativs? And do they never do this until they hav evolved a developed Ghost theory?

This is more than I can accept for all the robustness of faith which Mr. Spencer attributes to me. Whilst I find in a hundred books that countless races of Africa and the organized religion of China attribute human qualities to natural objects, and grow up to regard those objects with veneration and awe, I shall continue to think that fetichism, or the reverent ascription of feeling and power to natural objects, is a spontaneous tendency of the human mind. And I shall refuse, even on Mr. Spencer's high authority, and that of his three compilers, to believe that it is solely a result of a developed Ghost theory. To ask us to believe this as "proved" on the strength of a pile of clippings made to order is, I think, quite as droll to ordinary minds as anything Mr. Spencer can pick up out of the Positivist Calendar.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

Mr. George Chainey and Spiritualism.

A FEW FINAL WORDS.

"The cry is, Still they come." And yet another conversion upon the part of Mr. George Chainey, and this one must certainly hav taken place about as suddenly as his previous departures. In his recent lecture, "Through Day to Night, and Night to Day," Mr. Chainey distinctly says that he felt discussion on the question of Spiritualism "inappropriate," for the reason, I presume, to quote his own words, that he did not "expect any one to believe in it on his testimony," and that he "always did refuse controversy, and always should." Such were the statements of our persistent hero only a few weeks ago; but now an entire change has come over the spirit of his dream, and with his usual impulsiv nature he invites me to mortal combat, and vehemently protests that it is his wish to do the very thing that in his printed lecture he says he will not do. Further, he threatens me, in the event of my not accepting his pugilistic invitation, with what he terms the saying of Banquo to Macbeth, "Then yield thee, coward." The fact that Banquo never said anything of the kind matters but little. The saying comes with bad grace from Mr. Chainey, who, until the last few weeks, persistently refused under any circumstances to enter into discussion. What new light has dawned upon his mind this time to induce him to make this sudden change? What fresh mysterious influence has captured his mental powers and led him to avow a hasty conversion from one extreme to the other? My friend Chainey, is not this another result of uncontroled emotion, showing that you still lack that desired practicability so very necessary to insure stability of conviction? What next to expect from our lively chamelion it is hard to say. If in the future he do not manifest some regard for the process of reasoning in his rapid mental transformations, I fear it will be necessary for me to say of him, in the words of Othello, "I loved you once, but never more be officer of mine."

As this will be my final say upon this subject, I feel concerned to notice two questions: 1. What really were the causes which prompted Mr. Chainey to desire to leave the temple of peace, for which he is so well suited, to enter the arena of debate, for which he is in no way adapted? It was not to hav any opportunity to vindicate his honor from any attack I had made upon it, inasmuch as I credit him with high moral culture, a generous disposition, and a loving heart. It was not that it was necessary for him to prove that he possessed ability. This I hav cheerfully granted, and I shall always bear testimony to his marvelous power, although it is frequently, in my opinion, wrongly directed. It was not that he needed to establish his right to change his views; nobody questioned that; it was only to the unfortunate mode adopted in publicly announcing the change that exception was taken. It was not even that demonstration should be given of the usefulness and earnestness of Spiritualists in the endeavor to emancipate the human mind from the power of the theological teachings of the churches. No one who has watched their labors could doubt their desire in this matter. My experience in America upon this point is that so far as the secular welfare of mankind is concerned, the Spiritualists, with few exceptions, are noble workers. This, therefore, which is a truth to me, can afford no topic for debate, as it is self-evident. And yet every effect must hav its cause; the effect in this instance—my friend's temporary craving for debate—we all know, but the cause is only perceptible to a few, and what that is Mr. Chainey can state when and how he pleases. "There are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in your philosophy, Horatio."

The reasons partly given by Mr. Chainey for this desired encounter are not quite accurate; not that I wish to charge my friend with intentional inaccuracy. He is too good for that. Still the inaccuracy is there all the same, and in justice to myself it must be pointed out. No pledge to debate was given by me, only a conditional promis subject to arrangements to be made at Mr. Chainey's own request by Mr. S. P. Putnam. That gentleman, for reasons he has ably given, objected to the controversy; therefore that part of it fell through. In the next place, from the first I informed Mr. Chainey that I could not accept his proposal, and I named others which he has not accepted up to the present time. On the contrary, he offered fresh arrangements differing from his first proposal and also from the one I sent him. To these I hav given no consent either actually or by implication. Thus it was inaccurate to say the debate was decided upon, and that "he [Mr. Chainey] instantly agreed to my modifications." He did nothing of the kind, as his letters in my possession will show.

It is mentioned that since my official association with the League, I hav challenged the Rev. Dr. Sexton. Quite true. I am prepared to meet any minister, or any dozen of the clergy, in debate who will oppose the principles of the League, as Dr. Sexton does. Will Mr. Chainey take the doctor's position? If so, he can hav all the debate he requires. He cannot, however, do this, as he informs us that he agrees fully with our principles. Where, then, would be the utility of debating with one who so far is with us? My view of Spiritualism, as propounded in the United States, is that there is nothing in it that necessarily prevents its believers from doing Secular work. If a Spiritualist can see something beyond my vision, that is no reason why we should not both travel on ground visible to us both. I freely grant that because I am not convinced of the alleged truth of Spiritualism, that is no proof that others are not; and if, on the other hand, some persons feel convinced of its truth, it does not, therefore, follow that I must share their convictions before seeing reasons for so doing.

2. The second question calling for notice is, Was there sufficient ground to justify me in charging my noble Hotspur with "inaccuracy, imputation, and lack of reason?" Let us see, taking them seriatim.

Inaccuracy. Mr. Chainey in his lectures has the following: Liberals "cultivate their intellects till their hearts are dead within them." "Those who think this life the only one, become the more senual." "Liberalism chills and benumbs all the best instincts of the heart." "Mr. Watts announced his reply before he knew what I was going to say." "His printed reply was not the same as he gave at Cassadaga; mine was." These are a few specimens of the inaccuracies to which my friend, in his moments of uncontroled emotion, gave utterance. In my previous comments I hav shown that it is not the fact that the hearts of Liberals are dead; that we become the more sensual in consequence of our inability to believe in another life; and that Liberalism chills the best instincts of the heart. Mr. Chainey knows from his experience of Liberals that these allegations are not true, and to assert the contrary is to libel some of the noblest and purest of earth. In his camp at Cassadaga, Mr. Chainey read to me what he was going to say in his lecture, and it was then that I decided to reply to the result of his over-heated imagination. My printed reply only professed to be the substance of what I said at the convention, as my lecture was not a written one. Mr. Chainey's was, and yet, after giving it in full on the Sunday, he cut out certain portions before having it printed. Had it been published as read, it would hav been amusing in the extreme.

Imputations. To designate Liberals as "inflated egotists," as "swine," as battening on "the moor of sensuality;" "as speaking lightly of the relation of the sexes," is in my opinion not only to indulge in imputation, but to select the most vulgar, cruel, and unjust kind. This reckless and uncalled-for vituperation has been the cause of the opposition to Mr. Chainey—not his taking up Spiritualism.

Lack of Reason. Mr. Chainey undertook to prove on Sunday that Spiritualism was superior to Secularism and Materialism; he also announced that he had "found a new gospel." Let the reader carefully go through that lecture, and discover if he can use reason to justify this alleged superiority. No definitions were given of the terms used, no attempt was made to explain the unique advantages of the "new gospel," and no reasons were offered in support of the serious charges made against Liberalism. Oratory we had in abundance, but that is not always allied with argument, neither is rhetoric invariably associated with logic.

Canadian Notes.

We get cheering news from various parts of Canada. We shall hav a hearty gathering at our great Convention, December 13th, in Albert Hall, Toronto.

There was a second debate on Nordau's "Lies of Modern Civilization" on Sunday morning last, in Secular Hall, Toronto. The debate proved so interesting that it was determined to hav a third debate on the same subject next Sunday morning.

Three books hav attracted unusual attention in Toronto during the last few years. They are Max Nordau's "Lies of Modern Civilization;" that extraordinary work, "Science and Life;" and Henry George's "Progress and Poverty." A careful study of those books brings a rich reward in materials for thinking.

At Ottawa, they hav a Secular Society composed of some of the elite, and they hav writers among them who rank high in the literature of Canada. The society has been in existence for a number of years.

The Bible is one of the gods worshiped by Christians, making a fifth god in the orthodox Pantheon, which consists of three gods and one goddess; and one book-god—five in all. The worship of the book-god seems to be somewhat declining, judging by the number of pulpit-screamers and gospel-shouters who are inclined to go back on their boss, the book, and only retain the life and teachings of Christ. A luminary of the English established church is one of the latest of these back-sliders and deserters from the book-god. But there are a great many of these black sheep among the clergy of to-day.

Toronto, Ont., Nov. 1st. R. B. BUTLAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: For the purpose of contributing an item to "Canadian Notes," which now fill a space in your valuable paper, I am induced to pen the following: Mr. Charles Watts delivered a lecture in this town on Tuesday evening, Oct. 21st, subject, "Christianity; Its Claims Examined." The audience was large and appreciativ, and the lecturer, by his eloquent and forcible delivery, and by the effectual and inoffensiv way in which he disposed of those Christian claims, after having stated them clearly and fairly, and in well arranged succession, elicited hearty and repeated applause. It is now over four years since Mr. B. F. Underwood lectured here, and during that time Freethought has had no public exponent in this town. Yet public sentiment has progressed in the direction of toleration. In arranging for Mr. Underwood's coming, four years ago, we found it hard to convince our Christian fellow-citizens that it was not pushing toleration too far to allow us unbelievers the privilege of running a public lecture. This time there has been no opposition manifested. We hav been allowed to pursue the even tenor of our way in quiet. They hav, in fact, been a little too lenient with us, and rather disappointed us, as well as Mr. Watts, in that they made no response to his courteous and persistent invitation to come forward after the lecture was over.

An effort is being made to take advantage of the newly-awakened interest in the cause which is the logical outcome of Mr. Watts's visit, by resuscitating the Freethought Association which existed here some years ago. In the work of organization we hav many difficulties to contend with, the most important of which is the reluctance of business men to join an unpopular cause. That, however, may be in some measure be overcome by inducing Mr. Watts to repeat his visit, and by the influence which the success of the work of organization is meeting with all over the country is sure to hav on every community. THE TRUTH SEEKER has some subscribers here, and we will try to increase the number now, believing that it deservedly occupies the position of organ-in-chief to the Secular movement on this continent.

Recent Discoveries of Ancient Christian Manuscripts.

From the Boston Herald of Sept. 7th we extract the following:

It is the remark of President Hitchcock, of the Union Theological Seminary, that one of the early points of a fresh development in biblical criticism will be found in the New Testament, and it looks as if men were gathering materials for a new departure in these studies now. The Independent prints an editorial in which it mentions the following important discoveries, all made within the last forty years:

Then follows a list of eight early Christian documents, most of which are very familiar to students.

First comes the complete codex of the New Testament, discovered by Tischendorf in 1844 and 1859 in a convent on Mount Sinai. The manuscript is assigned to the fourth century.

Four of the other documents are published in the Antenicene Christian Library, to wit:

"Refutation of all Heresies," by Hippolytus, who is supposed to hav died about A.D. 235–9.

"Epistle of Barnabas."

"Shepherd of Hermas."

"Epistle of Clement of Rome."

All these are fully considered in the "Revelations of Antichrist," 1879, where President Hitchcock and the editor of the Boston Herald will find further and most startling "materials for a new departure."

Before Tischendorf discovered complete, or almost complete, copies of the foregoing documents, there were extant a considerable part of the "Refutation of all Heresies," otherwise called the "Philosophumena;" a small portion of the "Epistle of Barnabas;" and all of the "Shepherd of Hermas" (in Latin); but no part of the "Epistle of Clement of Rome."

The three remaining documents are:

Fragments of the earliest Syriac version of the New Testament, discovered by the late Dr. Cureton, and portions of the Coptic (Egyptian) version.

The "Diatessaron" of Tatian, a Syrian father, who died about A.D. 170 or later.

The "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles."

Dr. Cureton's Syriac fragments of the New Testament exhibit a few important variations from the received Greek text.

The "Diatessaron" of Tatian is said to hav been discovered within the last ten years. We hav not seen it. Tatian was a disciple of Justin Martyr, the earliest authenticated Christian father. Justin was an opponent of the Gnostics, of whom Marcion, his contemporary at Rome, was the chief. Tatian embraced the Christianity of Justin at Rome, but after the death of his master, about A.D. 166, he renounced the doctrin of the incarnation and humanity of Christ, and established himself at Antioch as a Gnostic. One work of Tatian survives; about forty printed pages, written about A.D. 170, and a few sentences of his other works. He had a gospel, says Theodoret (A.D. 430), which omitted the genealogies and all other passages showing that Christ was born of David according to the flesh (Sup. Rel.). The "Diatessaron" is said to be a harmony of the four gospels, beginning with the first verse of John's gospel, and is claimed to be a conclusiv proof of the acceptance of that gospel as early as A.D. 170.

Without a sight of the newly discovered document, we are prepared to admit that John's gospel did exist as early as A.D. 170, if not many years earlier.

The "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" we hav already reviewed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 26th. The discovery of the manuscript was made in 1875, by Bishop Bryennios. The date of the manuscript is A.D. 1056, and it is claimed that the original book was composed between A.D. 120 and 150. A translation is published in the Andover Review for April, 1884. If the book is genuin, its composition must be assigned to a much earlier date than A.D. 120. Why? Because Clement of Alexandria, who wrote about A.D. 200 or earlier, quotes a passage from it as scripture (Misc. i, 20; Teach. iii). Half a century is too short a time for a post-apostolic writing to acquire the reputation of holy writ; but 200 years would be quite sufficient. Therefore we would assign the composition of the "Teaching of the Twelve apostles" to about the year 1.

The story of the crucifixion, A.D. 29–33, is a stupendous fraud. The real Jesus was stoned and hanged about 75 B.C. Before the first year of the Christian era, all the apostles of that Jesus were dead. Then was the time for their successors to put forth an authoritativ work entitled, "Teaching of the Apostles."

Bishop Bryennios also discovered bound up with the "Teaching of the Apostles," the two epistles of Clement of Rome, and the epistle of Barnabas. The lateness of the copy of these epistles renders them of comparativly little value, and translations of them may not appear very soon. Indeed, unless the variations from the early codices are important, there is no need of new versions of those epistles.

The "Man of Sin" welcomes all new discoveries of ancient documents, because he is sure that they will tend to confirm his own grand discovery and demonstration that Jesus died a hundred years before Pontius Pilate became procurator of Judea.

The League.

How to Organize a Local League.

The National Liberal League is formed by the union of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues. To organize a Local Auxiliary League, any person (man or woman) may place the following Call at the head of a sheet of paper and solicit signatures:

CALL.

WE, the undersigned citizens of [here introduce name of town or city], agree to organize an Auxiliary Liberal League, to work in connection with the National Liberal League, and to pay the sums set opposit our names for that purpose.

Names.	Residences.	Amounts.

As soon as ten persons have subscribed to this Call, and five dollars have been paid in, make out an application for a Charter, inclosing the application, together with a money order or postal note for five dollars (or the amount may be inclosed in a registered letter) to the secretary of the National Liberal League. The fee for a Charter is ten dollars, and the Board of Directors have voted to allow the organizer of the Auxiliary Liberal League to retain five dollars as compensation for his or her services in effecting the organization.

Any Liberal society can by a vote qualify itself an Auxiliary Liberal League, and take out a charter.

On receipt of the five dollars and application signed by the President and Secretary (or the temporary Secretary) of the new League (and as many others as may choose), the Secretary will forward to the applicant a Charter signed by the proper officers of the National Liberal League. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM,

Secretary of the National Liberal League.

55 East 9th street, New York.

SUPPORT OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE.

In order to provide an adequate revenue to the treasury of the National League, to enable it to carry out the requirements of sections, 4, 5, and 6 of Article III. of its Constitution, and to do other legitimate work of the League, every auxiliary is requested to contribute a certain sum monthly, not less than five cents per month from each one of its members, for the use of the National League. The amount thus collected should be remitted quarterly on the first days of January, April, July, and October, by the secretary of the auxiliary to the secretary of the National League.

Correspondence.

A FRIEND: I inclose $10 in response to your letter and circular, and when I feel that I can send any more, will do so. The movement is very important. The "God-in-the-Constitution" party hav a strong ally in the St. John movement; indeed, their prohibition measures are much more stimulated by their theological notions than their hostility to intoxicating liquors. Prohibition, as carried on to-day, is a cloak for intolerance—a moral log-rolling by the clergy of the country—especially the Methodist!

JNO. HART, Doylestown, Pa.: Yours of 27th received. Inclosed please find $10—Frank Hart $5.00, John Hart $5.00—for lecture fund. Go on with the good work, and may your efforts be crowned with success.

J. C. ROE, Oshkosh, Wis.: I inclose herewith $10 to apply on the Campaign Fund. Am glad that the Liberal League has such a bright prospect before it, and hope every Liberal in the land will do his and her best to help those who hav given their entire time to its maintenance.

B. J. BRINEY, Secretary of the Bradford, Pa., Liberal League: The Liberal League of Bradford are in favor of the Watts and Chainey debate. If Chainey can't prove more at Boston than he did at Cassadaga, it will be a failure on his part. We all knew Chainey, and when we heard he had been converted to Spiritualism, we said at once he was honest, and must hav seen some phenomena he could not account for, or had been misled and deluded. Then we went to see and hear him at Cassadaga. After he got done abusing Liberals and came to his own experience, it was whispered through the audience, "Now for a treat." Now, does Mr. Chainey think that a public gush of sentiment proves anything? We would ask the Spiritualists to analyze his speech and tell Materialists what he proved or demonstrated. Did he ever see a spirit? Does he know any more now about Gods and spirits than when he lectured in Bradford one year ago? The tenor of his lecture there was to deny both. We want Watts to prepare to meet him, and not allow him in an orthodox way to assume his premises, but make him produce the evidence of Spiritualism. If he can't, then withdraw from the contest and all go to work for the Nine Demands of Liberalism. If Watts is vanquished in the contest, and Chainey demonstrates his theory, score one for Spiritualism.

WM. G. MAYO, President of the Newark, N. J., Liberal League: Were I a Spiritualist, I should say I was "impressed" to write the following. Indeed, I couldn't get it out of my head, though I hav said "Down!" to it ever so many times, but it will not down. So, to relieve my conscience, and in view of the fact that the old workers in our ranks are passing away, and that new speakers must take their places to battle for the cause of right and Liberalism, I hereby, through you, offer my services to a cause I love most dearly, and recognize the fact that what I enjoy by mental unfoldment and real intellectual freedom I owe to the influence of our Freethought movement. You hav had a few examples of my efforts at our League, so perhaps you can judge if my services would be worth anything to the cause. I can do no less than make the offer, as my profession places me beyond the necessity of being remunerated pecuniarily. I offer my services gratuitously, with the privilege of paying my own expenses. I hope you are so abundantly supplied with good speakers you will hav no use for me, but if you are in need of speakers, call on yours truly.

[I want to call special attention to this letter. Dr. Mayo is president of the Newark League, one of the most successful of our Liberal societies. He is an interesting speaker, a thorough-going Radical, broad-minded and intelligent, and as a lecturer will be of great service to our cause. He is one of our "Captains of Industry," and I hope the Leagues will giv him plenty to do. His offer is most generous—made in the spirit of loyalty to truth and humanity.—S. P. P.]

JOSEPH LEE, Fresno, Cal.: I write to let you know how well I like the present arrangement of the National Liberal League. I hav just read Mr. Watts's reply to George Chainey; the reply is almost the first that I hav seen of Mr. Watts's writings, and it suits me well. Although I am a poor old man, I concluded to promis you $100 toward the five thousand asked for to carry on the campaign. I send you to-day five and will send five as often as I hav it to spare, and I hope the five thousand will be fifty thousand, and I am confident that you can use well all you get. I would like to hav a little of the surplus gift of speech that Chainey has, for I would like to tell some things that I know and am unable to do so; but Chainey can tell more that he don't know than I can that I do know; but I will help you and Mr. Watts to tell all you can. I hate to see so many good Liberals so rampant in favor of anti-prohibition. Spirits are what we are fighting, and the spirits of alcohol is the worst of all in its operations on humanity, worse than all others, except that of religion, which I consider the boss fiend.

Don't forget that C. B. Reynolds, chairman of the executiv committee of the League, lectures before the New York Liberal Club, Friday evening, November 14th; and at Newark, Sunday, November 9th.

Don't forget that Watts lectures in New York at German Masonic Hall, Sunday evening, November 16th, on "Agnosticism and Modern Thought."

Don't forget the grand Liberal Sociable on Thursday evening, November 20th. Come and greet Wakeman, Leland, Palmer, Watts, Reynolds, and all the old and new officers of the League, and so prepare ourselvs for a generous Thanksgiving. See advertisments. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Sec.

Definition of Religion.

The following definition of religion is given by Dr. Quatrefages, professor of anthropology in the Museum of Natural History, Paris:

"A belief in beings superior to man and capable of exercising a good or evil influence upon his destiny, and the conviction that the existence of man is not limited to the present life, but that there remains for him a future beyond the grave.

"Every people, every man, believing these two things is religious" (The Human Species, Appleton, 1879).

How now, Positivists, who eliminate God and a future state from your definition of religion? You are ruled out of Professor Quatrefages's broad church. He combats the allegation made by many travelers and scholars, that there are countries where the people are all Atheists and do not believe in a future state. "We nowhere find," says he, "either a great human race, or even a division however unimportant of that race, professing Atheism." But the world is full of religious people, according to his notion, and the only exception is a handful of cultured Atheists.

Hear, O Agnostic! stand in awe, O Positivist! be dumbfounded, O Pantarch! W. H. B.

The Mistakes of Christ Corrected by Washington Gladden.

In the October number of the Century Magazine, there is a very suggestiv article by the Rev. Washington Gladden, entitled "Christianity and Wealth," wherein the writer essays to show the relationship between the two, and to state what he is pleased to call the "Christian ethics," as applied to the proper relations of capital and labor.

He givs an impressiv array of figures showing the great increase of the world's wealth in the past twenty years.

Of the United States, he says: "In 1860, the estimated valuation of property in the United States was a little over 16,000,000,000. In 1870, it was a little over 24,000,000,000, while the census estimates of 1880 put the wealth of the nation at 43,642,000,000, making the United States the richest nation in the world."

Further on, he says: "The world is fast growing richer; of this there can be no doubt. And what has the Christian moralist to say about it? Does the ethical system, of which he is the expounder, authorize him to say anything, and, if so, what? Should he teach that this increase of wealth is a good thing, or an evil thing; a blessing to be rejoiced in, or a misery to be deplored? One fact thrusts itself in our faces as soon as we ask this question; this great increase of wealth is visible mainly, after all, in Christian lands. We say that the world is growing rich, but it is our world."

Is it not strange that the "Christian moralist" should ask whether wealth is a good thing, so long as he has his full answer in the parable of the camel and the needle's eye? So long as he knows that wealth is equivalent to damnation? So long as he has been teaching for centuries, "Lay not up for yourself treasures upon earth;" "Take, therefore, no thought for the morrow, what ye shall eat, or drink, or wear;" "Blessed are the poor;" "Go and sell that thou hast, and giv it to the poor;" "A rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven;" "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God?"

Since he knows all this, is it not strange that he can ask the question? And is it not doubly strange that it is the Christian world which has—more than any other—had its eye on the main chance?

Is it not strange that America, with its 80,000 clergymen, should not know better than to pile up wealth beyond that of all other countries, when she must know it is sure damnation? In spite of her 80,000 clergymen, she seems to be willing to sell all hope of eternal life for 43,642,000,000 cash down. But here is a clergyman who has the temerity to say, "The Christian moralist must say, then, that the increase of wealth is not of itself an evil; that it is, instead, a blessing to mankind." . . . "Christianity cannot be hostil to the production of wealth without making war upon itself." So the writer proposes to revise the teaching of Christ himself to fit the "record of the party."

Is it not an evil to deliberately place oneself in a position from which it is more difficult to enter the kingdom of heaven than it is for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle?

Is it not a monstrous evil to labor to do this thing? "What can it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

Again Mr. Gladden says: "Christianity is the one grand cause of the production of wealth in modern times."

Which is quite as logical and equally as true as it would be to say that paganism was the one grand cause of the enormous wealth of ancient times; or that Judaism is the one grand cause of the great and enduring, the phenomenally continuous wealth of the Jews. If Christianity creates its Vanderbilts, so did paganism create its Crœsus, and Judaism its Solomon of the past, and its Rothschilds of the present. It is a poor deduction that is not large enough to go all the way around.

It is a strange assertion, too, in the face of the fact that the two most devoutly Christian countries to-day are so miserably poor. Certainly if this were the one grand cause of wealth, Christian Spain and Italy would far outstrip in wealth Infidel France and doubting America. Instead of which these former countries grovel in ignorance and poverty, and are hopelessly sunk in Christianity; while the latter countries make education, independence, and wealth their ambition, let it strike where it may. They say, "If the cross is in the way, root it up or lay it aside." Spain or Italy simply lay aside the man who suggests or tries it.

In seriously discussing the problem of the relation of capital to labor, Mr. Gladden felt it necessary to explain away the generally accepted belief that the disciples held all goods in common, and he maintains that this was not the case. Hence, he argues, it is not necessary to accept this as the final and proper settlement of the property question.

But suppose that the disciples had so held their property?

What possible bearing could that fact hav on so wide and important a question as the one before us to-day?

As well try to regulate it upon the basis of what a lot of children did with their mud-pies.

I presume that not even the clergy will claim that the twelve simple fishermen of Galilee were famous financiers.

So that it seems strange that in a serious paper so trivial, inadequate, and irrelevant a matter should be offered as argument, or as throwing any light on the problem of the times.

After citing many of the evils of the present relationships of capital and labor, he says: "All these iniquitous encroachments upon the rights of the people must be arrested; and it is the duty of every Christian, as the servant of a God of justice and righteousness, to say so in terms that cannot be misunderstood." I protest. And I insist that it is injurious and narrowing to put it in such terms, and to offer for it such reasons.

If these wrongs are as stated—and I am not now dealing with that question—they are wrongs to humanity; they are outrages on man; and it is the duty of every man, as a sovereign, as a lover of justice and as a believer in equality and freedom, to resist the encroachments.

Manhood, not Christianity, is what should assert itself. Men to defend manhood, not Christians to defend believers, are needed.

Our sympathies are already narrow enough; why try to crystallize them within a given creed? It is infinitly harmful. It is pitilessly cruel.

Universal brotherhood and justice, not fanaticism and selfishness, is what man needs to be taught.

"As the servant of a God of justice and righteousness!"

The God who hardened Pharaoh's heart that he might destroy him; the God who sacrificed the purity of 16,000 innocent and helpless girls, simply to gratify the hatred and brutality of a camp of soldiers already steeped in the blood of the mothers and fathers of these, their thrice-tortured and degraded victims! The God of justice who sanctioned polygamy and upheld slavery!

No. Not from the outlook of a "servant" of such a God or of any one; but as a man, upright, just, honest and honorable, this question should be met and fairly dealt with.

It is not Christian money to be paid. It is not always Christian employers that are to be dealt with. It is not Christian laborers that are oppressed. It is simply capital. It is wealthy employers. and it is oppressed labor that we must consider. The capital may come from heathen lands; the employer may be an Infidel in New York; the laborer may be a pagan, but the question remains the same.

They are men, and the fair and equitable distribution of wealth and labor, the honest remuneration of toil, is the question at issue.

It is a shame, and it is a pitiful disgrace, to attempt to drag it into the narrow belief and prejudice of race.

The question is a serious, an honest, and a noble one; for the love of humanity let us keep it out of the slime of politics and the quibbling of theology.

Are even scholarly and earnest Christians so hopelessly narrow and hardened that the absolute brotherhood of man is an inconceivable idea to them?

Further on he says: "It is not a difficult problem. The solution is quite within the power of the Christian employer. All he has to do is to admit his laborers to an industrial partnership with himself by giving them a fixed share in the profits of production, to be divided among them, in proportion to their earnings at the end of the year."

Now, for the love of common sense, why say the "Christian" employer? Would it not accomplish the same result if the employer happened to be an Infidel or a Buddhist? If it is desirable that he giv the employed a share in the business, why not say so and leave all cant about the form of his faith out?

Why not say, "It is not a very difficult problem. The solution is quite within the power of the employer?" Or else be quite consistent and say that "the Christian employer should admit the Christian laborer into an industrial Christian partnership by giving him a fixed Christian share in the Christian profits of the Christian production, to be divided at the end of the Christian year?"

Then he givs us a solution of the problem, upon the partnership idea, as developed by Professor Henry Carter Adams, of Michigan University, of which he naively says he does not know whether Professor Adams wishes to be ranked as a "Christian moralist" or not, but that his words exactly express the substance of the Christian doctrin of ethics upon the matter.

Now, according to Mr. Gladden's own statements, this never has been the Christian practice, nor the Christian ethics, as understood by Christ himself, and, indeed, is a comparativly new doctrin, which has never yet had more than a few experimental trials—some of which, at least, were made by Infidels and Secularists.

Why call it "Christian ethics?" Christianity has had nearly nineteen hundred years, in which she has never placed labor upon this basis; and according to Mr. Gladden's own account it has widened and deepened the gulf between the rich and poor as no other religion has; and under it the rich hav grown richer and more powerful than under all other forms of faith. So why call these new ideas Christian ethics? That Mr. Gladden happens to be a Christian, and at the same time believes in the new ethical doctrin, makes it no more Christian ethics than the belief of the Hon. Thaddeus B. Wakeman in much the same thing makes it Positivist ethics, or the belief of Professor Adams, of unknown creed, can make it problematic ethics. Not so much, indeed, for the Christians hav had nearly nineteen hundred years to show what their ethical system is, and, although they hav proved beyond a shadow of doubt that it is not the system of Christ, they hav, also, proved that it is not the new doctrin of co-operation or partnership. While the new schools of Positivists or Agnostics hav had no chance, as yet, to show how far their words and acts may agree, while they hav said, from the first, much the same thing as the new ethics proposes, and a few of them hav acted upon the belief, still they hav had neither the numbers, the wealth, nor the time, so far, to show how firm the faith may be, or how nearly the selfishness of private greed may permit the theory and the practice to become one.

Although there is much more in the article of which I would like to speak, I must refrain from so doing at this time.

His article ends thus: "The great inequalities arising from the present defectiv methods of distribution will only be corrected through a deepening sense of the obligations imposed by the possession of wealth. The economic law, like the moral law, can never be fulfilled without love"—and honesty which will not stoop to claim for a system that which it has never possessed, and which its founder distinctly repudiated, simply because it appears now to be a higher light, and to become in time the recognized code of a better moral system.

Christianity toward labor is one thing, and has had a long day of trial; justice toward labor is another thing, and we trust that its day is near the dawn.

Sunday Laws.

Surely there could never be a more remarkable instance of confusion of ideas than that through which many modern Christians confound the Sabbath with the Sunday. The original command, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy" (Exodus xx, 8), was strictly a ceremonial Jewish law. Everyone knows that it applied to the Saturday according to the Jewish reckoning, that is, from sunset on Friday until the same hour the following day. Protestant Christians are fully aware of this, yet, without any authority whatever, they transpose the day to Sunday, and the hours from midnight to midnight. Still they pretend that in all other respects the old law is binding.

It is impossible to imagin a more illogical position than this. That of the Roman Catholics has at least the merit of consistency. They hold that the ceremonial law was entirely abolished under the new covenant. Consequently the Sabbath became no more obligatory than the rite of circumcision or any other purely ceremonial observance of Judaism. In the place of it, a weekly festival was instituted, commemorating the resurrection of Jesus. This was done by the church which, according to them, has absolute power to regulate all matters of ritual and ceremony. This is clear enough, and can only be assailed by attacking the authority of the church. But for Protestants, who pretend to found their teaching upon the Bible, to tell us that the rules given in the Old Testament for the observance of Saturday are now binding upon Sunday is the climax of absurdity. There is not a single text in existence, which, in the most remote way, alludes to any such change.

Strange to say, it is precisely among those who profess to take the scripture for their sole guide in religion that this most unscriptural doctrin has taken firmest root. In Presbyterian Scotland, the Bible and the Sabbath hav long been the idols of their worship. Indeed it was among them that the notion of Sunday being the Sabbath first originated. The first day of the week is usually called the Sabbath there in common conversation. Through the progress of Freethought, neither Bible nor Sabbath holds the position they once did in the larger towns, but in country places they are still supreme. Although a modern innovation, not yet three centuries old, and confined to a small portion even of Christian people, this is the observance which of all others they are most anxious to make compulsory, and to embody in the law of every state where they can possibly get the opportunity. We object to religion in the state in every way. It is the business of a government to attend to secular affairs and let religions take care of themselvs. One of the most objectionable ways in which it could make its ugly presence perceptible is by Sunday laws. When it is a religion which professes to be scriptural, it is perfectly ridiculous. When it is a religion which professes to protest against the Catholic church, it is monstrously absurd to giv legal protection to an institution which has no authority for its existence outside that church. Tyrannical laws injure, but foolish laws insult as well.

A Methodist D.D.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The ventilation in your issue of Oct. 4th of the case of Daniel Wise is just and called for. It requires a priest like Mr. Wise to make war upon popery, and to overlook the historical fact that these Christians, both Protestants and papists, hav murdered nine millions of each other to evince their "faith" in the "Holy Ghost." Since Mr. Wise was a boy, some fifty years ago, I hav known him. He was a Methodist when he left England, I think, for this country. And at that period it was not so common as it is now for Methodist preachers to be dubbed with "D.D." Elijah Hedding, one of the Methodist bishops, told me when I was a Methodist minister that these characteristic letters, "D.D.," did not become any real Methodist minister, who was "inspired by the Holy Ghost to preach; as 'D.D.' signified devil damned." And yet this very bishop afterward showed how very little of the "Holy Ghost" he had, as he accepted D.D. for his own name, as it is now so common for any ignoramus to do. And I hav long noticed that since Methodism has increased the number of its literary institutions, each of them has been very lavish in dubbing Methodist ministers like Mr. Wise with a degree of "devil damned." It causes the recipient to stick to the ism, and givs him an idea of his own back-bone, which he could never hav had without it. Hence I see persons who were boys when I knew them, that had never learned to write their own names, to which now I often see the D.D. attached. But whether Mr. Wise was flattered by Methodism with D.D. in consideration of a plagiarism he committed on me in 1840 I am not able to say. At any rate, it looks so. And as I owe Methodism a "debt of love" for it persecution continued against me for six years before I left its ranks in 1840, and from year to year ever since that period, I will state a few of the facts, and allow you to judge. The "offense" for which the Methodist Episcopal church has persecuted me for half a century may be stated in three sentences.

1. I inaugurated the movement in behalf of theological education, theological schools, and seminaries, in 1833.

2. I inaugurated in 1834 the anti-slavery movement against Methodist slave-holding and American slavery.

3. And, finally, I doffed the shad-bellied coat of Methodism in 1840, four years after I had discovered the vainglory, the deception, the hypocrisy, and the fraud of Methodism. And this was after I had endured the "bad odor" they had cast upon my name, although I was honorably acquitted in five yearly ecclesiastical trials, in which the officials had vainly attempted to expel me. Thus, in leaving the church, I committed the "unpardonable sin" against Methodism, "that hath never forgivness," neither in that or this age, or in the age to come (Matt. xii, 32). At the Eastham, Mass., Camp-meeting, 1838, I preached a sermon on "Personal Effort," taking my text James v, 20, which was plagiarized by Daniel Wise. The Methodist disciplin made it the duty of the book agents to publish any sermon, tract, or book that was so ordered by an annual conference. And this sermon of mine was thus ordered by two annual conferences in the M. E. church, namely, the New Hampshire and the New England. I myself furnished the book agents with the official recommendations of the two conferences, and a copy of my sermon. But they refused to publish it, assigning, as the reason, that I was an Abolitionist, and the editor of Zion's Watchman, a free and independent paper, and my name was in "bad odor at the South." But the sermon of Daniel Wise, preached in 1840, at the same camp-meeting, and on the same text and the same subject (a copy of which is now before me), the book agents published, thus indorsing Mr. Wise in his theft, so far as he did anything unministerial in his plagiarism. And here, to show the meanness and the hypocrisy of those Methodist officials, I hav to say, unknowing of my Abolitionism, they had, years before, published and sold three works that I wrote at their request, and for which they paid me a liberal price. One was entitled "Biblical Institutes;" another, "History of the United States," and the third, "History of South America." And, after advertising and selling these books, when the book agents found out that I was an Abolitionist, they at once struck each of my books from their list of publications forever.

But that sermon of mine entitled "Christian Love" was published (without my name) by John S. Taylor, and copies of it sent to all the Methodist papers in the country. Whereupon it was twice highly commended by the Christian Advocate and Journal, at the Methodist book-rooms. And I hav now before me a string of these Methodist commendations, pasted on a strip of paper two feet in length, and some of them uttered only because the editor did not know who the author of "Christian Love" was. But manifestly no "bad odor" attached to the name of Daniel Wise, at the Methodist headquarters, to prevent Methodists from indorsing his plagiarism or dubbing him as a "devil damned."

Chainey's Spiritualism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It seems to me that it is Spiritualism, instead of Materialism, that stands in need of a defense against the words and works of Mr. George Chainey.

It goes without saying that Materialism appreciates truth and virtue at their proper value, for the reason that the principal demand of that philosophy is that all goodness shall be sought out and followed because of its worth and beauty, and not on account of the praise and rewards we are to hav, either in this world or any other. And most all the Spiritualistic people I am acquainted with are intelligent and right-minded enough to agree with this grand and fundamental doctrin of Materialism, and to declare, as we do, that even if all life is to be utterly ended with to-morrow's sun, still truth and virtue are just as worthy of joyful devotion and enthusiastic upholding as if we were to liv forever and ever to enjoy sweet recompenses.

But now comes Mr. Chainey in the last TRUTH SEEKER. Speaking as a Spiritualist, he asks: "But what is fame or honor worth when the end of it all is to make a banquet of worms? Why sweat and groan to be remembered when we can remember no more? How great the chance anyway is it, even if we do our best, that anyone will wreathe a garland of praise around our memory or our name with the lips of love?"

It strikes me that this is a direct denial, and in the orthodox fashion, too, of the great truth that virtue is worthy of being followed for virtue's sake alone, and also that Mr. Chainey is asserting this low-lived appreciation of goodness as the accepted Spiritualistic standard. I bel eve this to be a base slander upon Spiritualism, the great majority of those people esteeming truth and virtue just as highly as we Materialists do, and I respectfully request all earnest believers in the spiritual world to correct me if I am wrong in denouncing these utterances of Mr. Chainey, and thereby restrain me from what I shall, if not so corrected, continually assert, viz., that the lamentable condition of Mr. Chainey in the matter of regard for morality, is a shocking exception, and not the general rule among Spiritualists, and that there are but very few of them who are so devoid of decency as to really think, with George Chainey, that our estimation of work for goodness ought to be dependent upon the "fame and honor," the "remembrance," or "the garlands of praise," we might thereby obtain. Such virtue as that is not even skin deep.

Orderly Anarchy.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am studying Proudhon, who in France has initiated, I believe, the systematic conception of orderly anarchy, and whom Mr. Tucker, of Liberty, acknowledges as his teacher. Noticing in your late issue a disposition to investigate this subject, I hav supposed that the following extracts from "L'Idée generale de la Révolution," might be welcome. My omissions and interpositions will be evident.

ADMINISTRATION POLICE.

"As we stand to-day, nothing would be more generally repudiated as improper, sacrilegious, encroaching on the rights of reason and conscience, than a government which, usurping the domain of faith, should pretend to regulate the spiritual duties of its subjects. Even Christians would regard such a tyranny as intolerable. Insurrection or else martyrdom would challenge its authority." The church, or constituted religion, has on its part always been disposed to arrogate and cumulate secular authority, has never ceded it in principle, and in fact, only to resistance by force, provoked by its abuses, as in the Papal See, the last emancipated of European states. In the Sandwich Islands, the Presbyterian church still exercises a similar tyranny, builds fortunes on the ruin of the nativs, and harnesses them like beasts to its vehicles of travel. After divorcing itself from the church, as in the French republic and the German empire, the state invokes the church's alliance to keep the people in subjection, and, without believing its doctrins, shares tribute with it. By supporting it directly, as in England, France, etc.; or indirectly, as in the United States, by exempting church property from taxation, enforcing idleness upon the Sabbath, etc., the state panders to the authority of the church, and these two powers form with capital a triumvirate. The logic of authority, the governmental principle, requires such reunion, such alliance. "The church, on its side, when it loses the direction of temporal affairs, is no longer heeded as to spiritual; while the state, appealing only to force for resolving material issues, loses the respect of peoples, and provokes reprobation. Wherefore, state and church, convinced at the eleventh hour of their indivisibility, endeavor to reunite in defiance. We must organize the economic forces and giv the constitution of property."

We must fuse, immerse, dissolve the political or governmental system in the economic, by reducing, simplifying, decentralizing, suppressing, one after another, all the cog-wheels of that great machine called government or the state.

Postponing to another work, the religious, moral, philosophical, literary, and artistic aspect of this new order, we confine ourselvs here to the economic.

Imagin the people saying to its delegates: I want the revolution peaceable, but complete, prompt, and decisiv. To the actual oppression and misery, let an order of prosperity and liberty succeed. For the political constitution, substitute an organization of the economic forces. Let man and citizen, instead of being bound to society by any tie of subordination and obedience, be allied only by free contract. I want you to use those very institutions that I charge you to abolish, along with principles of right which you will hav to elaborate, in such fashion that the new society shall appear as the spontaneous, natural, and necessary development of the old one.

To the people, thus enlightened upon its true interests, I reply, without pretending to anything absolute, exclusiv, or complete, by the following plan:

Here follows the chapter, "National Bank," which I do not translate, because in part of technical language unsuited to the general reader, but more especially because written in view of the Bank of France, its special constitution, and its actual relations to the French people (1851). Its adaptation to the United States at this time would exceed the liberties of translation. The adaptation required has moreover been made by Col. Green in his excellent pamphlet, which the reader may procure from the office of Liberty, Box 3366, Boston, for 25 cents.

BIBLE QUESTIONS. ASK YOUR MINISTER TO GIV YOU HONEST ANSWERS.

Why did God bless and set apart as holy the seventh day? (Ex. xx, 11.)

Will the reason given in Ex. xx, 11 apply to any other day?

Please giv chapter and verse where God blessed or sanctified or commanded us to keep holy Sunday or first day?

Has God ever taken away the blessing which he put on the seventh day and transferred it to Sunday, the first day?

Did not God speak the fourth commandment with his own lips? (Ex. xx, 1.) And did he not declare, "My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips?" (Psalms, lxxxix, 34.)

Does not Christ indorse this? (Nath. v, 17–19.)

Does the New Testament ever call the first day holy?

Does the New Testament ever apply the name, Sabbath, to the first day?

As the New Testament declares there is no transgression where there is no law (Rom. iv, 15; 1 John iii, 4), will you please state what sin is committed by working on Sunday?

If the name, Sabbath, was no longer applied to Sunday—but it should always simply be called "first day," as it is in the Bible—would not Sunday soon lose all its sacredness in the minds of the people?

Was it not a wicked perversion of scripture, by the Roman Catholic church, to take the name, Sabbath, from the seventh day and giv it to Sunday?

Since there is no authority for keeping Sunday—save the holy Roman Catholic church (see Catholic catechism)—are not the pope's Sunday-keepers God's Sabbath-breakers?

Is not Sunday-keeping, which is founded only on the traditions of the Catholic church, very wicked since it makes the commandments of God of none effect? (Mark, vii, 7–13.)

Let every member of the League write out copies of these questions, or select a few of them; add a kind, respectful request for immediate answers; inclose stamped, addressed envelope, and send to each minister in their vicinity.

Ask these questions, in a spirit of gentleness, of Christian friends; and request them to ask answers from their ministers. This will create a furor of excitement on the question among Christians themselvs. The answers of the ministers, even of the same denomination, will flatly contradict each other, and thus expose the injustice and unwarranted dictation of the church in securing passage of Sunday laws. Honest-hearted Christians will begin to think for themselvs, and finding this most cherished point of their faith is not founded on truth, realize need to study facts in regard to other points of belief. Liberal literature and lecturers would soon be in demand. Try it.

Points Probably Known, But Not Stated.

Monsignor Capel lectured to a very large audience at the cathedral in this city last Sunday night. He argued that the church's influence in politics was a valuable and conservativ one, because it taught that, while presidents were chosen by the people, yet their authority to rule came from God, and was to be respected, unless abused, because it was God-given. The six thousand priests in America, by their obedience to their spiritual superiors, set a model example to Americans to be an orderly and law-abiding people: Priests, he said, voted always as their conscience dictated, but they were not free to seek to influence the votes of their parishioners. As a body of religious teachers, they had stood almost as a man apart from politics. It must be ever said to the glory of the Catholic church, the lecturer exclaimed, that her priests hav stood quiet at their posts during this white-heated political campaign, and, while doubtless feeling a deep personal interest in the struggle, hav never prostituted their position to any political power.

There is one fatal fault to be found with this expression of opinion—it is not true. Our president, according to the Declaration of Independence and our Constitution, gets his authority from the American people. If he got it from God, he must, according to the canons of the Catholic church, get it through an Italian gentleman known as the pope. Leo XIII. has exclusiv territorial rights in disbursing God-given authority. Priests, Mr. Capel also knows, not only vote but work as their spiritual superiors direct. And the Catholic people vote and work as the priests direct. In countries in which votes are permitted this has always been the rule—and it is the rule in this country to-day. Let Mr. Capel ask any well-informed, and honest, politician in this city how it is that John Kelly holds such absolute power over some 30,000 or 40,000 voters. The answer will be: Through his uncle, Cardinal McCloskey, who holds the ignorant Catholic population as securely as the priests hold their "consciences" by means of the confessional.

Monsignor Capel spoke against the public schools. From a careful inspection of the system in this country he said he found that it was surely destroying the dignity of labor by engendering contempt for it in the pupils. "Where," he said, "is your public school girl who will consent to be a servant-maid in your house; where is the schoolboy who will consent to be even a skilled laborer? Is it, then, surprising that the servant girls of this country should be chiefly Catholics? No Catholic is taught that labor is dishonorable. The Catholic servant girl does her work right nobly. Such labor to them is a labor of love. They find consolation in their religion."

Mr. Capel deceives no one by confining his grievance against the public schools to the pointless statement that in them is inculcated an aversion to labor. He would not be the chosen emissary of Rome did he believe it himself. The servant girls of this country are Catholics because only ignorance is satisfied to clean other people's kettles and floors and clothes for a living. And as a class, the Catholic servant girls are thriftless, wasteful, dirty, and dishonest, caring nothing for their employer's interests, but only for their own lazy, impudent existence. Their labor is entirely a labor of necessity—a necessity of their own to work or starve, and a necessity on the part of the employer to hav some one to scrub and wash.

Monsignor Capel further insisted that the Catholic church was the only power that could successfully solve the terrible problem of the harmonization of the relations of capital and labor, which was soon to confront the American people. It would require but little to stir the workingman to rage as he saw on every hand fortunes built up by his toil absorbed by others without receiving a just compensation himself. The public schools of America would go on wafting abroad the same miserable result of imparting a dislike for labor and a fondness for speculation that would but intensify this evil and injustice to the laborer. The Catholic churches, on the other hand, taught him to be law-abiding by showing him that his reward was that heaven which the man who grew rich by the laborer's toil could reach only with the greatest difficulty.

In this he stated the position of the church, which is to every intelligent workingman the most cogent reason for not accepting Christianity. Believing that his life is to be endured in just the condition he is in, because God placed him here in that condition, the laborer soons becomes a mere animal, eating and drinking, doing as little as he can to pay for it, and desiring only to so liv that he will get to heaven. He makes such intellectual efforts only as are necessary to obey his priest, and becomes in every way a fit companion for the cattle he livs among. The condition of the peasantry of Europe in exclusivly Catholic times is universally conceded to hav been brutal in the extreme. They were loyal to "God" and the Catholic church, but fearfully disloyal to themselvs and their own welfare. In proportion as they became emancipated from superstition they ascended in the social scale. Capel seems desirous of seeing them retrace these steps. His sermon was an insult to the workingman.

The Social Feature Necessary in Liberal Work.

The seventh Congress of the League, held at Milwaukee, adopted a few amendments to the League constitution which are of the highest importance in the permanent organization of Freethought. The reproach has frequently been urged against our movement that it is disintegrating in tendency, and consequently would never cohere with strength sufficient to successfully battle the church. It is true in a measure that the strong individuality which leads men and women to withdraw from long established institutions, which they hav been taught to regard as necessary as the state, also makes them impatient of any new restraining force. Any organization which in any way hampers their actions or free associations will not be tolerated for a moment.

The League, however, is not open to this objection. The effect of charters as auxiliary Leagues is "simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them thn lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselvs." The object which must hold the Leagues together, then, is solely devotion to a great principle—that of state secularization. The fires of patriotism must burn in every Leaguer's breast; loyalty to his country and its constitution, be his constant thought in politics; opposition to Christian tyranny must guide his every political action. He must be faithful, self-sacrificing, and true to the principles and tradition of our government, now so pertinaciously assailed by both the Catholic and Protestant priesthood.

With the most of us these sentiments are sufficient to bind us in a brotherhood stronger than the Catholic church. We may differ on every other subject under the sun, but on this question of liberty and equal rights for Freethinkers there is absolute and perfect unity. Without doubt there are hundreds of thousands of people in this country who are at one with us in this, and who would aid with presence and votes could they be brought into affiliation with the League. The main questions of Liberalism are already settled in their minds. They hav quit the church never to return. The husks she offers turn to ashes on their lips. They are disgusted with the pretensions of Christianity; its hell is a lie; its heaven a myth, and its theology as dry as a dictionary. Yet, somehow, they keep wandering into the churches, as a man strays back to old haunts, to see the people he has left, to hear the music, to enjoy the sociability of the meeting. Man is a gregarious animal. He must hav pleasant associations, and expressions of sentiment. Selkirk on his solitary island was the most unhappy person in the world, and he welcomed the coming of even a savage with heartfelt joy. There are thousands of sentimental and intellectual Selkirks in this country to-day, and that they may hav associations of pleasure they tolerate also the savagery of Christianity. If we could get these men and women into our ranks we should hav almost the ninety and nine of the country.

To accomplish this Liberals must do what the church has done; hold meetings often, and make them pleasant. This can be done in small cities, where there is little to attract people outside of the churches and traveling shows, with surprising ease, once the ball is set rolling. It was a knowledge of this, and in response to repeated demands for action in this direction, that induced the officers of the League to offer these amendments to the League constitution:

"FIRST, SOCIAL.

"Every auxiliary League is recommended to hold picnics, excursions, parties, dances, fairs, bazaars, sociables, etc., as often as they can make them pleasant and profitable. These social gatherings should be held on Sunday, whenever practicable.

"SECOND, EDUCATIV.

"1. Every auxiliary should commence the formation of a library and reading-room, either at its organization or as soon after as it can command the means to secure a few books, tracts, pamphlets, and copies of Liberal journals.

"2. Every auxiliary should hold a few stated League meetings on Sunday during the year—not necessarily every Sunday, but as often as speakers can be procured, or interest kept up.

"3. Every auxiliary, where ten or more children can be got together, should establish a Liberal Sunday-school, and take every means to instruct, amuse, and interest children.

"4. Every auxiliary should develop, instruct, and utilize whatever musical talent may be found in its members, and avail themselvs of music, as far as possible, to make their meetings interesting and their Sunday-schools attractiv.

"THIRD, PROVIDENT.

"1. Every auxiliary should make every effort, by standing committees or otherwise, to keep all its members employed—see to it that every member has work and pay enough for it to giv him a comfortable support. To this end, those out of employment should giv notice to the officers of his auxiliary, and hav his wants stated at its meetings and posted on bulletins in its halls. If these are not effectiv, then to advertise them in the League organs and Liberal papers. On the other hand, those wishing to employ labor should first giv notice in the same way at the local League meetings or in the papers, before employing elsewhere. And generally, Leaguers should see to it and take special pains to keep League men and women employed, particularly those who hav been discharged for their Liberal sentiments.

"2. Every auxiliary, when the number of members is sufficient, should require payment of each member on joining, and periodically afterwards, enough to make a benefit fund in which each member shall share by weekly appropriations, whenever he or she is sick, out of employment, or otherwise disabled from work.

"FOURTH, CO-OPERATIV.

"Every auxiliary is recommended to take subscriptions from its members to form a co-operativ fund with which to buy clothing, provisions, tools, and general merchandise at wholesale, on the lowest terms; and then at its stated meetings, or oftener at special meetings, divide or dispose of its goods so purchased, to its members at cost, or at the least advance per cent beyond cost that will cover loss or incidental expenses in addition to the original cost of purchase."

It is, at present, not possible for every League to start a library or found a labor bureau or benefit fund, but it is possible to be social, and to hav sociables at which pleasant people can enjoy themselvs without being troubled by an opening prayer, or having their pleasures dulled by along-faced dominie, disturbed by a haunting fear that by finishing the last quadrille and breaking into the Sabbath a few moments, they are ruining their immortal souls unless they set the clock back.

As an instance of the value of sociability as a missionary aid, we may relate the experiences of a League in this city. When first founded it had a membership of some forty. Regularly every fortnight it met for a lecture and discussion. Two-thirds of the members were young people. Gradually they got tired of so much philosophy, and their remarks were about the same as one hears from the careless, if not heretical, young members of a church. Soon the attendance fell off, and the leaders were disheartened. The idea of getting up a "good time" was suggested and acted upon. One of the leaders gave a party. His spacious parlors were filled by the members and their friends. In the fore part of the evening, the wise men talked sound sense to the youths and maidens, and then left the floor open for fun. A leader of revelry was chosen, and the sociable was a pronounced success. One League member also had an "eye to business," and before the evening's entertainment was over, nearly all the friends of the members and the friends of the friends were members also. Three entertainments of this kind ran the League membership up to considerably over a hundred, and never was a meeting held without some outsiders getting indoctrinated with Freethought principles. Circumstances scattered the leaders of the League; suitable parlors were not available, and to-day it would be only by the blessings of fortuitous circumstances, or under the stress of another "sociable," that a quorum could be got together.

There are some who oppose organization because it costs money, but was ever any desirable object attained without costing money? Our Revolutionary war cost money and blood. The abolition of physical slavery cost money and more blood. Can we hope that the destruction of mental slavery will be accomplished without costing money? In ages past the right to freely think on religious matters has been bought with tears and agony, and heretics martyred amid flame and carnage. It is only a few short months since the last victim of Christian hate emerged from a prison cell. Let us count ourselvs lucky if we can now purchase freedom to think and equal rights for ourselvs and children by the expenditure of a few dollars. But, it is urged, Christians organize, and ask for money. Are we not opposed to the church and her methods? And we might retort, Christians eat; shall Freethinkers then starve? Organization is almost as necessary to a healthy life as eating. Between starving physically and intellectually there is but little choice. Selkirk might well hav contemplated suicide as he wandered up and down the desolate shore of his island prison. A solitary Freethinker may be intellectual monarch of all he surveys in his town, but unless he finds congenial companionship he is likely to go back to the fleshpots of the church for social food. As Freethinkers, we are not opposed to the good use the church makes of its organization—its charities or its colleges—but to its abuse of the power derived from the co-operation of its members. The devil can best be fought with fire. To make headway against entrenched tyranny, there must be armies well disciplined, alert, and courageous. "Make way for liberty," cried Winkelried as he gathered the spearheads to his heart, but what good would his heroic sacrifice hav done had he not been supported by a devoted band? The League may engage the enemy at every point, but without numbers to support it defeat is as certain as death.

Organization of Freethought is the one thing that will save our country from coming under the domination of ecclesiasticism. "I would like to buy some Paine's 'Age of Reason' to keep in stock," writes a Canadian bookseller, "but what is the use of ordering them? I can't get them through the custom house; they will be confiscated and burnt." And this in a free country, and in a land supposed to be civilized! Do we not need an organization that costs money? If the Freethinkers of Canada will supply the means, we hav no doubt that the officers of the National Liberal League will soon get the "Age of Reason" through the custom house that blocks the port of entry from which our friend writes, and then his customers can read what they choose. Organization we must hav, and it must be permanent, or the enemy will rally the moment vigilance relaxes. To be permanent, it must provide for all the wants of the people, that they may not stray away beyond the reach of liberty's voice. The church must be superseded by an educativ, rational, and tolerant organization. Such an organization must grow through social as well as political means. Social life must be the poetry and music, the sentiment of our movement. The church has reared us midst rites and pomp, and while we would not imitate her ostentation, nor build cathedrals vast and dim, we yet can utilize, as she has done, the desire for sympathetic companionship which is in every breast. Social life also attracts the women, and the importance of attracting them cannot be over-estimated. It is true that many come to us from pure love of intellectual exercise, and become Freethinkers solely because of the unreasonableness of Christianity, but there are thousands not educated to do their own thinking, who prefer to hav their ways directed by husbands, fathers, brothers, or lovers. As their ways are directed, that will be the road of the next generation. Our religion is the love and cherishing of humanity; we must, therefore, work for those who are to come after us. Social life is strength; isolation is death. It is dreary living alone on the top of a tower. Now that it has no martyrs in prison, Liberalism should regenerate society so that it may never hav another. We must extend its area, and multiply its relations; and we shall be the gainers, as well as those brought to us by our activity.

Col. Ingersoll Did Not Say It.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In your paper of the 18th inst., I find the following:

"'Why do you not return East and work for Blaine?' Judge Ryan, of the Treasury Department at San Francisco, asked Col. Ingersoll the other day. And this was the answer of the man who eight years ago dubbed Blaine the plumed knight. Hear him: 'While I havn't eulogized the gods as much as some, I hav never and never will defend the devil.'—Ex."

I write simply to say that there is no truth in this story. I never said any such thing.

Yours truly, R. G. Ingersoll.

Chico Springs, New Mexico, Oct. 26, 1884.

Editorial Notes.

In its zeal to help its presidential candidate, the Church Union violated the postal laws by sending campaign documents wrapped up in its pages at pound rates. The kingdom of God is for such people as serve Christ and cheat the government!

When Mr. Remsburg lectured in Grand Rapids, Mich., last winter, he made a lasting impression upon the editor of the German American, Mr. Hammerschlag, and the result is now seen in the publication of good Freethought editorials in that paper. Thus the good seed sprouts and grows. Keep our missionaries busy, and the whole country will soon feel the effect.

The opposition to the League is about narrowed down to a free religious paper, a free-love paper, and a free property, or, to use the words of Proudhon, a "property-is-robbery" paper, and the Christian press generally. If these journals will go on about their several missions, and let the League alone to do its work, there will be peace and harmony all around.

C. B. Reynolds, chairman of the Executiv Committee of the National Liberal League, will lecture before the Newark Liberal League on Sunday, Nov. 9th, at 3 o'clock P.M. Subject, "Why I Left the Pulpit." Friday evening, the 14th inst., he will speak at the Manhattan Liberal Club on "National Liberal League Secularization through Organization." Mr. Reynolds is a live orator, witty, dramatic, and eloquent, and deserves to hav large audiences.

The Unitarian Church Directory and Missionary Handbook puts the Index, of Boston, among the Unitarian organs. The Index feebly squirms and mildly squeaks that this "can be a true classification only on the basis of a very broad definition of the Unitarian movement—broader than any Unitarian organization has ever made." Yet we do not see why the paper should hav taken the trouble to say even so much, since its senior editor is an activ Unitarian preacher of the most narrow sort.

Miss Helen H. Gardener's chastisment of the Hon. Washington Gladden was offered to the magazine originally printing Mr. Gladden's paper, but was refused by the editor for "lack of space." It givs us great pleasure to make public the mistakes of Christ, as pointed out by Washington Gladden, through the mediumship of the vigorous pen of Miss Gardener. Doubtless the editor of the Century will also be pleased that we make room for a criticism which only "lack of space" prevented his printing.

At a recent meeting of the Birmingham branch of the "Church of England Zenana Missionary Society," a speaker stated that "one of the chief difficulties that had to be encountered was the effect of the introduction of a considerable amount of Infidel literature into the country every year. Thousands of publications of all kinds were sent from England to India during the course of the twelve months. One society alone circulated 33 books written by Bradlaugh, 9 by Mrs. Besant, 16 by Ingersoll, 14 by Foote, and others by people of that class."

We are glad to see that, notwithstanding the severe polemical encounter Mr. Charles Watts had at his recent lecture in Dunnville with a Baptist minister, the local press speaks so highly of our first vice-president. The Gazette says: "Mr. Watts is a good reasoner, deep thinker, and a fluent speaker, and even if his views be not accepted his arguments will at least afford food for thought and investigation." The Reform Press remarks: "Mr. Charles Watts is a man of superior ability, long experience in the lecture field, and handled his subject ('Christianity; Its Claims Examined') very ingeniously, endeavoring to prove that Christianity was of human instead of divine origin."

Mr. E. H. Heywood sends us the following petition (copies of which can be obtained from him at Princeton, Mass.), now in circulation in Boston:

"To the Senate and House of Representativs in Congress assembled: We, the undersigned, Citizens of ——, holding with Daniel Webster that 'the true office of government is to protect Persons and Property from invasion;' knowing that questions of religion, morals, and opinion are matters of Individual Liberty in Right, and opposing all phases of Censorship which violate Freedom of Conscience, Speech, the Press and the Mails guaranteed in fundamental law, respectfully request of your Honorable Bodies the immediate and unconditional Repeal of the Act of July 12, 1876, Chap. 186, page 90, known as the Comstock statute."

This petition, says Mr. Heywood, "is entirely an individual affair, nowise interfering with the chosen work of the Liberal League or any other association." "It is headed" he adds, "by Elizur Wright, and signed by Walter C. Wright, Horace Seaver, J. P. Mendum, Isaac B. Rich, Luther Colby, Dr. H. B. Storer, Dr. J. L. Newman, J. Storer Cobb, and other leading Liberals here." And Mr. Heywood may add, in the boldest characters he can pen, The Truth Seeker. Not until the pope makes the White House his headquarters will we recognize the right of Congress to enact unconstitutional laws.

We hav been compelled to lay aside several letters from correspondents containing advice about how to vote, received too late for publication before the election, and which lose their point now that the election is over. In connection with this subject it may be appropriate to remark that The Truth Seeker has been charged with political unfairness in six distinct specifications, as follows: 1. In that it has given aid and comfort to the supporters of James G. Blaine; 2. In that it has favored the election of Grover Cleveland; 3. In that it has advocated the fitness of B. F. Butler for the presidential chair; 4. In that it has attacked the said James G. Blaine in a scurrilous manner; 5. In that it has aided and abetted the defamation of the character of the said Grover Cleveland; 6. In that it has opposed the election of B. F. Butler aforementioned. To all of which The Truth Seeker pleads "Not Guilty," and recommends itself to the mercy of the court.

In closing nearly three columns of rather wild criticism of Col. Ingersoll, the League, Mr. Watts, Rev. James K. Applebee, the Investigator, Mr. Wakeman, an unnamed Western gentleman, and The Truth Seeker and its editor, Mr. E. C. Walker says:

"In conclusion—(1) the one constitutional object of the League is the separation of church and state, this (2) including the protection of persecuted Freethinkers and, as a necessary means to that end, (3) the repeal of all laws punishing the citizen for any choice he may make in the selection of his reading matter. The first proposition is affirmed by the League, Mr. Applebee, and myself, and denied by Mr. Macdonald, who asserts that the protection of Freethinkers is an object of the League, but distinct from that of secularization. The second proposition is affirmed by me; denied, as per preceding paragraph, by Mr. Macdonald; denied, inferentially but surely, by the League as now constituted, and denied unreservedly by Mr. Applebee. Third proposition, that of repeal, is denied by Mr. Applebee distinctly, and as distinctly affirmed by me, and is denied by the League, and through his unqualified support of the League by Mr. Macdonald. However, Mr. Macdonald demands the repeal of national statutes of this nature, as do many other members of the League, but they are nearly all muzzled for fear of offending the Modifiers, who are supposed to be about ready to play the part of returning prodigal sons."

To save Mr. Walker any further mental exertion in this direction, we will restate our opinion of the object of the League, which is, to effect the complete separation of church and state; and pending the accomplishment of this, to defend Freethinkers persecuted for their Freethought opinions. We cannot help thinking, however, that had friend Walker been as anxious to do justice to all the parties he mentions as he is to make a seeming point against them (though what his points amount to when made we cannot see), he need not hav consumed so much space in sophistical quibbles.

Lectures and Meetings.

From this date E. C. Walker's address will be Valley Falls, Kansas, Box 42. He enters the lecturing and canvassing field November 17th.

W. F. Jamieson, Pipestone, Minn., is rapidly filling up his time with lecture engagements. He will lecture in Seward, Nebraska, Nov. 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th. Liberals of Nebraska are invited to correspond with him in reference to engaging him for the remainder of November. Address him at Pipestone, Minn.

The Liberals and Freethinkers of Rochester and vicinity will meet in convention in that city, Sunday, Nov. 9th, in the Knights of Labor Hall, No. 7 South St. Paul street, at which time steps will be taken to organize a League, as there is no Liberal organization at present in Rochester. Professor T. Pope, of Rochester; Mr. F. G. Sleaster, of Lockport; Professor H. O. Sommers, and other able speakers will be present to address the meeting, and an enjoyable time is anticipated. There will be three sessions during the day, at 10 A.M. and 2 and 7 P.M. Friends from adjoining towns are cordially invited. H. O. Sommers is secretary.

The Spiritualists and Liberalists of Van Buren and adjoining counties will hold their next quarterly meeting at Marcellus, Cass county, Mich., on the Grand Trunk Railroad, commencing Saturday, Nov. 15th, at 3 o'clock P.M., and continuing over Sunday. C. A. Andrus, of Grand Rapids, Mich., and Mrs. Olie C. Denslow, of South Bend, Ind., will be the speakers. Mrs. Denslow will furnish inspirational, vocal, and instrumental music for the occasion, and will giv psychometric readings from the rostrum to parties desiring them. A good attendance is expected. E. L. Warner, of Paw Paw, Mich., is secretary, and L. S. Burdick, of Kalamazoo, Mich., is president.

The Wisconsin State Association of Spiritualists will hold its next meeting in St. Andrew's Hall, 406 Grand Avenue, Milwaukee, on the 5th, 6th, and 7th of December, 1884. Speakers, Professor A. B. French, of Ohio; John E. Remsburg, of Kansas; Wm. M. Lockwood, of Ripon, Wis. The Cross Concert Troupe, who gave such universal satisfaction at our last meeting, will furnish the music for this. All Liberals and Freethinkers are invited. The Chicago & Northwestern, Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, Lake Shore, Wisconsin Central, and Milwaukee & Northern railroads will return for one-fifth fare all persons paying full fare to the meeting. Program: Friday evening, lecture by J. E. Remsburg. Saturday forenoon, general conference. Saturday afternoon, lecture by J. E Remsburg; subject, "Superstition." Saturday evening, lecture by Professor A. B. French; subject, "Prehistoric America." Sunday, 10:30 A.M., lecture by J. E. Remsburg; subject, "False Claims." Sunday, 2:30 P.M., lecture by Professor Wm. M. Lockwood; subject, "Spiritualism of Science." Sunday evening, lecture by Professor A. B. French; subject, "Spiritualism Compared with Materialism." Each session to be preceded by a conference of one hour, to be interspersed with music by the Cross Concert Troupe. A few will be entertained free. Board and lodging at Collins House, 414 and 416 Broadway, 75 cents per day. Admission each session, 15 cents. The secretary is Dr. J. C. Phillips, and Wm. M. Lockwood, of Omro, Wis., is president.

Letters from Friends.

NEWPORT, ME., Oct. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose 50 cents, for which send me 25 cents' worth of TRUTH SEEKERS of Oct. 18th, and 25 cents' worth of "Ingersoll Catechised." Let me ask if Remsburg's "Bible Morals" is to be put in pamphlet form. If so, I shall want copies of it. It is a very important paper, and ought to be put into the hands of many millions.

And now a word to the editor. In the editorial of Oct. 25th, entitled, "A Symbol of the Lowest of Things," you call it "worship of the most disgusting kind." If I correctly understand the original meaning of the "cross," it was meant to represent the reproductiv organs, and was carried in the shape of a cross and put over the church doors, and Mr. Bennett so stated in his travels around the world.

What I wish to know is, Does the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER feel that any part of the human body is "disgusting?" It may be that I do not understand you.

A word in another direction. In the same paper, on the first page, you quote a resolution from the Word, with some editorial remarks. If I understand Mr. Heywood, he means to say that the Liberal League made an unconditional surrender of a very vital principle, viz., the repeal of the infamous Comstock laws. I hav watched this subject from the first with great interest, and the surrender of the League to the government has been a very humiliating one.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

[Mr. Remsburg's "Bible Morals" will be published in pamphlet form immediately, at the low price of twenty-five cents singly, six for a dollar, and special rates for larger quantities.

The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER never said that any portion of the human body is disgusting. But if Mr. Mitchell has knowledge of the religion in which the prototype of the cross played the important part, he knows that the religion was disgusting.

We are glad Mr. Mitchell is able to translate the Word. The question he raises can best be answered by the secretary of the League. We quote from the Investigator of the 22d ult.:

THE PRESENT POSITION OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE AS TO THE QUESTION OF REPEAL OR MODIFICATION.

MR. EDITOR: There seems to be a misapprehension in the minds of some as to the nature of the declaration of the late Congress of the League. I will state what I think was clearly in the minds of all those who participated in that Congress.

The Congress specially declared that the Nine Demands of Liberalism, as adopted in Philadelphia in 1876, should hereafter be the basis of union, and should define our mission as Freethinkers and reformers.

What is the meaning of this declaration? It means that beyond the Nine Demands, the League is committed to no particular political action. Each member is left to his own personal judgment. Therefore, whoever joins the League and partakes in its action, commits himself only to the Nine Demands—that is, to state secularization.

On the question, therefore, of repeal or modification, the League now stands where the original Congress of 1876 stood. It leaves the question open for its members to decide according to their private judgment as to the wisest method by which the rights of Freethought can be maintained. On this question Liberals are divided. It is a question that involves in its settlement principles that go beyond the scope of the Nine Demands. The League cannot, therefore, declare in favor of either repeal or modification.

It is objected that there was no rescinding resolution at the late Congress; and because one Congress has declared in favor of repeal, therefore the League is permanently committed to this policy.

This is not so. The voice of one Congress is not the voice of a succeeding Congress, and unless the resolutions of a previous Congress are reaffirmed by a succeeding Congress, they do not stand as the voice of the League. This is the express declaration by resolution of the League itself. It says that "resolutions heretofore or hereafter passed by the annual Congress of the League are no test of fellowship in the League, but simply express the sentiments of those voting for them, and of the particular Congress of which they are a majority."

These words very plainly declare that the League is not now committed to the policy of repeal, and therefore both those who are in favor of repeal, and those who are in favor of modification, can now harmoniously work together. Experience shows that there is an honest difference of opinion in this matter, but that does not prevent an entire unity of action on the basis of the Nine Demands. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM,
Secretary of the National Liberal League.

55 East 9th street, New York.

We hope our friend is satisfied with the position of the League, for it leaves him free, as a member of the League, to work with THE TRUTH SEEKER for repeal, or with Mr. Gordon for modification.—ED. T. S.]

THIS FROM A WOMAN!

BRADFORD, PA., Oct. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am much amused at the ludicrous mistake in the lengthy reply of Mr. Watts to the paragraph or two which I thank you for quoting from my letter; but as I am no believer in vicarious atonement, I would not make a scapegoat of any poor "him" to bear my sins. When Mr. Watts likened what I said of him to "a thunder-storm in a thimble," he "spoke wiser than he knew."

If I tossed back some of the turf and stones he tore up about that "donated" ground, I am heartily glad if they hit him; as it is evident they did. There is Eva Barnes to scrape lint for his wounds. Perhaps if you had given him the entire letter he might hav discerned for himself that I was neither a "Mr." nor a Spiritualist, and so hav been spared the wasting of so many "holy pokers and sacred tongs" upon a woman.

If I indulged in "graphic descriptiv language," and hedged myself in by figures of speech, I believe I did not make use of such elegant slang as the above.

Being always an intuitiv believer in a future life, I needed no phenomena to confirm me. I simply find them interesting, that is all; especially the inspirational speaking of the most gifted women, which is as far above anything in Mr. Watts's or Mr. McCormick's line as heaven is above earth.

"Friendship with all, entangling alliances with none," therefore I am not a member of any association or organization, save the "National Woman Suffrage Association," and do not propose to be, till woman ceases to exist as a serf among all nations and in all lands.

Mr. Watts forgets, or falsifies, when he denies saying that "Woman should not invade man's domain." There were other women who noted it, and whom it offended. I see by his professed "substance of reply to Mr. Chainey," which is chiefly a baseless argument for or assertion of Materialism, that he "would open all spheres of activity to woman." Probably that implies the blessed privilege of washing his dirty shirt and socks in some back-yard or area, rather than her political freedom, which is the mooted question in England just now. He ought to be "proud" of me, if the Spiritualists are not, as my great-grandfather was a British officer, killed in Canada in the battle upon the Hights, or Plains, of Abraham—which is it? I never can remember, only that the "crown" is squandering our fortune.

It was pretty to taunt Mr. Chainey with "Mr. Oliver's" doings. One would suppose he met "a foeman worthy of his steel" by the way he lavished unlimited space and choice epithets. His commiseration, and offers of "material help"—spiritual being beyond his power, good, bad, or indifferent—are all thrown away upon a woman's rights woman. Let them be reserved for some possible "he" who is addicted to "spirituous substances." I am sorry he got so "little beef and ale" at the camp, and would advise the Spiritualists to roast a whole ox and hav a regular barbecue next time, and furnish forth at least a tankard of ale, that he may not make mincemeat, like "twenty tigers," of any "effeminate" brother. It is only too true that many men in this iron, material age need to hav their surplus masculinity emasculated, as woman needs to be raised from her subjected excessiv femininity to hights she has never yet attained, and so furnish to the world a race superior to any it ever saw. If Mr. Watts would study his "own best poets," Tennyson and Browning, a little more, and his Materialistic authors and tendencies a little less, he would attain a better balance of his intellectual powers, and come, perhaps, to see that "there are more things in heaven and earth than his philosophy dreams of."

This is the counsel of a woman who, if not "old enough to be his mother," yet has mature sons, claiming her youngest darling on this, his thirtieth birthday, just as much, being a glorious butterfly in the happy land, the beautiful beyond, as if he were still, with all his sex, but an earth-grub in this.

Having never eaten an "unripe fruit," in the chaste language of Mr. Watts, she is not subject to "bilious attacks," simply to fits of "righteous indignation," at all injustice, oppression, and wrong theories as well as wrong doing; and deliberately proposes to barb her only weapon of defense—mark you, defense—in all just causes, and while taking the responsibility, cheerfully takes with it, also, the consequences.

I hav but one last word to all Materialists. If their monstrous doctrin be true, they had best destroy all women first, and then fall to and kill each other, like a parcel of Kilkenny cats, letting the poor old earth roll on in peace.

LEWISE OLIVER.

POMONA, CAL., Oct. 15, 284.

MR. EDITOR: The greatest living orator, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, delivered his popular lecture, "Orthodoxy," in Los Angeles on the 8th inst., in Childs's Opera House, to the largest and most select audience ever convened in the city of "Angels." Long before the time appointed for the speaker to appear, every available space in that spacious building was occupied until there was no standing room left, and hundreds who applied late for admission, were denied, and, possibly, many of them are now seeking at the door of their respectiv churches, with the torments of theological hell burning in their bosoms, hoping that the parson who started it may be able by some new revelation, or the interpretation of some old one, to cool him off; when, if he could only hav heard Ingersoll, he could ever after liv happily and die without fear.

An incident occurred at this lecture worthy of note. As the colonel appeared before his audience, one of God's cranks arose near the stage and interrupted the speaker by saying, "Mr. Ingersoll, I hav a message from Almighty God," at the same time extending his hand toward Ingersoll, in which he held a large envelope, insisting that the colonel should receive it. The colonel told the special agent to sit down, but he would not down. Cries of, "Put him out!" came from all parts of the house. As soon as the speaker could be heard, he said "that if there was a God, he showed little wisdom in selecting his messengers." The crank was yanked out by the police, and marched off to the "cooler." The lecture was concluded without further interruption, save the hearty applause given the speaker when he "fired his heaviest shots at the phantoms of the skies."

It is humiliating to the intelligence of the age to witness the position of the press the day following Ingersoll's lecture; they invariably took the side of the phantom as against reason, logic, and common sense, as applied to the prevailing religions of the day. All their notices of Ingersoll and his lecture were strained efforts to belittle him and his intelligence, thereby prejudicing the ignorant believer and stimulating the faith of the faithful. It shows that in matters of religion the brain of the country editor has not advanced one notch in a century; that he has remained in statu quo. Their articles reflect all their superstition, and none of their acquired sense; the slavery to the creeds compels them to insult the intelligent reader that they may be in harmony with the church. But we hav hope for the future of mankind, for he will be governed by the force of logic and philosophy. We must follow where they lead. Reason will right error in its triumphant march. Science is fast lopping off the barnacles from the religious mind. The superstitions, follies, and fallacies of the past are being made apparent to the ordinary mind. The tenacity with which the parson has held on in the past to error, is perceptibly yielding to the facts of to-day. He is letting go little by little, as science forces him, until his sanctified feet begin to touch solid foundation—the earth. He will soon become useful here; he will soon begin to construct a heaven worth living in and for; he is losing sight of his cherished mythical heaven and once-useful hell for the better view that meets his gaze now; his eyes begin to weary of the far-off look that has so long marked his features; he begins to feel tired of the unprofitable toil; his brain has been overworked for the good it has brought; he needs rest, and so do the people, from his useless labor. In view of all this, he is too expensiv a luxury to further continue the manufacture of him. Let us wear out the old article beyond repairs, and "catch on" to the teacher of science. H. L. SHAUG.

P. S.—Please find inclosed $7.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, to be sent to the addresses named. H. L. S.

HELENA, NEB., Oct. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Is it true that, as some of your correspondents assert, B. F. Butler is a tyrant? Naked assumption will not make those who know him believe any such stuff, nor will it hav any weight with the well-informed.

B. F. Butler a tyrant? Why, there was never a baser slander against living man. Tyrant: one who is cruel, despotic. Where has Butler at any time, either as a public servant or as a private citizen, been cruel or despotic? As an officer, was he cruel to his men? No. Did he act the part of a despot? Who says he did, speaks falsely. Do those who are in his employ suffer from cruel treatment? Not one. Mr. Editor, I speak by the card. I hav been there. I know of no officer in the army that used less tyranny over his men than B. F. Butler, and I knew several for a fact. Any one could see at a glance, by his very make-up, that there was nothing tyrannical about him. Some people are not wise enough to know the difference between sternness and tyranny, justice and despotism; and, perhaps, this may be the trouble with those who accuse Butler of being a tyrant. But I happen to know that Butler got all those pet names from traitors. They were published and put in circulation by traitors, and traitors still continue to peddle them out, and the only assistance they get is from consummate, ignorant dupes—dupes to traitor influence. So much for the "ignorant."

Now I wish to say a few words in regard to party. I remember in the days past and gone, when there was only the old Whig and Democrat parties in existence, of hearing some men trying to persuade a Scotchman, who had recently landed in this country, to "take out his papers so as to vote." His reply was that he did not think he had been here long enough to understand our system of government sufficient to vote intelligently, and wished to know what the difference was between the Whig and Democrat party. The answer was that there was no great national difference, but they only differed on some minor questions which were of no very great consequence. "If that be the case," he said, "I think you ought to hav a live party, one that will make honesty and equality an issue, and try to put your government upon its Declaration, that all men are created equal, etc., for the tendency of your government, or rather the powers that control your parties, is to overthrow your republican institutions, and destroy the liberties of the people." That was true, and all that saved us was the slave issue and the birth of a new party. The Republican and Democratic parties are the same to-day. Neither has a live issue. They are both controled by the same power. If one does or says a thing, the other does or says just as near like it as it possibly can, and the powers that control them are undermining our liberties more rapidly than they ever were before, and those who are supporting them to-day are either old fossils, dupes to party, or enemies to a republican form of government.

Respectfully, AN OLD SOLDIER.

MENOMONIE, WIS., Oct. 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: For the past year I hav exchanged my TRUTH SEEKER with a Mr. Warren, a true-hearted Liberal, for his Investigator, and then we hav given away our papers. How many wish to read them, and how many do not wish to subscribe for them! No wonder friend Chainey was discouraged at the lack of support to his paper.

Several friends, with myself, often hav talked of getting a Liberal speaker here, but a few would probaby hav to foot the bill. We had, a number of years ago, our good old friend William Denton lecturing nights on geology, and he sold a number of books. I sold ten copies of Paine's "Age of Reason." I hav twenty-seven names on the petition, and a friend has twenty-five. We hav American, German, and Norwegian Freethinkers, all scattered around for twenty miles.

I hav been a Freethinker since 1861. The Investigator was the electric light that illuminated my mind, and banished the devils, ghosts, and gods. Dear to my heart are the names of Denton, Ingersoll, Paine, Bennett, Mrs. Slenker, and Mrs. Rose, and hundreds of other writers for the papers and books. I think this winter we will try and get a lecturer to stop over a night or two. Menomonie has some four thousand inhabitants, some eighteen churches, and about the same number of saloons. MARTIN R. CHENEY.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COL., Oct. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, for which you may giv credit, and continue THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address. Thanking you for your leniency in continuing it for more than a year since my subscription expired, I hope I shall not put you to the necessity of trusting me again, as it is my wish to pay in advance. But the last year has been one of trials. Having lost a beautiful daughter, I hav thought very little about other matters; but I do not mourn as one who has no hope, for I know that she lives, and in due time I shall go to her. It is a consolation that all do not possess, but as I hav evidence of her daily presence, I know whereof I speak. I believe the time is not far distant when there will no longer remain a doubt in any mind, but all shall know the truth and receive the consolation which it brings to those who mourn their departed friends. I like your paper, for it is as it claims to be—Liberal. MRS. E. E. KIMBALL.

KENT, O., Oct. 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: By quoting from a San Francisco paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 18th clears Col. Ingersoll from the base and baseless charge of apathy in the present campaign because he had not been recognized by the "spoils system" under the Hayes or Garfield administrations, implying that he supported the Republican party not from principle, but for official reward.

Then in an obscure corner on the same page the grand old TRUTH SEEKER stoops to the level of a scurrilous sheet in its apparent eagerness to make a shameful thrust at Blaine, at the same time putting the lie on Ingersoll's lips, where he said that he did not feel called upon to take an activ part in the campaign, because his party had not stood by the Civil Rights bill. And all this for what? To make, by innuendo, cheap political capital for a licentious candidate?

Can THE TRUTH SEEKER afford to thus slur its friends, at the same time risking its reputation for fair play and alienating its Republican readers? MARIUS HEIGHTON.

WESTFIELD, N. Y., Sept. 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: As the evolution theory of Darwin seems to be accepted as a finality in the science of the day, and as I differ with both religion and science, believing that the two conditions in which everything exists are positiv and negativ conditions of the same thing, inseparable and convertible, instead of being distinct entities, the one sovereign, the other subject, as is now generally taught and believed—under these circumstances, please allow me to ask for information. It is a self-evident fact that all higher numbers are combinations of lower ones, and that the higher cannot exist independent of the lower. Deduct any number from one hundred, and all the gods that ever existed in the brain of superstition could not reproduce that number except by adding the amount deducted. Forms of being are represented by numbers, and are consequently subject to the same law. The question I would ask is simply this: Why are not higher grades of being subject to the same law of combination as higher numbers, instead of being evolved from them, as per Darwin? J. TINNEY.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Sept. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3, to pay the bill of books received. The picture of the Bennett Monument is most superbly grand. I am highly pleased with it, and prize it very highly. When I look upon that dear face, and reflect that his flesh and bones are returned to earth, and his spirit unto the God who gave it, my heart throbs with emotions that my pen cannot express. A knowledge of the man and his principles would insure eternal love and friendship. May his memory ever be revered and cherished in the hearts of all truth seekers. May the seeds of Freethought sown spring up and bear fruit in abundance, that all may partake thereof, and their eyes be opened to the truth. R. BUTTERFIELD.

GILMAN, ILL., Oct. 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: What is it that produces faith in the supernatural?

Is it not true that the more benighted and ignorant people are, the stronger their faith in the supernatural?

Is there an instance where so-called divine revelation ever aided man in scientific discovery?

Can any one giv an instance where modern Spiritualism ever revealed to man a scientific truth that was not known before?

Is it not true that in every instance where anything has been discovered in Spiritualism it has proved to be a fraud?

If every discovery in Spiritualism has proved to be a fraud, is it not reasonable to suppose that what has not been discovered is only a greater fraud? E. WENGER.

BRONSTON, KY., Oct, 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. I hav been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last three years, and like it splendidly. I must confess that I felt sad when George Chainey confessed h mself converted to Spiritualism. I felt sad because I hav been a great admirer of George Chainey. And now I fear that he is mistaken and will gradually decline until he becomes a wreck mentally. If the Spiritualists could only prove positivly that we liv after death, it would be the grandest thing on earth. I hav long wanted to be convinced of the truth of modern Spiritualism, but every effort that I hav ever made yet seems to get me further from it. I shall watch George Chainey's course in the future with a great deal of interest. J. N. BROWN.

CANON CITY, COL., Oct. 9, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith please find a list of Secular petitioners, numbering about one hundred. These hav been obtained through the kind and Liberal efforts of Mr. W. C Lloyd, of this city, and are thought to be a pretty good list for a place of this size, viz., 2,000 population, and supporting, or failing to support, six churches. Hoping this will count one toward the furtherance of the good cause, I am,

Very truly yours, ORANGE WHITE.

BROOKFIELD, MICH., Oct. 16, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to apply on my account for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Send as long as this will pay for it. I am sorry to put you to so much trouble. I hav long had the money, but, being a farmer and crowded to the utmost for time, has caused me to keep putting it off. Never stop the paper until I order it stopped. I was born a Freethinker, and your paper is the best I hav ever read on Freethought.

CHARLES FARRIS.

CHESTERFIELD, IND., Oct. 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2, for which amount continue sending me your most excellent paper. It meets my case exactly, and many of my neighbors are beginning to complain with the same symptoms. My paper is in great demand.

Liberally yours, WM. JOHN.

GURNEE, ILL., Sept. 28, 1884.

DEAR FRIENDS: For the last ten months I hav thought to "go over" any time with catarrh, rheumatism, kidney disease, and bronchitis. But while I stay I want THE TRUTH SEEKER for company. Inclosed find $2.50—$2 for the paper, and fifty cents for the lithograph of the monument and the ANNUAL. I hav a part in the monument. I hav mine set in a family yard on our farm, all lettered—like Elmina's friend, though not so nice. Remember me to Wakeman, Leland, and all the friends, Chainey in particular on his evidence. T. V. LAWSON.

CARBON, IND., Oct. 7, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: J. E. Remsburg has finished a course of five lectures in this place, beginning Sept. 20th. His lectures are considered by the Liberals of this place to be of the highest order. His arguments need no investigation; they are self-evident truths. We regard Mr. Remsburg as one of the most powerful o pponents superstition has. The friends, one and all, join with me in sending their highest regards to Mr. Remsburg through THE TRUTH SEEKER. WM. OLDHAM.

An Open Letter.

To My Old Orthodox Friends, or Quakers,

If it is not a misnomer to call you such, seeing you have adopted the Episcopal creed as the base of your religious faith, and are remodeling your old meeting-houses over into regular Christian churches, or building new ones, with steeple, bell, frosted glass, etc., thus turning them into steeple-houses, as George Fox used to call them. And in connection with this departure, you have left nearly all the old landmarks that used to be peculiar to the society of Friends; and yet you still retain to yourselves their name. This is not honest. And now here is another departure: in going into political squabbles, which your yearly meeting in Ohio recommends; and in accordance with this advice, you have raised a political pole near to your church door, which is emblematical of the position of your church as a political auxiliary to help the Prohibition party into political power. The red, white, and blue on your flag denote that you mean to be loyal to the government of the United States. And yet the first plank that the Prohibition party lays in their platform is to acknowledge an Almighty God as the rightful sovereign of all men, from whom the just powers of government are derived. This is certainly treason, in word, to the doctrin of the fathers of this government. Hear them:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created free and equal, and are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

"That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

They had no God, Jesus Christ, or Bible about it, from the first to the last. These old Revolutionary patriots were too well posted in the history of the European aristocracies and theocracies, whose doctrine was that the common people belonged to a God in the skies. "No," they said, "we, as a nation, will not acknowledge any such a power. This seven years' bloody war that we have just come through to get clear of these theocracies has cost us too much for us now to go back to that doctrine that governments are established by a god at their head, with the common people belonging to the government. We will reverse this order of things—we will have a democratic and republican form of government, and we will establish the doctrine that the government belongs to the people, and when, from any cause, it does not suit them, it shall be their right to alter or amend it to suit themselves."

The Vanguard, published in St. Louis, Mo., an organ of one of your large orthodox Christian churches, is still plainer on this subject, of a God at the head of the government, than you are in your prohibition platform. It says: "We hold, 1. That ours is a Christian nation, and that the God of the Christian scriptures is the author of the civil government. 2. That the Bible should be established with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions."

This, my dear old orthodox friends, is about your mental plane of thought, judging from your general course. The Catholic Christian church—the mother of all the other Christian churches, and outnumbering them all—in its general council, at Baltimore, two years ago, said that "all power comes from God, and the church is the witness and guardian of revelations, as well as the interpreter thereof. From her the world must learn the law of God, and the law of man must ever be subordinated to the law of God. It is untrue to assert that all power comes from the people. All power comes from God, by whom princes rule, and the mighty decree justice."

This, friends, is plain; there is no need of misunderstanding the Catholic church. And the Protestants are aping that church as fast as they well can—your church with the rest.

Every mother's son of all these churches, whose judgment is worth a yellow rye-straw on the subject of this government, knows that it is not a Christian government, never was, and never will be while the fires of liberty and human rights are kept burning on her altars, that were erected by the patriots of the Revolution, after a seven years' bloody war with the Christian crowned heads of Europe. And so in view of the independent character of this government, the Christian Statesman—the organ of the religious party in politics—has been laboring to make the Constitution Christian, by advocating the insertion in it of a religious amendment which shall now recognize God as the supreme governor of the universe; Jesus Christ as the ruler of nations, and the Bible as a divine revelation.

These three religious doctrines must be put into the Constitution, is what the Christian Statesman has said; and to prove that they are not in it now, that paper gives the following, which is conclusive, just as it should be, and may it always be so; and I am glad to have so good a witness to support what I have said:

"1. It is a significant fact that the Convention that framed it [the Constitution] refused to have prayer in its sessions (see Elliott's Debates, vol. v, pp. 254, 255). It is no wonder that a prayerless Convention should frame an un-Christian Constitution.

"2. All acknowledgment of God, of Christ, and of the moral standard of Christianity, the Bible, was purposely excluded from it—the name of God nowhere appears, not even in the president's oath. God's law in reference to the qualification for rulers is disregarded, and instead of restricting the choice of electors to men who fear God, it is declared that no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

"3. This is evident from the interpretation of the Constitution by the National Congress, and by national officers. The treaty with Tripoli, signed by the president and senate, about eight years after the Constitution was adopted, and never called into question as to its constitutionality, declares: 'The government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion; it has in itself no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquillity of Mussulmans.' President Jefferson refused to appoint days of fasting and Thanksgiving, on the express ground that the Constitution did not warrant such action.

"4. In 1829 and 1830, Congress refused to pass a law prohibiting carrying the mails on the Sabbath. In consequence of this action the violation of the Sabbath by transporting the mails has continued without interruption ever since.

"5. The highest authorities on Constitutional law, such as Story, Bayard, and Paschal, all agree that everything that would give religious character to the Constitution was left out, so that no man, however irreligious, could object to it on that account (Story, vol. ii, p. 609; Bayard, p. 142; Paschal, p. 255). To sum up all, we have shown that the character of the government of the United States is to be learned from its Constitution. We have shown that in order to be Christian the government must, in its Constitution, acknowledge Christ as the ruler of nations, and engage obedience to his laws. We have shown that the Constitution of the United States has not made such acknowledgment or profession. We think it follows, therefore, that the government of the United States is not Christian."

In the language of another, we say, that is good logic and conclusive reasoning. The government of the United States is not Christian, and we add that it never will be, as long as the American people have the wisdom to follow the example of the illustrious men who, in framing the bill of rights, had the good sense to keep every kind of religion out of it.

And now here we will submit the case without further argument, and say to our Q. E. church-members, as well as to the M. E. church-members, and all the rest of our evangelical citizens, that your rights in this purely secular governments as citizens are as good as ours, and no better. We ask no odds of your church religion, and we want to see no more of your intolerant persecutions toward those honest citizens who hav mentally grown out of your church bonds, and like noble men and women have come out from among you and are ready to testify against all your church religion as a superstitious tradition, handed down from father to son. Still, our secular government shall protect you in your superstition, so long as it don't interfere with individual right, or that of the general government under which we all live. But you may rest assured that we, like our Revolutionary fathers, are too well acquainted with the history of the Christian church, with the readings of your Bible that you call the word of God, and with the character of this Bible God himself, as portrayed in his book, to allow him to have any part or parcel in this secular government of ours on this side of the big water, much less to put him at its head.

This is a question of some importance. New England history is full of warnings bearing upon this question. The original charters of Plymouth colony and Massachusetts fully recognize the Christian religion. They professed to be granted by the grace of God, as defender of the faith, etc. The compact signed by the Pilgrim fathers in the little cabin of the Mayflower used the phrase, "In the name of God, amen." It acknowledged King James by the grace of God, and was signed in the presence of God and one another, and declared the purpose of the colonists to be for the glory of God and the advancement of the Christian faith. In less than forty years both colonies passed laws for whipping, fining, and otherwise persecuting the Quakers, as a cursed set of heretics. The Massachusetts statutes provided that they "be stripped naked, from the middle upwards, and tied to a cart's tail, and whipped through the town, and thence immediately conveyed to the constable of the next town, and so from constable to constable till they be conveyed to any of the outwardmost towns of our jurisdiction."

And now, since you have made a belief in the Episcopal creed a test of membership with you; since you carry your Bibles and hymn books to your churches with you as text-books to worship this personal God of your Bible from; and since you insist on its being read in our free schools wherever you can, regardless of the views and protests of others on the subject; you have even gone so far as to say that the Bible would be read in our public free schools regardless of this Taxpayer's protest or the law either; that this Taxypayer was an unbeliever, and would go to hell; and when he remonstrated with a pillar of your church for using such crude language towards a peaceable neighbor, who had never thrown a straw in his way, he (this pillar of your church) replied, "This is the language of the Bible, and I feel justified in using it in this case."

Now this is the same book that your pious Christian New England Pilgrim fathers used as a religious text-book to hang the Friends with, and also as authority for burning the witches. And in my acquaintance with the book, I am not able to see but that it was as good authority for them as it is for you, their descendants in religious faith, to consign to eternal torment a quiet and unoffending citizen, here and now, because he has mentally outgrown these old superstitious notions of the orthodox Christians' faith, and has manhood enough to say it, like those early Friends that built their religious faith on the light within, only they located it in the breast as something supernatural, hence their religion was of the emotional character. But Taxpayer would take the advantage of mental science, and would locate this light in the brain, as the organ of thought, and leave out the supernatural entirely, and build on reason and good sense.

For the present I will close in the language of another:

"Now in this palmy nineteenth century,
When science takes such high and dancing flights,
A point there is, on which some craven hearts
Are terribly alarmed, lest they should know
Too much; they therefore trembling cry, 'Forbear!'
If any hand attempt to raise the veil
That severs their tender sense from too much light.
That subject is the soul, concerning which
The less the mind, involved in night and dreams,
Can comprehend, the more dogmatical
Men get, and prone to clamor and abuse;
Thank God (science) that other means, more violent,
Assent reluctant to extort, are not
As much in vogue as in those good old times
Before men learned to see in nature's laws
The best and only proofs of nature's God;
When science learned to walk in leading strings.
She now can get along without these childish aids;
And orthodoxy, like most other things
Is tried by weight, and taken at its worth."

MR. PUTNAM is indebted to the Universe for this commendation: "'Waifs and Wanderings,' a novel by S. P. Putnam, is the latest literary sensation in Agnostic circles. It inculcates a high and noble morality, and graphically portrays the growth and development of the Rationalistic spirit of the age. The language is pure, and often wreathed in the flowers of elegance. Its characters, among others Cupples, Rev. Hapgood, Dr. Dobson, Billy Stubbs, and Mrs. Cupples, are admirably portrayed. Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Blue-Eyed Josie.

How I wonder, little maiden,
Looking on thy winsome face,
Where no shade of pain or sorrow
E'er has left a single trace—

How I wonder what the future,
Closely hidden from our view,
Of grief or gladness, weal or woe,
In its keeping holds for you.

Blue-eyed Josie, pure and gentle
As a rosebud, sweet and fair,
Stainless thus we e'er would keep thee,
Free from blight or weary care.

Thy little friend and playmate dear
Closed her eyes and went away;
Like some rare and fragrant flower,
Bloomed and faded in a day.

Bright with merry glee and laughter,
Neither life nor death she feared,
But while her world was filled with joy,
In that hour she disappeared.

Thou art left, O blue-eyed Josie –
Ah, the mystery of life!
May its blessings all atten thee,
Unaccompanied by its strife.

And if sorrows should befall thee,
Trials deep thy steps surround,
True and steadfast, brave and faithful,
Evermore mayst thou be found.

Twin Travelers.

Before referring to one of the most important of our journeys, let me giv a brief description of my traveling companion In the true sense of the term we were not twins, as he first saw the "peep o' day" July, 1819, while I did not bid good-morning for the first time till February, 1822. We were boy brothers and constant companions. Where he led, I followed; what he told, I believed; what he taught, I accepted without a doubt, and when chided (which was very seldom), I was most unhappy. His name was William; mine, George; and whenever any difference arose between us so that words ran high, he would snuff out all my conceit by saying, "King Williams were conquerors, and King Georges thick-headed fellows." To me he was the "sweetest William" ever existed, and words are unable to express my pride for what I felt was his greatness and superiority. He was one of that rare class who seem to hav been born under the most favorable circumstances, whose bread is always "buttered on both sides," who are always welcomed to the best, whose honeyed lips and pleasant manners open hearts as well as doors, and who, if they die young, are honored as saints, and as being too fine for earth.

Brother William was a genuin English boy, and in all our travels, mid the hill and dales of Leicestershire, there was an air of rollicking romance about him. In those days an English boy counted for nothing unless he was willing to, and could, fight a good battle; and, strange to say, my brother, whom I never knew to get real angry, would fight. He seemed to enjoy a battle, and yet, at its worst, his face was sweet in its determination. He was always the victor. I do not think he would hav ever given up beaten. He was swift of foot, and bore off the prize (a monstrous plum-pudding) at the boy races, on the occasion of the coronation festivities in Redmile in honor of William IV. When he was ten years old he was one of the singers at the church, and accompanied the choir in their Christmas eve merry making at "Belvoir Castle," seat of the Duke of Rutland, and also at their singing and playing on Christmas morn, and through the day in the village. In addition, at the great races at "Croxen Park," his investments in games of chance were successful. Such has been the tenor of his life; he did not die young, so failed in early saintship; has lived to be a star character in the orthodox congregational church and books, and still lives to read The Truth Seeker, and kindred publications. For many years it was a wonder to me why there should be such a great difference in our make-up. I see it now. His birth in July givs the explanation. Through the beautiful days of an English spring, his mother's heart was thrilled with joyful anticipation; the air was fragrant with the odor of violets and budding roses, and the trees, grass, and hedge rows were jubilant with their fresh, green attire. The rich, melodious songs of the birds left their indellible impress on heart and brain, while retrospect and prospect completed the work. My advent in early February had been preceded by the dark days of the dreary English winter, no flowers, no song of birds, naught to giv life, zest, and inspiration through the murky season, save the Christmas festivities, and had our mother not been among the sweetest of all sweet, pure creatures, the contrast would hav been greater than it is.

Now for the (to me) great journey. In the fall of 1836 our parent, with the other children, left Poughkeepsie, N. Y., for Port Carbon, Pa. Brother and I were learning trades, he to be a machinist, I an iron molder. In mid-winter he was taken with bleeding at the lungs, and so severely that little hopes were entertained of his recovery. I shall never forget that sweet, pale face. No word of complaint escaped his lips. Neither shall I ever forget the loving devotion of the mother and daughter who attended him. The night of the crisis of the disease I sat up with the others, as in case of death they wanted the two boys near each other. I see it all as vivid as then. I read the anxious looks on the different faces, the beating of my own heart was audible, and on the snow-white pillow rested the dear face that was soul of my soul, life of my life. After midnight hope revived, the muteness of the preceding hours was broken, and time and words were found to comfort me. From this his recovery was rapid, and the parties for whom we labored deemed it best for us to go home. We left Poughkeepsie, and early in April took a tow-boat ride down the Hudson to New York, and a steamer to South Amboy. At this point we saw railroad cars for the first time.

The cars were a wonder to us, and were built to represent several stage coaches stuck together. The seats were common pine painted yellow, viz, the second-class, which we took. We reached Camden and crossed the Delaware to Philadelphia by noon, and in the afternoon took the Philadelphia and Norristown Railroad to the latter place. From this point began the "tramp, tramp," for we started with our bundles up the Norristown Dam, and, by the time we reached its head, it was getting dusk. After crossing the ferry, half way up the dam, we espied the first canal boat. When we reached the locks we asked for a ride, which was given. The boat was empty, and we sat down in the bow for shelter from the cold, raw wind.

Oh, how much I wanted to see my mother, and yet by my brother's side I felt safe. From the head of Norristown, through the two Catfish and Yankee dams, to "Bowers," at the foot of four mile canal, it was five miles, and it seemed a long way into the night ere we reached that point.

At the head of little Catfish Dam, we saw a dredge at work clearing the channel near the locks. This was a surprise and wonder. Its method of clearing was by a revolving band of elevator cups, similar to those used in elevating grain.

Brother made arrangements with the boat captain to take us with them during the day, while lodging with others near where they tied up for the night. That night we stopped at "Brown's," an old Pennsylvania farmer. They gave us a home-made feather bed, so large and full that we were sunk in its feathery embrace, and were soon lost in pleasant dreams.

The canal ride was novel, and the next night we slept in a neat room at the "Lock House," at the head of the twenty-two mile canal, five miles from Reading, county seat of Berks Co. I shall never forget this room or the sensations it created. It was the picture of neatness, and cleanliness; but what pleased me most was the number of women's dresses that hung on the walls. I noticed them all, principally calicos with one or more muslins de laine. These seemed to bring home so near, there was such a motherly and sisterly air about them. I did not think them as pretty as mother's, for she always wore very small figures or stripes, whose prevailing color was lilac; the figures of most of these were too large and showy.

By this time the boatman seemed to take a strong liking to us, and from there up we were all right. The novelty of the ride, the numerous locks, and the fine scenery along the Schuylkill, was a source of constant delight.

The "Blue Mountains" near Point Clinton, and the high hills and mountains in the Anthracite range, seemed more beautiful than the Highlands of the Hudson, doubtless because we were nearing mother. The long journey for those days drew near its close; joyful anticipation was on the eve of fruition, and boys and mother would be near each other. The hour came, and it was one of those beautiful seasons never to be forgotten, and which today holds its place as one of life's sunniest memories.

LITERAL DISCOURAGEMENT (VIDE WEBSTER.)

My whole is five letters combined,
Yet twice five is only a part of me;
For ten, I am sure, you will find
Just placed in the midst for the heart of me.
But yet if you make me this part less now,
I'm nothing at all but some tease:
Tho' really I am so heartless now,
I must there diminish your ease.
But now to get rid of the curse of me,
Take my head, but restore me my heart;
And then you will find the reverse of me,
A marshal of France, or a humorous bard.

Uncle James.

THE STORM.—A DAMP PUZZLE.

Now the liquid drops descend,
All the sky is inky dark,
And if this should never end,
We might wish for Noah's ark.
Even now, it seems we float
In a fancy-builded boat,
But if two ins were overboard,
Like Jonah, ere he cursed the gourd,
When he interviewed the whale,
We might o'er The Storm prevail,
Though but a rag he left to show
The promis of Jehovah's bow;
But by that rag, long as it flies,
We need not fear the angry skies.
Say what 'twas doing, if you can,
When I this puzzle first began.

Correspondence.

Bear Lake, Mich., Oct. 18, 1884.

Dear Miss Wixon: Yours duly received, and I wish the remarks made by my friends after hearing it read could hav been wafted into your cosy sitting-room in Fall River; I am sure they would hav made your heart overflow with happiness to know you hav so many devoted friends in the far West.

The other morning when the sun was appearing out of a sheet of clear gold in the East, I looked out upon Bear Lake, and saw what I shall always remember as a beautiful sight. Above the lake, and resting lightly upon it, was a sheet of foam. Upon inquiring, I found that it was fog. You must imagin a snowdrift rising about five or six feet above the surface of the lake, so light and fleecy that you almost felt afraid to touch it. This lasted about an hour. Then the fog lifted gradually and disappeared. But little clouds seemed to keep rising for a long time, so much like the snowy clouds of a summer day that I could hardly believe that it was the middle of October, and that I was looking at fog which many times in the East renders the day dismal and uncomfortable It is said to be worse than rain when one is caught in it when sailing on the lake.

Mrs. Derthick was pleased with your message, for to her you seem like an intimate friend, she has heard so much of you. She is a bright, sunny, wide-awake woman. An attack of diphtheria so affected her system five years ago that she has not been able to use her eyes since. She is married to a gentleman worthy of her, and is always so cheerful that sometimes we hardly realize how severe a daily burden she is carrying.

Last week the Woman's Suffrage Association held a very successful meeting at the beautiful home of Mrs. G. W. Hopkins, who is the woman of the place. Coming here ten years ago, when the town was in its infancy, by her good common sense and interest in the living questions of the day, she has lifted the people up to a higher grade than I hav ever seen in a place of its size. There is an independence about the people which I like. Every one seems competent to be a critic. No leaning on your next-door neighbor; no saying a thing is so because the leading people of the place may hav expressed a certain opinion. Is is thus because we hav each thought the matter over, and hav looked at it in all ways, that we hav come to entertain the views which we express.

Mr. Derthick, a lawyer (husband of the aforenamed lady), gave us a talk on the Michigan state laws. Comparing the revised statutes with those of thirty years ago, although in some respects they may not be all we desire, yet after an hour's talk with bright, witty, and sensible questions from those present, we had to say that there had been a great advance in the legal rights of women. My contribution was an article on the "Political Education of the People," from the Century.

Last Saturday I attended the first Teacher's Institute of the season. They are held once a month, and are usually attended by all the teachers in the vicinity. There was nothing of importance accomplished, except to plan out work for the ensuing year. Next month I hav to read an essay on "Voice Culture," rather a hard topic, but I will do my very best. No one ever refuses to do anything when called upon. The effort is made, and as a rule good work is done.

This afternoon I had a good long ride through the woods. The trees are gorgeous in their garments of red and gold. I do not think I ever enjoyed the sighing of the wind among the branches of the forest trees as much as I did to-day. One could not help but feel the grandeur of the old trees which reared their heads so high that it made one dizzy to look at them, as well as the solemnity of the silence which reigned supreme.

Yours in love, M. E. H.

LECTURE.

Is Man a Free Moral Agent, or Is He a Creature of Circumstances?

The following points will be thoroughly tested, which will form the substance of this lecture:

The encounter of Adam and Eve with the Serpent.
Can the emotion of man resist the power of Psychology?
Does God attend religious revivals?
Is there a God of battles?
Is it God or the physician that heals or kills the afflicted?
Why do men abuse themselves, knowing that it is to their own injury?
Why do Christians deny God as a healing medium in time of sickness, and confide in the skill of medicine only?

Poetry.

A Woman's Meditations.

AT FIFTEEN.

Oh! the fear, the worry, and dread!
Oh! the doubt of the future good!
All is darkness overhead,
As gloomy futures o'er me brood.

AT EIGHTEEN.

Where is the promis of sweet sixteen?
Gone are the hopes of early youth.
Only the blight of the early dream;
Only the dark side of the truth.

AT TWENTY-ONE.

The dreams hav vanished and buried lie;
The blossoms, nipped by early frost.
Nothing is left but a longing to die,
And a quivering grief for the early lost.
If life would only near the end!
If death would bring its promised rest!
I've had whatever earth could send;
I long to pass the final test.

AT THIRTY-ONE.

If still life's pathway I must tread.
Giv me to soothe the aching heart,
Teach me the balm for aching head,
And this I'll deem the better part.

AT FORTY-ONE.

Ah, what is this? the golden grain?
The promised joy of earlier years?
So late in life to win the game—
So late to win the smiles from tears!

AT FIFTY-ONE.

How false the prophets all hav told!
Where are those faded bowers of green?
Is this bright evening's burnished gold
The sad, dark future they hav seen?

AT SIXTY-ONE.

How much to those must be forgiven
Who count that "ignorance is bliss,"
Who only build a childish heaven,
That age and wisdom surely miss!
Good cheer, brave heart, amid the thorns,
The doubts and fears of early youth!
Beyond those dark and dismal morns
Shines wisdom's sun of priceless truth.
And as you pass from youth to age,
You leave the darkness and the fears;
Still finding, as you turn each page,
That interest deepens with the years.

October, 1884. MARY A. LELAND.

Death.

O gentle Death! why com'st thou not
To those who fain would thee embrace;
Whose wasted life seems but a blot
Upon creation's glorious face?
Who love in vain, who seek in vain
To brighten every human lot,
Whose sympathy, like summer rain,
Falls gently on each barren spot—
Why should they linger sadly on
Whose every dream of joy has fled,
When e'en the power to bless has gone,
And love and hope be crushed and dead?
Why take that loved and gifted one,
In all his manly grace and pride?
Why rob the mother of her son.
The husband of his girlish bride?
Then spare, oh, spare, earth's brightest part,
The loved, the beautiful, and blest,
And take the lorn and weary heart
That pants and longs for endless rest.

PAXTON.

Waiting.

I sit alone, and listen for footsteps
That come not, and sadly asking,
"Shall I never hear them more?"
What music, like the voice of those
We love? What joy to clasp their hands!
But oh, the chill that 'numbs the heart,
When death or coldness makes the grasp relax,
Turning back the blood an icy stream,
Congealing life's warm fountain.
One who has felt this iron in the soul,
From either cause, has drunk the dregs
Of bitterness. The suffering soul turns in Upon itself, longs for something in which
To trust its hoarded wealth of love,
Refined in the hot crucible of grief.
How fleeting life's most blissful dreams!
How sweet, though sad, their memory!
No more to hear the voice of love that falls
On waiting hearts, like dew, until
Its chords are swept by angel fingers
In some fairer world where sorrow never comes,
Where day-dreams shall be realized!

LUNA.

Mr. Andrews at the Liberal Club.

Friday evening, Oct. 17th, Mr. Andrews lectured before the Liberal Club on "The Unitary Drifts in Modern Philosophy." He began by saying that, as on a former occasion not long since, he had not selected his own subject. His subject had been selected for him by the management of the club. They wished, it seemed, to hear from him on this particular theme. This fact emancipated him from the trammels of deference which he might hav felt if the subject had been of his own choosing. He was emancipated from constraints, and felt that he might say his own thought in his own way. He continued as follows: It is a common remark, even among persons who stand high in literature, that whosoever thinks clearly can always express his thoughts in ordinary English. On the common plane of thought this is true, and is in that sense an important piece of instruction to be given to the beginner in literature; but there is a deeper sense in which it is the reverse of the truth. For real thinkers, for discoverers in the realm of thought, it is all the other way. A really new thought has no word in any language to express it; and he who says that he has never had any difficulty in finding a word or words for his thoughts, says, thereby, that he has never had a really original thought in his life. Language has only been devised to express the thoughts that men hav had; up to that boundary, and not a single inch beyond. Outside and beyond lies the immense unknown and heretofore unthought of, and whosoever invades it by going farther out, by subsoiling ordinary thought, finds himself beset by a crowd of ideas for which there are no adequate words, and he is thrown into the dilemma of either coining new words, or of taking old words and stretching and lifting them into new meanings. So when chemistry was discovered it was utterly impossible to teach it through the medium of language without a nomenclature; without, in other words, the manufacture of thousands of new words of a special order, for teaching that particular class of ideas. So with every other science which has got itself fairly constituted as a science. It is proven that sociology, so-called, or the science of society, is not yet fairly constituted into a science, by the fact that it has so little of exact technicality.

In the next place, therefore, I would warn you against the common and very prevalent, and what I may call the vulgar, prejudice against technicalities. Technicalities are merely words which hav been so closely defined, and so strictly applied to particular purposes, that we cannot mistake their meaning. An untechnical word is a crude stick or branch picked up in the forest; a technical word is a piece of timber hewed to the line, mortised or tenanted, and fitted to its place in a building. Or, still better, technicalities are tools, bags, baskets, artificial contrivances to do more verbal work than the naked handwork which we can accomplish without them. You can only hold two or three oranges in your hand unaided, but put them in a basket or net, and you can hold a dozen. Baskets, or nets, or such labor-saving contrivances, if made out of the sounds of the voice, instead of metal, wood, and strings, are technicalities. The prejudice against technicalities, with untrained minds, is of just the same order as the prejudice against tools and machinery by unskilled workmen. It is undoubtedly a trouble to learn them, and our natural laziness recoils from that labor; but this prejudice is no more respectable than the indolence of a child who is unwilling to wash his face, or the unreadiness of the barbarian to adopt the hoe and plow of modern civilization—he sticking stolidly to his old method of cultivating the earth with pointed sticks or stakes. This is my apology for my technique, or for so much of new or precisionized usage as I may hav occasion to introduce in respect to the meaning of terms, here and elsewhere.

Coming now to my special subject, I construe "Unitary Drifts" to mean drifts or tendencies to Unity, and I shall then assign to Unity a strictly technical meaning, making it a definit technicality of philosophy, taking it, for such purposes as the present, out of its common meaning or meanings, which are various and contradictory. I shall perhaps surprise you then by affirming that there is no strong or marked tendency toward Unity in modern philosophy; and that on the contrary its most marked tendency is directly the opposit.

But, in order that I may be better understood—or less liable, at all events, to be misunderstood, I will remark that I shall treat the subject chiefly as relating to Social Philosophy, rather than to philosophy in the broader sense of the term. In this way we shall somewhat narrow the subject and render it more comprehensible. But whether we mean the one or the other, my statement is equally true; the prevalent tendency is not towards Unity, but first to its opposit; and in the next place to a new something which has heretofore had no definit naming, and for which we must find a proper technicality.

Observe, then, closely, what it is which I here mean by Unity. Unity, in the strict technical sense which I am now assigning to it, is purely and simply the denial of Disunity; and Disunity is the denial of Unity. They two are therefore the opposit poles of the great universal relationship. Disunity is Difference, or Variety, or Individuality, or Freedom, or Sovereignty of the Individual—Protestantism, Democracy, or Anarchism. Unity is, on the other hand, the opposit of all this, the denial of all this, the annihilation of it all. It is the arbitrary Unity of Society through conformity to some single standard, which is "without variableness or shadow of turning," "the laws of the Medes and Persians"—Unalterability, Conservatism, Autocracy, Cæsarism, Czarism, Papacy, Paternal Government, Aristocracy, etc., etc.

Unity, in the absolute degree—that is, when pushed to its ultimates, to the bald, naked Principle (Unism), which is what is meant by Unity when made technical—is therefore immobility, fixity, monotony, death, in the direction of suppression. But Disunity in the absolute; individuality pure and simple; anarchism, in its literal significance, is, on the other hand, death by dissolution of the social Unity (Duism).

There is, then, the third state, the resultant state; the only true, or truly possible, condition, for which, as I hav said, no word or term is known, because these ideas hav not been distinctly sifted, separated, and understood. It is the bane of all our philosophy that there is everywhere the missing third term. Spencer has his integration and his differentiation, without any third term to express what is paramountly important in the whole matter—the combination, in due and harmonic proportion, of the integration (Unism) and the differentiation (Duism), which combination is trinismal.

In other words, the Unity and the Variety are the rivet, on the one hand, and the flanges, on the other hand, of a hinge; but what is the name of the hinge itself? I want to call your attention specifically to the consideration of the nature of a hinge. The hinge is an immensely great affair in this world of ours, and very few hav ever comprehended it, or given any thought to it. A hinge is the place where two things meet and unite; but if they completely unite, then there is no hinge. It is also the place where two things go asunder; but if they go completely asunder, then again there is no hinge. To be a hinge, the parts must at the same instant, or at succeeding instants, unite and separate, both unalize and dualize; hence in the aggregate they must trinalize. Don't be afraid of new words; if they signify new ideas, you are made mentally richer the moment you get hold of them. Study the hinge (Trinism), and know, so far as my assurance can be taken as authority, that, if you understand it thoroughly, you will be lifted into a new sphere of thought, transcending completely all the wrangling of ordinary political and philosophical discussions and teachings. You will be the wisest people in the world, from the time that you understand a hinge! You will then know the principle of universal, scientific reconciliation; the possibility of universal social reconstruction; and of the ultimate harmonic administration of all human affairs. Don't fail, then, to study hinges; and I mean literally the hinges upon which your doors are hung, in the simplest, most material, and mechanical sense—for it is the discovery of Universology that these simplest mechanical arrangements of every-day life contain, by their analogies or resemblances, the whole secret of the higher, and highest, philosophy: so that through it the whole people, in their homes, and by simply reading their newspapers, which will become the organs for such learning, will be made more thorough philosophers than all the great thinkers of the past generations.

To understand what is meant by the three stages of idea involved in the great social hinge, as in the hinge everywhere, take the first illustration from law terms, where we do happen to hav them all named by proper technicalities. There is, say, first, a "joint contract," in which two or more unite, each for his portion of obligation; second, "several contracts," or contracts in severally, the obligations wholly apart from each other; and, third, the higher and supreme kind of obligation, "joint-and-several contracts," in which both or all the parties are bound for the whole. Take an illustration from another profession, the medical. It is, of course, of the utmost importance for the constitution of the human body that it hav in it Unity and that each part in it hav Unity—each joint, for instance; but a joint which is completely united, which is characterized by just Unity and nothing else, is a stiff joint, what the doctors call anchylosed, or brought to anchor—i. e., it is no joint at all, has ceased to be a joint by excess of the manifestation of the principle of Unity. But, on the other hand, the complete dis-Unity of a joint destroys the joint equally, by an exactly opposit process or condition, which is called dislocation (out-of-jointness). It would be a great mistake for the individual to think that he would contribute to his activity or efficiency by having all his bones out of joint. The third and only state in which there is any true working joint, any proper hingewiseness (for a hinge is the same thing as a joint) is where there is just the right proportion of Unism, or tendency toward Unity, somewhere short of actual Unity; and just the right proportion of Duism, or tendency toward dis-Unity, somewhere short of actual dis-Unity—and they two combined in an actual hinging, operating, freely-swinging, but rightly guided hingewise relationship with each other, according to the part of the body and the particular kind of a hinge needed at the given joint. So complicated and precise as all this must become our social science, under the theoretical guidance of Universology, and the practical guidance of Pantarchism. At present people adhere to arche pure and simple, which is the stiff-joint, or, finding it evil, and needing a remedy, and reasoning that the opposit of the evil must be the remedy, they rush over to anarchy, which is social dislocation—in which "the times are out of joint" (Shakspere). All this is the natural and legitimate swing of the pendulum, in preparation for the comprehension of the true functionating joint; or the hinge-philosophy in social affairs. It is for this third idea that we need and must hav a new term compounded of the two other terms, or somehow representing them. We might say arch-anarchy (ark-anarchy) or anarch-archy, but either would be awkward, and Pantarchy or Pantarchism has been chosen to express that idea. It is not then toward Unity that there is any special drift in modern social philosophy. The real, strong drift of the hour, throughout Christendom and the world, is toward "Anarchy," Individual Sovereignty, or, what is the same thing, ultra-democracy. The return drift toward a true reconciliation, on scientific terms, between the two other and opposit drifts, is only now just beginning in the world, either to be comprehended or acted on; but, from now on it will almost at once become the rapid and all-pervading drift; the organifying, or truly constructiv and operativ drift, in every department of human affairs.

Another method of naming these three terms is, 1. Unity; 2. Variety; and 3. Univariety. The transition, and still prevalent drift, under this naming, is from Unity to Variety. The new and final and conquering drift in the immediate future will be from Variety to Univariety; and it is this last which doubtless was really meant by the Management of the Club, by the term Unity, when assigning me my subject: but I hav taken the advantage of it as a text to introduce some needed technicality into the use of these terms.

What, in conclusion, the world needs, and is beginning consciously to want, and what it is in the destinies that it shall soon hav, is a Church Institution based on the Common Sympathetic Consciousness and Social Duties of Mankind, more powerful than the Catholic church; and a Universal International Nationality based on Individuality and Human Rights—not a mere loose association of states—but a true organic, operativ, vitally functionating real government, touching every branch of human affairs, and furnishing the working models for every institution—more powerful than the Roman, than the Russian, or the British empire—and all this by pure voluntarism, without a particle of compulsory allegiance; without a dollar of compulsory taxation; and without resort to any other authority than that of Charm, and Organized Influence, under Freedom.

Disintegration cannot cope with Integration, nor the Inorganic with the Organic, except as mere Standing-grounds.

Thanks and a Correction.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Thank you ever so much for your first-rate notice; but, in matters of great moment, and especially concerning great personages, THE TRUTH SEEKER should not tell—errors. The Genius of History is awful touchy in such matters. Unborn millions will look back to THE TRUTH SEEKER for facts.

I hav to claim that I am contemporary with Stephen Pearl Andrews—not his successor. I hav learned from him, during our long acquaintance, many things that I could not spare out of my life; but I learned phonography, not from him, but from one of the earliest works of Isaac Pitman, of England, before Mr. Andrews had published his text-book.

Also I must lift Mr. E. F. Underhill off from Mr. Andrews's pot-hook, and hang him on to mine. I taught him his first phonographic lessons in 1848. Indeed, I believe there are but two others in the United States ahead of me in reporting work for pay, who kept it up as a life profession. First, Henry M. Parkhurst, of this city; second, W. H. Burr, of Washington—all three of us Infidels. Queer, isn't it? In fact, I know but very few Christian phonographers. Theodore Tilton, a pupil of mine, came pretty near it.

If "bran bread leads to Infidelity," what shall be said of the light-spreading force of phonography? Let him who thinketh himself steadfast in the old faith take heed and not try to write fast lest he fall from grace.

T. C. LELAND.

[So, one by one, touched by the iconoclastic hand of history, the traditions of childhood pass away. George Washington never owned a hatchet; William Tell could not hit the side of a barn with an arrow unless he was inside the barn; Leland did not learn phonography of Andrews. Did Plato sit at the feet of Socrates? Let us pause and doubt.]

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treament. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

And but now is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors, Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all forms of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

THE greatest gain we can make is knowledge. This will help us to cause the world to grow better more than all other agencies we can employ—the knowledge of the true, the knowledge of the false, the knowledge of the right, and the knowledge of the wrong.—D. M. Bennett.

DUNCAN is in his grave;
After life's fitful fever he sleeps well;
Treason has done his worst; nor steel nor poison,
Malice domestic, foreign levy, nothing
Can touch him further.

—Shakspere's Macbeth.

IT proceeds rather from revenge than malice when we hear a man affirm that all the world are knaves. For before a man draws this conclusion of the world, the world has usually anticipated him, and concluded all this of him who makes the observation. Such men may be compared to Brothers, the prophet, who on being asked by a friend how he came to be clapped into Bedlam, replied: "I and the world happened to hav a slight difference of opinion; the world said I was mad, and I said the world was mad; I was outvoted, and here I am."—Colton's Lacon. [NOTE.—This man Brothers attracted notice in England about the beginning of the century. There is a short account of him in Chambers's Encyclopedia, and after reading it any one of sense will say with Horace of old, "Fortes erant ante Agamemnona," i.e, there were crack-brained fanatics before Dr. Talmage.—Hylax.]

To thine own self be true
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou can'st not, then, be false to any man.

—Shakspere's Hamlet.

THAT from which the public character of Milton derives its great and peculiar splendor remains to be mentioned. If he exerted himself to overthrow a forsworn king and a persecuting hierarchy, he exerted himself in conjunction with others. But the glory of the battle which he fought for, the species of freedom which is the most valuable, and which was then the least understood—the freedom of the human mind—is all his own. Thousands and tens of thousands among his contemporaries raised their voices against ship-money and the star-chamber, but there were very few indeed who discerned the more fearful evils of moral and intellectual slavery, and the benefits which would result from the liberty of the press, and the unfettered exercise of private judgment. These were the objects which Milton justly conceived to be the most important. He was desirous that the people should think for themselves as well as tax themselves, and should be emancipated from the dominion of prejudice as well as from that of Charles. . . . With a view to the same great object he attacked the licensing system in that sublime treatis, the Areopagitica, which every statesman should wear as a sign upon his hand, and as frontlets between his eyes. His attacks were in general directed less against particular abuses than against those deeply-seated errors on which almost all abuses are founded, the servil worship of eminent men and the irrational dread of innovations.—Macaulay's Milton

MILTON! thou should'st be living at this hour;
England hath need of thee; she is a fen
Of stagnant waters; altar, sword, and pen,
Fireside, the heroic wealth of hall and bower
Hav forfeited their ancient English dower
Of inward happiness. We are selfish men;
Oh, raise us up, return to us again;
And giv us manners, virtue, freedom, power.
Thy soul was like a star, and dwelt apart;
Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea;
Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free.
So did'st thou travel on life's common way,
In cheerful godliness; and yet thy heart
The lowliest duties on herself did lay.

—Wordsworth.

IT is stated in the Advance that not long before Theodore Parker went abroad and died, Emerson said to him at Concord: "We must get rid of that Christ, we must get rid of that Christ." If the story is true, it agrees with everything known about Emerson, and with much written by him. He was an eminent and attractiv pagan living in the nineteenth century, but living a life wholly apart from Christ, and ready, as the above remark indicates, to say, "Away with him."—The Presbyterian.

HE that is good will infallibly become better, and he that is bad will certainly become worse: for vice, virtue, and time are three things that never stand still.—Colton's Lacon.

To everyone that hath shall be given, and he shall hav abundance; but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath.—Matt. xxv, 29.

IF the doctrin of evolution be correct, there never was, and never could hav been, a deity interposing to instruct Adam, to educate Abraham, to inspire Joseph, to put down oppressing Pharaoh, to change the rod of Moses into a serpent, to create an additional frog, louse, or musketo in Egypt, to call forth the waters of a deluge, to spread abroad a rainbow, to speak to the rain to fall on one piece of ground and not on another, to commission a famin or a pestilence or a flash of lightning; every drop of rain and every shower, every ray of light, and every blade of grass having been so unalterably woven out of the original supply of force in the web of order, continuous and unbroken forever, as not to admit of a possibility of interference or alteration.—Rev. Geo. B. Cheever.

THERE is a pleasure in the pathless woods,
There is a rapture on the lonely shore,
There is society where none intrudes,
By the deep sea, and music in its roar;
I love not man the less, but nature more,
From these our interviews, in which I steal
From all I may be, or hav been before,
To mingle with the universe, and feel
What I can ne'er express, yet cannot all conceal.

—Byron

Odds and Ends.

"WELL," said a Irish attorney, "if it plaze the court, if I am wrong in this, I hav another point that is equally conclusiv."

MONKEYS in South Africa cut canes of spicewood and suck the ends. In this country they buy the cane and then carry out the rest of the program.

"FATHER, did Mr. Jones really stand on the deck?" asked Green's hopeful progeny the other day. "No, Georgie, he stood on three kings, and put the deck up his sleeve to use as occasion demanded."

THE Brooklyn Eagle wants to know what portion of a young ladies anatomy is "the wood," having heard that a young lady was "shot in the wood." The Eagle has evidently forgotten that all women hav lumbar regions.

I THOUGHT she was a lovely sight,
As daintily arrayed in white,
With rosy cheeks and glances bright,
That summer day
She played croquet;

Until beneath a shady tree
I stopped to rest, which chanced to be
Where in the kitchen I could see,
That summer day
She played croquet;

And there alone in that hot place
Her mother stood with careworn face,
And ironed a gown all frills and lace,
That summer day
She played croquet;

A gown, the very counterpart
Of that she wore with witching art;
And so she did not win my heart
That summer day
She played croquet.

AMAZIN' GRACE IN MONTANA.

There has been a religious awakening in Montana. The inhabitants are "quickened in the spirit of their minds." According to the St. Paul Herald, a minister out there has received a call in the following manner: The other day a St. Paul minister answered a ring at his door-bell and found there a brawny frontiersman, wearing a buckskin suit and a white Mexican sombrero. He was invited into the study, and after seating himself, said: "Pardner, I'm tryin' to case up a sky pilot to ladle out the savin' grace to the boys in Rawson' Gulch, Montanny. The barkeeper down to the Merchants' Hotel told me you slung about the heftiest jaw in the holy line in St. Paul, an' I thought I'd drop in an' size you up." "If I understand you, sir, you desire to secure a pastor for your church out there." "That's our little game exactly, pard, and the boys constituoted me an executiv committee to come in 'yar an' run one down. We want the best heavenly mouthpiece in the country, an' we've got the dust to put up fur 'im." "Who was your last pastor?" asked the minister. "Never had one. You see, the boys out thar never stood in much on the religious racket, but we're agoin' to bank big on savin' grace in the future, an' play er' clear up to the limit. Glad tidin's o' great joy's the winnin' card at Rawson's from now, henceforth, an' forevermore, pardner, an' don't you forgit it!" "You say you never had a minister? What, then, has caused this sudden awakening—this new desire for light?" "I'll tell you, pard; it's just like this. Thar's a big rivalry atween Rawson' Gulch an' Rocky Bar, about five miles furder up the creek. The two camps hev been fightin' for the lead fur a year, an' we've allers downed 'em on every p'int. Las' week one o' the boys went up thar' an' come back an' reported that the Rocky fellers had a preacher, an' that salvation were a runnin' loose in the camp, an' amazin' grace were growin' on the bushes. He said he heard the holy bloke preachify 'imself, an' that he dished up the livin' word like a ten times winner. Wal, thar sort o' paralyzed us, so to speak, an' we called a meetin' to see what war' to be done. At fust it war' perposed to go up thar of a Sunday, an' clean out the congregation an' hang the preacher, but we wa'n't quite sure of the fightin' abilities o' the meek an' lowly worshippers up thar an' mout get licked, so it war finally decided to tree a gospel sharp, an' that's what I'm yar fur now. The boys'll treat you white, pardner, an' if you can do up the Rocky Bar capper in the heavenly game, an' put it all over 'im a soundin' the glad tidin's, yer fortune's made. I like the cut o' yer jib, pard, an' I b'lieve you'd shout salvation at us in a way that'd make the Rocky Bar galoots pow'ful weary." "What denomination is in the majority out there?" "None at all. You kin play yer cards to suit yerself, an' come at us jest as you think the hand ought to be played. But say, pard, I reckon I wouldn't ever giv the boys a Baptist lay out to play up to." "Why not?" "Wal, yer see, we ain't much stuck on water out thar only from a business p'int o' view. Water's all good enough an' mighty valuable fur washin' out dust, but aside from that 'taint much account. Still, if that's yer lay, pardner, come right along. We'll take turns an' keep you baptizin' half the time, jest to down them Rocky fellers. Thar's a gang o' twenty Chinamen workin' a placer claim below us, an' we kin run them up an' let you souse the hull mob two or three times a week, if it'll make the Rocky crowd think the good work's a movin' right along." The minister was forced to decline the call, and the old man said as he rose to go: "All right, pardner; no harm done. I'll keep up the hunt till I tree my man. We'll down Rocky Bar on salvation if it's in the pins. Good day, sir, an' if you ever come out our way stop off an' giv us a little wad o' off-hand redeemin' grace, an' we'll treat you squar.' Good bye."

Notes and Clippings.

When it is written "D. D." it stands for Doctor of Divinity; but when it is put in this fashion, d——d, it stands for something theologically different.

Lucy Hayes has been honestly elected to a presidency, at all events—the presidency of the Women's Home Missionary Society. Hayes will continue to attend to the hennery.

An Indianapolis minister wrote a communication to the Times of that city, headed "Vote as You Pray." Had this advice been followed, every Christian voter would hav been in a minority of one.

Says the Fall River Advance: "A man never really finds out what unadultered cheek means until he sees the mill boss, who has been instrumental in getting his pay cut down, waltz round with the contribution box in church."

A religious weekly asserts that the good old practice of pastoral visits is going out of fashion. If there is not a decrease of immorality to follow this, it will show either that the statement is not to be relied upon or that effect does not always cease with the cause.

An English clergyman was rebuking his congregation for deserting him on a charity sermon Sunday. "Why is it," he asked, "that to-day the church is full, and this day week, because there was a collection, it was simply empty?" "'Cos yer don't giv tick!" shouted a voice from the free seats.

At an English country house, at luncheon, after morning service, the popular young curate was accosted by a venerable divine. "How long, sir," said he, "did it take you to write that sermon that you gave us this morning?" "Oh, about a week." "Dear me," replied the other, "it took me four."

"Now, little boy, what is the meaning of the word hypocrisy?" asked a Sunday-school teacher of her favorit pulpil. "I can't explain what it is, but I know it all the same." "Giv me an example of hypocrisy." "When a fellow says he loves his Sunday-school teacher. That's hypocrisy."

La Canada is a Mexican village. Its stores bear such suggestiv titles as "The Saloon of Mercy," and "The True Faith." Every pulque shop, where men and women get mildly exhilarated on the juice of the maguey distilled in divers forms, shows the image of some saint or virgin set up among the bottles. One is called, "The pulqueria of the mother of God," and scores of others are dedicated similarly.

The Roman Catholics of Sharpsville, Pa., recently petitioned the school board to prohibit the reading of the Bible in the public schools. This action caused great excitement, and the decision of the board was awaited with deep interest. Finally the directors decided that the reading of the Bible must not be discontinued, but that all children whose parents object to such exercises may withdraw until they are concluded.

In Ontario passenger trains are not started on Sunday. Recently it was attempted on the Credit Valley, a new road, but so strong was the public feeling aroused that the company felt constrained to abolish the Sunday train. When the dominion government directed that the Welland Canal be opened during twelve hours of Sunday, so strong was the expression of public opinion on the subject that in a few weeks the order was countermanded.

Profane swearing seems to be on the increase in Spain. There are two articles in the Spanish constitutional code prescribing punishment for blasphemy; but there is no nation in Europe which has a worse reputation in this respect than the Spaniards. The provincial authorities hav petitioned their several governors to interfere energetically against the custom of swearing and cursing which "makes the Spanish people blush before the eyes of other civilized nations." The people of Spain need to blush not so much for the prevalence of profane swearing as for the degraded condition to which they hav allowed the Christian superstition to reduce them.

"It seems a pity for the cause of Christianity," remarks the San Francisco Ingleside, "that Ingersoll should hav departed in triumph with the boast that not a clergyman in this city, of any denomination, had the courage to break a lance with him; and now that the lion of Infidelity has stalked away, it is fair betting that the parsons will set up for themselvs an Infidel of straw, and beat and buffet it to their heart's content. 'What do you say to that?' they will shout to the lay Ingersoll. 'Ah! proud heretic, where are your arguments now?' and while they are thus defying and smiting their dummy, the true Robert is thousands of miles away."

There is at present visiting in this city, says a Syracuse paper, a clergyman who formerly had charge of a parish in the village of Essex, Essex county. For his service as preacher, and general advisor to the public, he received sufficient remuneration to enable him to keep body and soul together. A few years ago there was an unusually dry summer, and Essex county suffered in particular. The streams all dried up, and the farmers began to grow desperate. Finally, one Sunday the several clergymen in the village, with the exception of the divine in question, prayed for rain. The latter's parishioners were surprised that he did not do the same, and when church was over, one of them approached him and said: "Mr. T. why didn't you pray for rain?" "What! Pray for rain on my salary? No, sir! Not by a damned sight! I am not paid for extras."

At Oberlin, O., upon receiving news of Blaine's election, and without waiting for verification, the college students and citizens built a bonfire, discharged guns, fired anvils, and had a jubilee, winding up by serenading prominent Prohibitionists, including one of the professors, with tin pans and other unmusical implements. In their rounds they paid a visit to the residence of the Rev. Mr. Mills, a senior in the college, and an ordained minister, who has been a conspicuous advocate of the cause of the Prohibition party. The moment the charivari began in front of his house he fired four shots from a revolver into the crowd. One of the shots slightly wounded a student named Mitchel, piercing the edge of his ear and grazing the side of his head. Mills was arrested and held in $100 bail for trial. The feeling against him is reported to be strong.

In a speech at the "Celtic dinner" annually given in Britanny, M. Renan said: "We are true sons of Pelagius, who denied original sin. A censure which the Protestants are always addressing me is this, 'What does M. Renan do with sin?' Mon Dieu! I believe that I suppress it. I cannot understand those melancholy dogmas. I confess to you, the more I think over it the more I see that all philosophy is summed up in good humor. We Celts will never be Pessimistic Nihilists. On the brink of those abysses a smile from nature, or from a woman, will always save us. My mother, who died at eighty-seven, joked an hour before her death. . . . Trust to the experience of a compatriot. . . . I will not teach you the art of making a fortune; that specialty is unknown to me. But, nearing the end of my life, I can tell you something of an art in which I hav entirely succeeded; that is the art of being happy. . . . There is but one recipe for it; don't seek after happiness. . . . This is the upshot of my experience."

A young lady correspondent writes from New York to a Western paper: "I hav become a volunteer city missionary, a kind of modification of the London amusement of slumming. A girl takes an assignment from her pastor to visit a certain quarter where squalor abounds, and then goes there with food and clothes for body and mind—with sandwiches, so to speak, made of two slices of religious consolation and a bit of eatable meat between, with garments of real cloth trimmed with gospel fringe and angel down. The minister sent me to an Italian neighborhood, because I professed to know some Italian gibberish. I guess the Italian of the grand opera isn't the same that the organ-grinders and rag-pickers talk with. Anyhow, when I gave some of it to a twelve-year-old girl, she coolly replied that she didn't understand French, but knew English well enough. She was a tawny little ragamuffin, with big black eyes that were the only clean points visible about her. She was in a crowded tenement, and a baby was sprawling on the floor by her side. I let her hav all the texts that I could remember bearing on the besetments and temptations of childhood, and I put in some advice which had a bearing on the subject of courtship. 'The good-a lady too late-a," the small wretch replied; 'I'm a wife al-a-ready. This my baby.' Afterward I learned that Italian girls in New York do not relinquish the nativ Juliet idea of marrying about as soon as they get into their teens. Hereafter, in doing missionary work, I shall be sure to know the grounds."

Writing to the Independent, the Rev. Dr. Buckley says: "Art and religion, in Germany, are apparently on peaceful terms; but art has the higher place in the estimation of the people. In Protestant and Catholic Germany religion seems to be but an inferior manifestation of the same elements which reach their perfection in art. As a general proposition, only the lower classes and government officials in the Catholic churches exhibit reverence in the house of God. In the former case it is doubtless sincere; in the latter a matter of etiquette. The middle classes are absent, or listen and look as spectators. In the Protestant countries, on ordinary occasions, and with occasional exceptions, attendance upon the churches is very small. Art and amusements are, practically, substitutes for religion, to a large extent. If, occasionally, a protest be heard from the pulpit against the entire absorption of life in business and pleasure, it is either formal and feeble, or, if thoroughly earnest, the preacher is, indeed, the voice of one crying in the wilderness, while the multitudes, instead of going out to see him, and to bring forth fruits meet for repentance, throng the gardens and theaters."

When the Hon. William Nye, of Wyoming, was running a paper out West, some years ago, he relates that he had to call on a compositor to act as reporter one day. This is a sample of the printer's religious intelligence: "The Baptists here, we learn, hav been fortunate enough to secure the services of the Rev. John R. Lemon, formerly of Deer Lodge. After fooling with the water for so many years, the Baptist wing of Zion ought to duly appreciate the pious Lemon aid." Again: "The Methodists will hold a kind of festival and 'hooraw' at their rink on Second street, next Friday evening, for the benefit of the sun-burnt heathen of benighted Africa. It will be a grand pop-corn scuffle and molasses-candy tournament to which all are invited. The funds will be used for the purchase of chest-protectors to be sent to the heathen of Senegambia, who were not born in the gospel of light and liberty. The object is certainly a laudable one, and whether the committee sends the money to Africa or 'knocks it down,' as heretofore, those who attend the mush-and-milk debauch will no doubt hav a 'way-up time.' The pastor of the Presbyterian church on North A street is a little nervous about his salary, we learn, and has intimated to his charge that he will hav to call for additional pay or preach in a linen duster next winter. He says some fault was found with his sermon on faith, and how a little faith like a mustard plaster will finally 'leaven the whole lump;' but he claims that he did as well as he could. He says he never could preach a very good sermon on an empty stomach, anyhow. He told a reporter yesterday that all he had received since Christmas was a ball of pale butter and a kind word. He asked us if we knew a place where he could trade some kind words and good wishes and godspeeds, all in good repair, for a chunk of liver or something that was good to eat. Perhaps it is not the business of a secular paper to offer advice to a church; but it does seem to us as though the Presbyterians here had better brace up or make an assignment. No preacher can pound the Bible for fifty-two Sundays in the year and liv solely on our beautiful mountain scenery." Mr. Nye adds that the typographical reporter was paid off and permitted to resign.

News of the Week.

The Canadians are up in arms against Chinese cheap labor.

The cholera epidemic is reported to be on the increase in Paris.

Vanderbilt's mare, Maud S., has trotted at the rate of a mile in 2:8 3-4.

English people celebrated the forty-third birthday of the Prince of Wales on the 8th with festal ceremony.

William Jones, the man who attempted to shoot Guiteau, was tried in the Criminal Court at Washington, last Saturday, and promptly acquitted.

Ex-Mayor Grace was re-elected mayor of New York. The Tammany organization, claiming that Grace is not an American citizen, will contest the election.

The Republicans of Kansas burnt St. John, the Prohibition candidate, in effigy, last Saturday. They hold him responsible for the defeat of Mr. Blaine.

The election of Cleveland is regarded as certain by the Democrats and as uncertain by the Republicans. The ways of the political providence are past finding out.

The Salvation Army of Brooklyn are in the midst of a disgraceful quarrel, which promises to increase rather than subside. The trouble arose from a dispute about who is boss and who shall handle the funds.

The missionary steamer Morning Star has left Boston for Honolulu. Two missionary ships bearing the same name hav preceded the present one, and both were wrecked before the ministers had a chance to save a heathen.

The 27th of November has been appointed as a day of Thanksgiving and prayer. Gov. Cleveland's proclamation is especially fervent in its exhortations. This custom of appointing Thanksgiving days is getting to be an old joke.

St. John received more votes than Butler in the late election, though neither has reason to feel especially flattered at the numerical strength of his constituency. It is a curious fact that in the prohibition state of Maine Butler ran ahead of St. John.

Mrs. Belva Lockwood, it is feared, did her cause no lasting good by running for president on the Woman's Rights ticket. She is reported to hav said that she made $128 lecturing, and is therefore satisfied with the result. The female suffragists of this city repudiate Mrs. Lockwood altogether.

The private banking house of John M. Masterton, of Mt. Vernon, N. Y., has suspended payment, over $100,000 behind its liabilities. There are charges of rascality connected with the failure, such as paying privileged friends of the concern and letting others suffer. It is also rumored that Masterton bet heavily on the result of the election and lost, bankrupting the business. The depositors talk of a prosecution.

Mr. Joseph Pulitzer, a western man, has been doing quite well since he came East. A year or so ago he bought the New York World, a daily paper with religious inclinations, but which, with a circulation of about ten thousand, was in a moribund condition. Under the new control, the religious editer was abolished and the circulation of the paper increased steadily until the day after election, when 225,000 copies were printed and sold. Mr. Pulitzer was also elected to Congress.

The printers' union of this city is jubilant over the result of the election. The New York Tribune refused to pay union prices to its compositors, and the union resolved to boycott the Tribune and its candidate, Mr. Blaine. The printers control some three thousand votes, and as Cleveland's plurality in this state is less than half that number, they very reasonably claim that their influence decided the election. Right or wrong, the printers hav been the first to illustrate the power of organized labor in national politics.

A REPLY TO HERBERT SPENCER'S CRITICISM OF POSITIVISM.

BY FREDERIC HARRISON.

II.

I pass now to consider the fifteen pages of Mr. Spencer's article in which he attacks the writings of Auguste Comte. And I begin by pointing out that this was not at all the issue between us, so that this attack savors of the device known to lawyers as "prejudice," or "abusing the plaintiff's attorney." I gave reasons for thinking that the Unknowable could never be the foundation of a Creed. I added, in some twenty lines at most, that Humanity could be. Throughout my article I did not refer to Comte. My argument was entirely independent of any religious ordinances whatever, whether laid down by Comte or anyone else. Mr. Mill, in his work on Comte, has emphatically asserted that Humanity is an idea pre-eminently fitted to be the object of religion. And very many powerful minds agree with Mr. Mill so far, though they do not accept the organized form of religion as Auguste Comte conceived it. To what degree, and in what sense, I myself accept it, is not doubtful; for I hav striven for years past to make it known in my public utterances. But, until I put forward Auguste Comte as an infallible authority, until I preach or practice everything laid down in the "Positiv Polity," it is hardly an answer to me in a philosophical discussion to jest for the fiftieth time about Comte's arrogance, or about the banners to be used in the solemn processions, or about addressing prayers to "holy" Humanity. My friends and I address no prayers to Humanity as "holy" or otherwise; we use no banners, and we never speak of Comte as Mohammedans speak of Mohammed, or as Buddhists speak of Buddha. For my own part, I am continually saying, and I say it deliberately now, that I look upon very much that Comte threw out for the future as tentativ and purely Utopian. Since I hav held this language for many years in public, I do not think that Mr. Spencer is justified in describing me as a blind devotee. And when he parries a criticism of his own philosophy by ridiculing practices and opinions for which I hav never made myself responsible, I hardly think he is acting with the candid mind which befits the philosopher in all things.

For this reason I shall not trouble myself about the "eccentricities" which he thinks he can discover in the writings of Comte. A thousand eccentricities in Comte would not make it reasonable in Spencer to worship the Unknowable; and it would be hard indeed to match the eccentricity of venerating as the sole Reality that of which we only know that we can know nothing and imagin nothing. But there are other good reasons for declining to discuss with Mr. Spencer the writings of Comte. The first is that he knows nothing whatever about them. To Mr. Spencer the writings of Comte are, if not the Absolute Unknowable, at any rate the Absolute Unknown. I hav long endeavored to persuade Mr. Spencer to study Comte, all the more as he owes to him so much indirectly through others. But, so far as I know, I hav not induced him to do so. And his recent criticisms of these writings show the same thing. They add nothing, I may say, to the criticism contained in the work of Mr. Mill, or, indeed, to the obvious witticisms to be read any week in the Saturday Review. To turn over the pages of the "Positiv Polity" and find many things which seem paradoxical is an exercise easy enough; but to grasp the conceptions of Comte, or indeed of any philosopher, seriously, is labor of a different kind.

Nothing is easier than to make cheap ridicule of any philosopher whatever. The philosopher necessarily works in a region of high abstraction, and largely employs the resources of deduction. He is bound by his office to deal freely with wide generalizations; and to follow his principles across all apparent obstacles. Every philosopher accordingly falls from time to time into astounding paradoxes; he is always accused by the superficial of arrogance, by the wits of absurdity, by the public of blindness. It is the fate of philosophers; and the charges, it must be allowed, are often founded in reason. Descartes, Hobbes, Leibnitz, Hegel, may in turn be attacked for certain hypotheses of theirs as the most arrogant of men and the wildest of sophists. How often has Mr. Spencer shared the same fate! There are those who think that no other living man has ever ventured on assertions at once so dogmatic and so paradoxical. I hav too much respect for Mr. Spencer to quote any one of these wonderful bits of philosophic daring. I recognize in him a real philosopher of a certain order, and I seek to understand his system as a whole; nor am I dismayed in my studies by a thousand things in his theories, which certainly do seem to me very hard sayings. Mr. Spencer has himself just published a very remarkable work, "The Man versus the State," to which he hardly expects to make a convert except here and there, and about which an unfriendly critic might say that it might be entitled, "Mr. Spencer against All England." I shall not certainly criticise him for that. But it is a signal instance of the isolated position assumed from time to time by philosophers. Philosophers who liv, not so much in "glass houses" as in very crystal palaces of their own imagination, of all people, one would think, should giv up the pastime of throwing stones at their neighbor's constructions.

I giv an instance of the way in which Mr. Spencer misunderstands Comte. Mr. Spencer speaks of Comte's Historical Calendar as a "canonization," as a list of "saints," to be "worshiped" day by day, as a means of "regulating posterity," and as part of the "deification" of Humanity. And he further represents this list of historical names as a strictly classified selection of men in degree of personal merit. Now, every part of this view is an error. So far from this calendar being permanently imposed on posterity, Comte himself speaks of it as provisional, to serve a temporary purpose. And what is that purpose? Why, to impress on the mind the general course of human civilization. Comte calls it "a concrete view of man's history." It is not meant to be a classification in real order of merit. It is not essentially personal at all. The names are given and always spoken of as "types," concrete embodiments of manifold elements in the civilization of the past Over and over again Comte says that the type and its place are often chosen without reference to personal merit to represent a class, a nation, or a movement. They are not called or treated of as "saints." There is no "canonization," no "worship," no ascription of perfection, or absolute merit of any kind. The whole scheme from beginning to end is, what Comte calls it, a concrete view of man's history, a mode of impressing on the minds of modern men what they owe in so many ways to men in the past. The exigencies of a calendar, with its months, weeks, and days, preclude any real classification of merit; nor is any such thing attempted. It is a mode of teaching history, using the artifice of associating the names of certain famous men with months, weeks, and days. And the object is to impress on the mind the multiplicity of the forces and elements which make up civilization. To suppose that all names which occupy similar places represent men of exactly equal merit is a gratuitous piece of absurdity introduced into a fine conception. Even in the Church Calendar there is St. Paul's Day and St. Swithin's Day, though no one supposes that St. Swithin is regarded as the equal of St. Paul. But Comte's Historical Calendar has no analogy with the Catholic Calendar at all. It is a concrete view of history, intended to commemorate the sum of human civilization.*

I shall certainly not enter into any defense of it. It seems to me the best synthetic scheme of history which has ever been constructed on a single page. But I am far from supposing it perfect, nor do I doubt that it might easily be amended or revised. Mr. Spencer seems astounded that Cyrus and Godfrey, Terence and Juvenal, Froissart and Palissy, should hold in it the places they do. To discuss that question would involve a long historical argument, and I am not at all disposed to enter into any historical argument with Mr. Spencer. With all his scientific learning and his manifold gifts, Mr. Spencer is seldom regarded as having much to tell us within the historical field. It is here that his inferiority to Comte is most strikingly seen. Those who know the harmonious power with which Comte has called forth into life the vast procession of the ages can best judge how weak by his side Mr. Spencer appears. In Mr. Spencer's theory of history the past teaches little but a few Quaker-like maxims; that it is very like a savage to fight, and that military activity and superstition are the sources of all evil. Certainly Comte, as heartily as Spencer, has condemned the military spirit in this age, and the continuance of all fictitious beliefs. But he is not so blind to facts that he does not recognize the historical uses of the military life in the past, and the beauty of many theological types. And thus it is that he feels honor for Godfrey the Crusader, as well as for Socrates the philosopher; for the conquerors Cyrus and Sesostris, as well as for Penn the Quaker, and St. Paul the apostle.

There is a certain "fallacy of the Den" running through Mr. Spencer's historical notions, of which his article givs very striking examples. Possessed by his theory of indefinit "differentiation," the course of civilization presents itself to his mind as a perpetual development of new forces—progression in a constant series of divergent lines. According to this view of history, an institution, an idea, an energy which the civilization of to-day has abandoned is finally condemned; to revive it even under new forms is retrogression. Since savages respected their ancestors, it would be savage to respect our ancestors. Since we hav been tending, during the last two or three centuries, to lessen all temporal and spiritual influence on the individual, we must go on till we hav reduced both to zero. Since war is inhuman, the qualities and habits which the military life promoted are equally abominable. To revive anything which modern society has discarded is retrogression, for the test with Mr. Spencer is not whether it is relativly good or bad for man, but is found in the fact of Evolution absolutely.

Now this error affects all that Mr. Spencer says about the history of civilization. The truth is, as Comte has so wonderfully shown, the story of man's development is a tale of continued revival, reconstruction, and fresh adjustments of social life. Old habits, thoughts, and energies spring into a new life under altered forms and in new co-ordination. Development means not indefinit differentiation, but continuous growth, with organic re-adjustment of the organism to its environment. And that organic re-adjustment is constantly demanding the renewal of dormant elements, and the new uses of old things. I should be sorry to think that Humanity were for ever condemned to lose everything which the taste of this somewhat cynical, material, and democratic generation is pleased to throw off. The phrase, Retrogressiv Religion, does not frighten me at all. Any religion that the Future of Man is to hav will be retrogressiv in this sense: that it will revive something of religious feelings which were once more activ in the world than they happen to be to-day. Whether an enthusiastic regard for the welfare of our human race be retrogressiv religion or not I care little. I should hav thought it to be a new and a progressiv type of creed, more so than the worship of the Ultimate Cause, and the Creativ Power, and the All-Being; where I find, indeed (and where the Christian World finds also), retrogression into Metaphysics and Theology.

III.

I now turn to the question, If Humanity be an adequate object of religion?—a question, as I say, independent of the forms in which Comte proposed to constitute it. Mr. Mill, with all his hostility to Positivism, asserted emphatically that it was; and he went so far as to say that every other type of religion would be the better, in so far as it approached the religion of Humanity. And first let us note that Mr. Spencer has given a quite exaggerated sense to what we mean by Religion and Humanity by attaching to these ideas theological associations. The same thing is done by Sir James Stephen, and by all our theological critics. Mr. Spencer asks, What are the claims of Humanity to "Godhood?" Sir James Stephen talks of "Mr. Harrison's God," of "the shadow of a God," and he says he would as soon "worship" the ugliest idol in India as the human race. All this is to foist in theological ideas where none are suggested by us. Humanity is neither the shadow of God nor the substitute for God, nor has it any analogy with God. No one claims any "Godhood" for Humanity, or any perfection of any kind. We do not ask any one to "worship" it, as Hindoos worship idols, or as Christians worship God or the Virgin. If it misleads people, I am quite willing to spell humanity with a small "h," or not to use the word at all. I am quite content to speak of the human race, if that makes things clearer; I am ready to giv up the word "worship," if that is a stumbling-block, and to speak of showing affection and reverence. If people mean by religion going down on their knees and invoking a supernatural being, I will wait till the word "religion" has lost these associations.

The very purpose of the Positiv Scheme is to satisfy rational people that, though the ecstatic "worship" of supernatural divinities has come to an end, intelligent love and respect for our human brotherhood will help us to do our duty in life. So stated, the proposition is almost a truism; it is undoubtedly the practical conviction of millions of good people, and, as it seems, is that of Sir James Stephen. In plain words, the Religion of Humanity means recognizing your duty to your fellow-man on human grounds. This is the sum and substance of that which it pleases some critics and some philosophers to represent as a grotesque delusion. Whatever is grotesque in the idea is derived from the extravagance with which they themselvs distort that idea. I hav no wish to "worship" Humanity in any other sense than as a man may worship his own father and mother. A good man feels affection and reverence for his father and his mother; he can cultivate that feeling and make it the spring of conduct. And the feeling is not destroyed by his finding that his father and mother had the failings of men and women. Something of the affection, and more of the sense of brotherhood, which a man feels toward his own parents, he feels toward his family; not a little of it even to his home, his city, or his province, and much of it toward his country. Every good and activ man recognizes the tie that binds him to a widening series of groups of his kinsmen and fellow-men. In that feeling there are elements of respect, elements of affection, and elements of devotion, in certain degrees. That sense of respect, affection, and devotion can be extended wider than country. It can be extended, I say, as far as the human race itself. And since patriotism does not stop with our actual contemporaries, but extends to the memories and the future of our countrymen, so, I maintain, our feeling for the human race must include what it has been, as well as what it is to be. That is all that I mean by the religion of humanity. What is there of "grotesque," of the ugliest of Hindoo idols, and all the rest of it, in so common-place an opinion?

*A single example may show with how little care Mr. Spencer has looked at Comte. He complains that Comte should put Bichat above Newton, because he finds that Bichat heads a month in the Calendar, and Newton a week. Now, Comte never instituted any personal comparison between Newton and Bichat. But he explained that for the last month, which represents the course of modern science, he must choose a biologist and not a mathematician, on the ground of the superior importance of Biology. The Calendar was constructed more than thirty years ago, when certainly a thoroughly adequate type of Biology was not quite accessible. For grounds fully explained he chose Bichat. Newton takes his place with the mathematicians; but any idea that Bichat's intellect was superior to Newton's has not the smallest authority in anything said by Comte.

All good, and even all decent, men about us daily order their lives under a more or less effectiv sense of their social duties. They liv more or less for their wives, their children, their parents, their family. I do not deny that they liv largely for themselvs also; but with good men and good women the two strands of motiv are beautifully bound in one. And the better the man, the more close is the harmony between his social and his personal life. Outside their family, men hav other strong ties of duty and of regard for definit social groups. They will do much for their friends, their party, their profession, their church, their academy, their class, their city, their country. It is disgraceful to proclaim oneself indifferent to these claims; to refuse to make any sacrifice for them, to deny that we owe them anything, or that we feel any regard for them. There is nothing very heroic about all this in the average; and it is always more or less mixed up with personal motivs. But in the main it is good and wholesome, and bears noble witness to the marvelous social nature of man. Now, I do not say that this in itself is religion. But I mean by religion this sense of social duty, pushed to its full extent, strengthened by a sound view of human nature, and warmed by the glow of imagination and sympathy. It has been said in a vague way that religion is "morality touched by emotion." The religion of Humanity, as I conceive it, is simply morality fused with social devotion, and enlightened by sound philosophy.

Yet men who are known to liv under a practical sense of their social duties, men who would be ashamed to profess total unconcern for father, mother, wife, and child, friends, and fellow-citizens, are not ashamed to exhaust the terms of opprobrium for the collectiv notion of humanity; which after all is only made up of a multitude of fathers, mothers, wives, children, friends, fellow-citizens, and fellow-men. Mr. Spencer's whole life (as his friends know even better than the world) has been one of unfaltering devotion to his great mistress Philosophy, worthy to compare with any in the roll of the "lovers of wisdom." Sir James Stephen is no less widely known, not only for his indefatigable public services, but for his hearty private character; a devoted public servant, who, it is said, sentences even the worst criminal "gently, as if he loved him," under a strong sense of public duty. Yet these eminent men, whose entire lives are filled with social, rather than personal, energy, hav no words strong enough (for controversial purposes) to express their contempt for the human race. Mankind, says Mr. Spencer, is a "bubble," "a dull, leaden-hued thing." Sir James Stephen says it is "a stupid, ignorant, half-beast of a creature;" and he would as soon worship the ugliest Hindoo idol before which the nativs chop off the heads of goats. Why, this is the raving of Timon of Athens! These men are not cynics, but merely philosophers attacking an opponent. To my mind all this is sheer nonsense. Men known to be generous and self-devoted in every duty of social life are not believed when they utter tirades of this kind against mankind and human nature.

If the human race be "a half-beast of a creature," if it be this dismal "bubble," what else or what better hav we? Why should they, or any man, waste lives of effort in its service; what is the worth of anything generous, humane, and social? Humanity, I say, is nothing but the sum of all the forces of individual men and women; and if it be this mere bubble and half-beast, the men and women that make it up, and the human feelings and forces which hav created it, must be equally worthy of our loathing and contempt. In that case our only philosophy is a malignant pessimism, exceeding anything ever attempted in misanthropy before. I am no optimist; and I certainly see no "godhood" in the human race. I am as much alive to the vice and weakness of the human race as any one. But I feel, in common with the great majority of sound-hearted men, that there is a great deal of human nature in the human race, and that of good human nature; that the good abundantly predominates, and that the great story of human progress is on the whole a worthy and an inspiring record. At any rate, this planet, and, so far as we know, this Universe, has nothing (in the moral sphere) which is more worthy and more inspiring of hope. Nec viget quidquam simile, aut secundum. Divinities, and Absolute Goodnesses, and Absolute Powers hav ended for us. The relativ goodness and power of our race remains a solid reality. It is bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh; the stuff whereof our mothers, and our fathers, our sons and our friends, our fellow-citizens are made; whereof are made all who with us and beside us are striving to liv a humane life.

I will not do my friends the injustice of supposing that any regard for men which they acknowledge is confined to their own belongings and circles, and that for the rest of mankind they feel (what they assert) supreme contempt and dislike. Their words would suggest it. To Mr. Spencer Europe presents nothing but the revolting prospect of "a hundred millions of Pagans masquerading as Christians." Sir James Stephen says that a majority of the human race cannot read, and devote their time to nothing but daily labor. Are they mere beasts for that? Some of the greatest and best of men could not read; some of the noblest natures on earth are spent in the hovel and the garret of the poor. It is the task of the religion of Humanity to correct such antisocial thoughts, the besetting sin of the philosopher and the man of power. It will teach their pride that the nobility of human nature is to be found chiefly in the cottage and the workshop; where the untaught mother is lavishing on her children unutterable wealth of tenderness; where the patient toiler is subduing the earth that for the common good wise men may hav an earth whereon to think out the truth, and the poet and the artist may hav materials to satisfy us all with beauty.

Comte, of all men, did not choose out of five hundred names to be "worshiped" as "saints," devoting the five hundred millions to oblivion. He taught us to see the greatness of human nature in the love and courage of the ignorant, as well as in the genius and the might of the hero. And when we think of Humanity our minds are not set on a band of the "elect," but on the millions who people this earth and subdue it, leaving each century on the whole a richer inheritance in comfort, in thought, in virtue—millions not in the civilized world only, but in the rude plains of Asia, and of Africa, where the Hindoo struggles to rear an honest household in his plot of rice-field, and the fellah yields to the will of Heaven with sublime patience, whilst retaining uncrushed his human heart. Assuredly it is no "godhood" that we see there, no pride of human reason, no millennium, or transfiguration of Man. But it is human nature, sound down to its depths; rich with unfathomable love wherever there is a mother and a child, and rich with undying courage wherever there is the father of an honest and thriving household.

But it is not the present generation which absorbs our thoughts. Mankind, as we see it to-day, is neither godlike nor very sublime. But the story of human progress during fifty centuries, from the "half-beast" that it once was in the pre-historic ages down to the ideal civilization which we surely foresee in the far-off ages to come—this is sublime. Or, if not sublime in the way in which the fairy-tale of Paradise, or the Creation of the Universe, is sublime, it is still the most splendid tale of moral development of which we hav any certain record. I am not at all disenchanted when I am reminded of the savagery, the bestiality, or even the cannibalism of man's early career. There were noble savages even in the Paleolithic ages, and even the earliest type of man was superior in something, I suppose, to contemporary types of the ape. But such as he was I accept him as the ancestor of the human race, to whom it owes its first beginning. The glory of Humanity is not lost, in that it was once so low, but lies in that, beginning so low, it is now so high.

It is for this reason that Comte has insisted so much on the Past, and the religious value of a true conception of human civilization. It shocks Mr. Spencer to look with anything but horror on our fighting and savage forefathers. But, such as they were, they made civilization possible. And the grandeur of human civilization as a whole can only be realized in the mind when it constantly dwells on the enormous record of its progress from the half-bestial beginnings out of which it has slowly arisen by incalculable efforts and hopes. Still, it is a record of much failure, of shortcoming at the best. And, for this reason, Positivism dwells quite as much in the Future as in the Past. Endless progress toward a perfection never, perhaps, to be reached, but to be ideally cherished in hope, a hope which every stroke of science and every line of history confirms to us, and with which every generous instinct of our nature beats in unison—such is the practical heaven of our faith. As there is no godhood now in humanity, so there is no Paradise in its future. Past, Present, and Future, all alike dwell on this earth; on the facts of man's actual career in the dwelling-place that he has made for himself thereon.

Mr. Spencer is himself far too much of a philosopher, and too much of a believer in moral progress, not to hav a deep faith in this very march of civilization of which Humanity, as I understand it, is at once product and author. He says himself: "Surely civilized society, with its complex arrangements and involved processes, its multitudinous material products and almost magical instruments, its language, science, literature, art, must be credited to some agency or other." The words are not mine, but his. That is to say, the story of human civilization is a very noble record, demanding, as he admits, "veneration and gratitude" somewhere. And in these words he throws to the winds "the bubble," and "the dull, leaden-hued thing," "the hundred million Pagans masquerading," "the stupid, ignorant, half-beast of a creature," as the judge calls it. The human race then is not the odious bubble; on the contrary, the splendid story of human civilization must fill us with a sense of "veneration and gratitude." But by astonishing perversity, as it seems to me, by long habit of "persistent thinking along defined grooves," Mr. Spencer has nothing but contempt for the human race, and lavishes his "veneration and gratitude," called out by the sum of human civilization, upon his Unknowable and Inconceivable Postulate. This is to me to outdo the ingratitude of the theologians who find "man only vile," and who ascribe every good thing in man's evil nature to an ineffable Being. Since Mr. Spencer agrees with me that "veneration and gratitude," for all that man has become, are due somewhere, I prefer to ascribe it to that human race which we know and feel; and which, so far as we can see, has fashioned its own destiny, in spite of tremendous obstacles in his environment; rather than to a logician's formula, about which the logician himself tells us that he knows nothing and conceives nothing.

Mr. Spencer has labored to prove that Humanity (which he himself has so admirably described as a real organism) is unconscious. He might hav spared his pains. Neither Comte, nor any rational Positivist, has ever regarded Humanity as conscious. And, for that reason, nothing will induce me to address Humanity as a conscious being, or in any way whatever to treat it as a Person. In that respect it stands on the same footing as Mr. Spencer's Unknowable, except that I say frankly that I hav not the least reason to suppose Humanity to be conscious; whilst he will not say that his Unknowable may not be conscious (as it might be a gooseberry or a parallelopiped). And then Mr. Spencer goes on to argue that, since Humanity is not conscious, that concludes the matter; "for gratitude cannot be entertained towards something which is unconscious." And by a really curious inconsistency he asserts that "veneration and gratitude" are due toward the Unknowable, which he has just told us cannot be conceived in terms of consciousness at all! So that he will not let me feel any gratitude to the human race, my own kindred, because it is unconscious; and he asks me to bestow it all on his unconscious, or non-conscious, or outside-of all-consciousness Unknowable.

Apart from this singular slip in logic, he says much about the unconsciousness of the human race which amazes me. Why cannot a man feel any gratitude toward that which is unconscious? He tells us to examin our consciousness. Well! Did all the gratitude which he felt during life to his own parents, teachers, and benefactors cease at the instant of their death? I cannot find it in my consciousness. My gratitude to my parents is the same, living or dead; and, if gratitude to one parent can be expressed and answered in words, whilst gratitude to the other lies but in the silent communing of the heart, I cannot find that the one gratitude differs from the other, save that this last is the deeper, more abiding feeling. And, if a man is unworthy of the name of man who can feel no gratitude to a parent or a benefactor, the moment they are laid cold in death, why cannot a man feel grateful to the school where he was trained, or the church wherein he was reared, or the country of his forefathers and his decendants? And by school, church, or country, I mean the men therein grouped, some known, some unknown, some by personal contact, some by spiritual influence, by whose labor he has reaped and grown.

Mr. Spencer goes further in the same line. Since the human race, he says, was unconscious whilst slowly evolving its own civilization, since the individual men and women were not consciously conferring any benefits on us, and very partially foresaw the result of their own labor, we owe them no gratitude. They acted automatically or like coral-polyps by instinct, following their own natures, satisfying their own craving, and we owe them no more gratitude than we owe to hogs for fattening, or to sheep for growing woolly coats. Watt, according to this view, invented the steam-engin to make money, or occupy his mind. Newton and Leibnitz toiled only for fame. If the poets and artists created beauty, it was because they liked beauty, and hoped for reward. I confess this seems to me to strike at the root of morality and all estimate whatever of human greatness and merit. A philosopher will tell us next that he owes no gratitude to the father who begat him, or the mother who nursed him; for both were obeying instincts which they share with the lowest animals. If heroes, poets, and thinkers are mere automata, selfishly and blindly following instincts, like the polyps working their tentacles and thereby forming a coral reef, morality, and most of the moral qualities of men, are things which we cannot predicate of man at all.

Man is no doubt a highly complex being, and his

The Presidential Flection.

The canvass of the vote shows the election of Cleveland as president. This is due to the fact that in the state of New York thousands of Republicans voted for Cleveland and Butler, and others declined to vote for Mr. Blaine. Mr. Blaine relied for success on the tariff, the Protestant clergy, an increased Catholic vote, and a trade with one wing of the Democracy in New York city. His friends in their campaign speeches sneered at the Agnostics, while they indorsed Mr. Blaine as a devout Presbyterian. The fact that Mr. Blaine was a churchman was used as a trump card. The fact that Cleveland had vetoed supply bills for Catholic institutions was sent out by the National Republican Committee to incite hatred against Cleveland as an anti-Catholic bigot. The clergy sat in secret inquisition upon Mr. Cleveland's private character, and published broadcast their indictments.

Mr. Blaine declined to answer requests to define his position on the question of Secularism in politics. He professed to be committed to the tariff as the great issue, and treated the Liberals as entitled to less respect than the Prohibitionists. His speeches toward the last touched upon the question of church and state. This was especially true after the famous alliterativ indictment of the Democratic party by Dr. Burchard, as the party devoted to "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion." Mr. Blaine did not allude to this at the time, nor define his position then, but accepted the ovation tendered him as the opponent of the repres ntativ of the three evils. When the Catholics denounced this reference to them as of the nature of a crucifixion between two thieves, Mr. Blaine apologized for Burchard, and defined himself as in favor of equal rights for all sects, giving the same rights to the Protestant, the Catholic, and the Hebrew. He was careful to leave the Agnostics out of the list of men entitled to equal rights. Instead of saying that there could not, and ought not to be, any religious tests in a government founded on equal rights, that under our flag all sects were equally protected, and every man, Christian or Atheist, had the same rights and privileges, he narrowed his platform so as to include only Christians and Jews.

This policy of Blaine's was part of the fixed policy for this campaign. The platform was made to fit the man.

In 1876, the seventh plank of the Republican platform was:

"The public school system of the several states is the bulwark of the American republic, and with a view to its security and permanence, we recommend an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, forbidding the application of any public funds as property for the benefit of any schools or institutions under sectarian control."

The Democratic plat orm denounced this as a "false issue with which they [Republicans] would enkindle sectarian strife in respect to the public schools."

In 1880, the Republican platform contained the following:

"4. The Constitution wisely forbids Congress to make any law respecting an establishment of religion, but it is idle to hope that the nation can be protected against the influence of sectarianism while each state is exposed to its domination. We, therefore, recommend that the Constitution be so amended as to lay the same prohibition upon the legislature of each state, and to forbid the appropriation of public funds to the support of sectarian schools."

The Republican platform of 1884 made the tariff the main issue, referred to the union of church and state only in denunciation of polygamy, and omitted the secular amendment proposed in 1880. The protection of civil and political rights, which was the keystone of the Republican cr ed in 1880, was supplanted by pr tection of American against foreign manufactures. Personal property was placed above personal rights; wealth abo e liberty.

There was, therefore, nothing in the platform of the Republican party or in its candidate to call for the support of the Liberals of the nation. While unable to find a candidate upon whom they could unite, they felt under no obligation to take a choice of evils, or to vindicate the reputation for chastity of either Blaine or Cleveland. The difference between the two parties was only a proposed reduction of twenty per cent in tariff duties, and that was an issue of little importance to the friends of secularism in politics. A vote for either of the candidates for president would hav been a vote thrown away on the question of equal rights and the severance of church and state. Some Liberals voted for Blaine or Butler under protest; others did not vote for president at all. The St. John party presented a platform spiced with bigotry, and a candidate who gloried in his orthodoxy, and expected prayer and faith in God would secure the needed ballots to elect him.

The duty of Liberals seems clear. They hav the right to demand from the national and state legislatures legislation on the basis of equal rights and a secular government. Work can be done now; the proper demand can be made for the necessary changes in the laws. The members of those bodies can be compelled to make a record for or against secular legislation. Their votes will be an index to future support of these men if they should ask the votes of Liberals. By prompt and energetic action, something can be done this winter to put the secular movement on a broad, living basis, and to make it one of the vital issues of the next presidential campaign.

Canadian Notes.

The Montreal Secular Society was formed some years since, perhaps seven or eight. They hav always been in a very flourishing condition, plenty of funds for all requirements, and probably a thousand dollars or more spare cash on hand at the bank. The members are of a class somewhat similar to the Ottawa society. They mostly move in good circles socially, and mentally are persons of education and literary culture.

The Christian superstition appears to be on the wane. Fast days, like most threatened institutions, die hard; but that they are near the end of their existence is very evident. The Free Presbytery of Glasgow has adopted a resolution unanimously recommended by the united conferences of the Presbyterian churches of that city "that the continuance of the present sacramental fast days has ceased to be for the edification of the Christian community."

In Hamilton, a Secular Society started into existence about the year 1877. Some seven years since it flourished for a while, but I believe ceased to exist a year or two ago. About the year 1878, this society got up a series of lectures of a very high character—scientific and otherwise—which were very successful, and were productiv of much good in promoting the Secular cause in the city of Hamilton, the "ambitious city."

On a late Sunday evening, in the Secular Hall, Toronto, an essay and debate came off, on the subject of "The Causes of the Rise of Christianity." On the next Sunday evening, Mr. W. B. Cook spoke in the same hall, and the Sunday following Mr. H. Sells will lecture on a popular secular subject. The attendance at these lectures is good, and the audience at the morning meetings is so increased as to render necessary a larger hall.

At Lindsay about seven or eight years ago a Secular society and reading-rooms (open to the public) were in activ operation, and continued as a useful institution for some years. Lindsay is one of the pioneer Canadian towns in the matter of Secularism. There are a number of veteran hearty and wholesouled Freethinkers in and around that locality. Money has been sent forth freely and with an open hand from Lindsay to aid the cause of Agnosticism in various localities, including the city of Boston, Mass., and all parts of the United States and Canada.

I listened to a sermon by one of Toronto's popular preachers, in which he said: "Secularists are trying to prove that there are contradictions in the Bible. I don't care if you can prove that there are ten thousand contradictions in holy writ. Freethinkers say that there are a lot of foolish stories and ridiculous and impossible miracles. I don't care if you succeed in proving and establishing all this. I don't care a snap of my finger for anything else you can prove about the book from Genesis to Revelations. You cannot take away this; there will always remain this: The character of the life of Christ, the character of the teachings of Christ, and these constitute Christianity." Verily, we liv in an age of progress. Needs must when the devil drives. Even orthodox theology is compelled to move by the increasing intelligence of the times. Civilization is ameliorating the barbarous superstitions of Christianity.

Allen Pringle, of Selby; W. McDonnell, of Lindsay; Mr. Le Seuer, of Ottawa; George Iles, of Montreal; Phillips Thompson, of Toronto; and many other excellent and well-known writers and speakers hav assiduously used their talents and energies during the last ten or twelve years in battling for the cause, and fighting the good fight for Agnosticism and Secularism.

On Monday Mr. Watts lectured at Meaford to a house crowded to the doors in every part. Many turned away disappointed, as there was not room enough to stand a dog upright on his hind legs. On Tuesday Owen Sound was Agnosticized with an audience as densely packed as herrings in a barrel. Thunders of applause greeted the lecturer at every point. On Wednesday Walkerton was treated to a rouser. The citizens turned out en masse, and the crowds who listened to the lecturer displayed the utmost enthusiasm.

It is now a number of years since Selby, Aylmer, and Napanee distinguished themselvs as pioneers in the work of Secularism. They inaugurated lectures and debates on Secularism both in the public press and on the public platform about ten years ago, or more. In the years 1874 and 1875, those towns created quite a sensation in Canada by engaging the editor of the Index to deliver a series of lectures, and engage in debates in that locality. The example of these towns led the way, and was the cause and origin of the Toronto Secular Society being formed in 1875—it was founded by two gentlemen of the press, Mr. Haskin and Mr. Phillips Thompson. Mr. Haskin had previously been a member of the Dialectic Society of London, England. He was a gentleman of great intellectual attainments, and his untimely death by drowning (just after he had established the society) was deeply regretted. Mr. Phillips Thompson is well known as a lecturer and poet, as well as a political writer and general literary man of great ability. His views are extremely broad and liberal; he is a warm sympathizer with the rights of labor and the struggling masses; he sides with the producers as against the monopolists. More power to your elbow, Phillips Thompson!

The death is reported at Chicago of the Rev. T. W. Handford, formerly pastor of the Bond-street Congregational church, Toronto, and previously preacher at Bolton, Yorkshire, and London, England. Many Britishers will remember having heard him preach at Spurgeon's Tabernacle to crowded audiences. By many of the most competent judges of oratory, he was accounted one of the most eloquent speakers that ever stood on a platform. The elegant building in which Mr. Handford preached, while making Toronto his home, will hold 2,500 persons, and was filled to overflowing every Sunday night when he occupied the pulpit. His was a stormy and troubled existence from the cradle to the grave. May his faults lie gently on him. Peace to his ashes.

The public press, in commenting on Mr. Watts's lecture at Meaford, say that at the door outside there was a man, Bible in hand, shouting in a crazy manner, and warning people, as they hoped to be saved, to avoid Watts as they would the devil. He was a Salvation Army man from Owen Sound. One paper remarks that the wave of Secularism passing over the civilized world is not to be denied. That Agnosticism is on the increase is not to be denied. Men of thought are disgusted with the old wives' tales of Eve eating an apple and thereby entailing all suffering upon the human family. The ark story is pronounced a gross absurdity even by Christians. That a whale ever swallowed Jonah in the Mediterranean sea (where there probably never was a whale any more than in the lake in Central Park) is exploded for many good reasons. That poor Mrs. Lot was ever turned into a pillar of salt for Jersey cows to lick at, is not credited. That any gentleman ever raised a row in heaven, where no sin can exist, and afterward set up for himself with an inexhaustible supply of brimstone, chemistry does not verify. But Christians tell us we must believe all these nonsensical stories or go to hell. Secularism is rapidly spreading; it is growing and gaining in strength every day, while Christianity, with its ridiculous dogmatisms, is rotting away.

On Friday Mr. Watts broke more new ground, this time at Gananoque. It was the first Secularist lecture ever delivered there. The town hall was densely packed, and the applause given to the Secular lecturer was hearty in the extreme. Gananoque has hitherto been a hotbed of orthodoxy.

A Canadian newspaper when reviewing Agnosticism remarked that the only heaven and hell is right here upon this earth. It is impossible for the finite to comprehend the infinit. All our knowledge is relativ. Relativly we know that the earth is distant from the sun somewhere about ninety to one hundred million miles. Absolutely we do not know where it is. Space and time are both infinit. We say that an infinit number of suns and spheres are traveling through space. We know what a mile is, because it is like ourselvs, finite. Is space composed of an infinit number of miles? No, it cannot be composed of an infinit number of finites. So we may reason with time. Eternity is not composed of an infinit number of moments. Man cannot think it, or measure any part of it, as it is not composed of parts.

Astronomical propositions hav been formulated to show the unthinkable nature of time, direction, space, etc., such as this well-known one: A ship is on the equator. Its bow points exactly west, and its stern east. It is going ten miles an hour. A man starts at the bow and walks toward the stern. Which way is he going? First you will say east, then you will say, no, as the ship is moving the other way faster. But hold on! the world moves from west to east over a thousand miles an hour. Now, which way is the man walking? You hav to think twice. But the earth whirls around the sun at a fearful rate, and the man is actually going toward the ecliptic. But the earth, the sun, and all the worlds and all the suns are going with unthinkable rapidity, and in unthinkable direction, and no man knows which way the sun is going. All he knows is, that he is right here on the ship. Like the old Indian in the woods, in answer to the question if he were lost, "No; Indian no lost. Indian right here. Wigwam lost."

On Sunday evening last, in Montreal, a reception was given at the residence of Mr. Boaz; when a numerous company assembled to welcome Mr. Watts to the metropolis of Canada.

The Christian clergy assume a variety of roles; among the rest, that of the cowardly bear in the fable of the bear and the dogs. Æsop tells us that once upon a time, a long, long time ago, a bear swore eternal friendship with a wolf. They each took a solemn oath to the other to stand by him and help him to fight his battles with him, and whenever the life of one was in danger, the other should stand by him and fight for him to the last, and, if necessary, die with him. They then set forth as sworn brothers, to go through the world and seek their fortunes. They hadn't gone far when they were attacked in the most determined and savage manner by three ferocious dogs of a gigantic size and power. The cowardly bear skulked up a tree, out of harm's way, and left his friend, the wolf, to fight it out by himself or get killed by the enemy, as the case might be. But the brave wolf, with his back to the tree (in which the bear was skulking), fought so desperately that the three dogs were glad to take to their heels and run off. When the bear had watched the dogs until they were safely out o: sight, he came down out of his hiding-place, and with an air of bullying, swaggering braggadocio, seemed to be spoiling for a fight; he shouted with stentorian voice, "Where are the dogs? I want to fight." Some of the Canadian clergy assume the role of the cowardly, skulking bear. When Watts is present they skulk like a frightened cur with his tail between his trotters. After they hav watched Watts safely out of sight, they come out of their holes and hiding-places, and lecture in reply to the man they dare not face when present.

Mr. Watts, during the last week, has lectured in various Canadian cities and towns, and the Secularists of Hamilton and Montreal hav been doing their level best to induce the clergy to allow their champion, Dr. Sexton, to engage in debate with the apostle of Secularism; but no, you cannot catch them at being true to their professions by testing them in debate; it makes them shrink into their boots with terror at the bare idea of exhibiting their vain imaginings and tomfooleries in the light of day, in the presence and opposition of facts and realities. It would appear that when the clergy got washed in the blood of the lamb, the chemical effect was produced of whitening their livers to that extent that they hav been totally unable to screw their courage to the sticking place (of toeing the scratch) ever since.

Toronto, Nov. 8, 1884. R. B. Butland.

Mr. Charles Watts lectured in Montreal Nov. 2d, 3d, and 4th, to large audiences, thus concluding his present Canadian tour, which has proved most successful in every respect. Mr. Watts has been fortunate in having such an efficient John the Baptist as Dr. Sexton to prepare the way for him. In several cities he has been preceded him with his lecture on the "Follies of Atheism," and the clergy hav been congratulating themselvs on having such an able defender of the faith amongst them. But somehow when the question of a public debate has been mooted, they hav found discretion the better part of valor, and hav refused to allow their champion to take up the gauntlet which has been thrown down to him.

This policy of stifling free discussion has been the subject of considerable discussion in the Montreal press, and the result was that at Mr. Watts's first lecture, every available inch of space was occupied, and the crush was so great that the doors of the hall had to be removed to allow those who were still outside the opportunity of hearing the lecture.

The Montreal Times of the next day contained the following:

"AGNOSTICISM AND ATHEISM.

"The recent lectures of Dr. Sexton on this and kindred subjects hav evidently attracted considerable attention amongst the thinking portion of the community, more especially since he was not permitted to engage in a public debate. Curiosity was also stimulated as to what kind of a man the Freethinkers were willing to bring forward as their champion, and as an opportunity of gratifying it was offered yesterday afternoon, the Freethought Lecture Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity (many being unable to obtain admittance) with an audience eager to hear Mr. Watts's discourse on 'Agnosticism and Atheism.' Mr. Watts is a very interesting speaker, forcible in argument, earnest and convincing in his style, and thoroughly versed in all the arts of the trained debater. This was apparent in his replies to the two or three gentlemen who opposed him at the close of the lecture. Here he showed himself to be a perfect master of controversy, courteous to his opponents, yet arguing with powerful ability and force, which readily explained why his admirers were so anxious to arrange for a public debate with Dr. Sexton."

Mr. C. B. Thompson, of St. Catherine's, Ont., thus writes concerning Remsburg's Cassadaga speech: "I hav just finished reading 'Bible Morals.' It is a gem of the first water. It should be put in pamphlet form, and scattered throughout the whole of Christendom."

LIBERALS OF DELAWARE, EASTERN MARYLAND, AND VIRGINIA.—MEETING AT PHILADELPHIA. PA., NOV. 30TH.

The many demands for the services of Messrs. Watts and Putnam render it impossible for them to attend meetings in the above-named places, until they return from their Western tour.

Many friends hav written of their desire to aid in the good work, realizing that the upbuilding of the National Liberal League in one section, advances the interests of all.

N. W. Nock, of Seaside, Va, writes:

"Mr Putnam, Dear Sir: I notice that Mr. Watts and yourself are billed for Philadelphia on the 30th. Would not that be a proper time and place at which to assemble the Liberals of the surrounding states, especially of Delaware, Eastern Maryland, and Virginia? I am satisfied that the many Liberals living in the sections referred to would be glad to meet you and each other and do something for the cause in their respectiv sections. Consider this proposition, and if you think well of it, let the announcement go forth at once. And I am sure many of the earnest friends in the states named will be present. Fraternally yours, N. W. Nock."

This is an excellent suggestion. Let all attend that can possibly do so. Consult with Messrs. Watts and Putnam, and arrangements can be perfected by which an impetus will be given to the work in all the above places and the way paved for Messrs. Watts and Putnam that insure success, ultimating in efficient organization, rapid growth, and consequent triumph of secularization.

THE NEWARK LEAGUE.

Last Sunday afternoon, Charles B. Reynolds, chairman of the Executiv Committee of the National Liberal League, spoke at the Newark League's cosy rooms, on "Why I Left the Pulpit." The audience numbered about seventy-five. Political excitement, with a poor lecture or two, has thus far kept the attendance much below the average of last fall and winter. Mr. Reynolds occupied some two hours in relating his religious experience the audience following him attentivly. He made many telling hits at the Bible and the church, which were roundly applauded, and kept his listeners in good humor by the incidental recital of ludicrous stories. At the conclusion of his address, the audience were requested, if they had anything to say, to ask questions, as the time for debate was limited. One Christian gentleman fired a few interrogation points at Mr. Reynolds, which were duly straightened out by him, and some others sought and found enlightenment. Mr. Reynolds is a good Biblical scholar and enjoys imparting what he knows about the holy scriptures to others. He will lecture before the Liberal Club of New York Friday evening.

At the conclusion, a finely framed lithograph of the D. M. Bennett monument was presented to the League by Mr. Alexander Jarvis, who received therefor a unanimous vote of thanks from his fellow-Leaguers, who appreciated his public spirit.

Next Sunday Messrs. Watts and Putnam will be the attraction at the League. The secretary will briefly discourse on League matters, and Mr. Watts will lecture on "Religious Fanaticism, and Secular Philosophy." Sunday evening Mr. Watts will speak at the German Masonic Hall, 220 East 15th street, New York.

A SUGGESTION FROM MR. REYNOLDS.

One of the advantages of efficient organization of the National Liberal League will be the protection it will afford its members against being victimized by chronic frauds, deadbeats, and professors (their professorship consisting in a lifelong experience, entitling them to graduate in vagabondism), who crowd themselvs into the homes of unsuspecting Liberals, and, like leeches, are hard to shake off.

This class are always self-styled workers for the cause, lecturers, mediums, etc., and desire to hold meetings—mere schemes to extort money. Their meetings, when held, disappoint and disgust all reputable persons who attend, while their conduct brings the very name of Spiritualist, Liberal, or Freethinker into contempt. They are impecunious barnacles, and should be rigidly ignored.

The Boston Meeting.

The National Liberal League Campaign meetings began at Paine Hall, Boston, Sunday, Nov. 9th, afternoon and evening. An address of welcome was made by Horace Seaver, the veteran editor of the Investigator. He eloquently presented the claims of Liberalism and the Liberal League, and the brightening prospects of the cause of science and humanity. Out of his own experience and effort of fifty years, he told the notable incidents of Freethought history, of those old-time heroes who accomplished such great things in the beginning of the struggle. Out of the past, rich with heroic consecration, he prophesied the glory of the future. He only hoped that he could liv to see the brightness of the coming day. One thing anyway he said he had, if nothing more, and that was the gift of continuance. A half century givs abundant evidence of this noble possession. Besides this, however, we know that Horace Seaver has the gift of happy speech, of cultivated reason, of supreme honesty of conviction, and he will occupy a bright and honorable place in the history of Liberalism.

After this eloquent address, Mr. Putnam presented the claims of the National League as embodying the principle of justice and the spirit of comradeship. The time had come for a vast organization of Liberals—a commonwealth of free minds and hearts working for one great end.

The response to Mr. Putnam's appeal was most generous, and $194 was contributed in a few minutes to the treasury of the League. Mr. Photius Fisk, a friend to all good causes, contributed $100; J. P. Mendum, $25; Horace Seaver, $10, and so on. A more particular account of these contributions will be given next week, time forbidding an ampler report in this hurried survey. Mr. Watts then made one of his masterly addresses, on "Religious Fanaticism and the Secular Philosophy." He showed the reasons why fanaticism was in itself wrong, and then traced its history of blood and fire whereby it had cursed humanity. In contrast with this, he showed the benefits of reason, the achievements of science, and the nobility of man and this world. He demonstrated the justice of the Nine Demands; that they were opposed to fanaticism, for fanaticism was the fountainhead of injustice; that they were based in human rights, and were necessary to the advancement of humanity, and must be insisted upon at all hazards. To this he consecrated his life, to this he summoned the Liberal world.

In the evening the meeting was continued. The total amount contributed was $211 75. Boston has indeed grandly responded to the call of the hour, and her encouragement pronounces success on the new work of the League.

Mr. Watts gave an address on "Agnosticism." As Mr. Seaver said, it was one of the best lectures ever given in Paine Hall. It was alive with logic, and vindicated the noblest philosophical principle of human thought. It struck the key-note of Liberalism, which is intellectual charity. Belief is one thing, knowledge is another. Science is the source of knowledge. Only through knowledge can the race progress. The Agnostic does not dogmatize. He claims no superior information. He believes in nature. We cannot transcend the senses. The supernatural is beyond our grasp. This world we realize. Here lies our duty. Here unfolds our destiny. He is safe who is true to his own conviction. In manhood we find victory in life or in death.

The meetings were eminently successful, and Boston has shown a noble generosity and splendid enthusiasm in the new work that lies before the Liberals of America.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. Remsburg will begin a debate with the Rev. C. C. Rowley, at Stewartsville, Mo., Nov. 18th.

Dr. J. L. York will speak in Oakland during November, and in Los Angeles, El Monte, Pomona, Anaheim, Santa Ana, Westminster, San Bernardino, and other points in southern California during the winter.

E. H. Heywood has called a meeting of the "American Labor Reform League," at Clarendon Hall, Sunday, November 16th; three sessions daily—at 10:30; at 2:30, and 7:30 in the evening. The object of the meetings is to help along the good time when no usury shall be taken, and the people shall hav free trade, free land, free money, free speech, free mails. Several speakers of ability are advertised to be present.

There will be two Freethought lectures in this city this week The first is by C. B. Reynolds, at the Liberal Club, Friday night. Subject, "National Liberal League Secularization Through Organization." The second will be by Charles Watts on Sunday evening at the Liberal Club hall, 220 East 15th st., on "Agnosticism and Modern Thought." Next week, Thursday evening, Nov. 20th, a grand Liberal sociable will be held at the same place. Reception to the League officers from eight to ten, with music, and dancing from ten to twelve. Let every Liberal in this city and vicinity try to attend and make things pleasant for our guests.

moral, intellectual, and physical natures are blended in marvelous ways. It was never pretended by the optimist that any man has acted uniformly on the noblest motivs; but it has never been asserted by the pessimist that he acts invariably on the vilest. It is a mark of the meanest nature to refuse to acknowledge a benefit, on the ground that the benefactor was not wholly absorbed with the wish to benefit, or entirely aware of the extent of his benefit. For my part, I refuse to measure out my sense of gratitude to my human benefactors, known or unknown, by so niggardly a rule. I trust that Raphael and Shakspere did enjoy their work. But I love and admire the genius in which they reveled. Humanity is rich with gratitude to those who knew not the value of the services they were rendering, just as it is to those whose names and services are covered in the vast wave of time. What becomes of Patriotism, if it be open to us to sneer out that the men who fought our battles or made our country wanted nothing but money or fame? What becomes of family affection, if a man can tell his mother that bore him that if she reared children it was only what cats and rabbits do?

The religion of Humanity, as we understand it, is nothing but the idealized sum of those human feelings and duties which all decent men acknowledge in detail and in fact. All healthy morality, as well as all sound philosophy, show us that the sum total of all this mass of life is good, and is tending toward better. As Mr. Spencer admits, civilized society as a whole must command "admiration and gratitude" somewhere. This being so, the sneers of philosophers and cynics may be left out of sight. I shall not follow Mr. Spencer in the wails of his jeremiade over the folly and wickedness of his contemporaries. Millions, he says, still go to church and chapel, instead of Studying Evolution and Differentiation, or praying to the Unknowable at home. At Eaton and Harrow boys are taught to make Latin verses, and not the genesis of species. The House of Commons will not let Mr. Bradlaugh take his seat; and many still admire Lord Beaconsfield. Many people were sorry when young Bonaparte was killed by the Zulus; and they gave a dinner to Hobart Pasha. At a dinner in France, the "army" was given as a toast. And German students will fight duels. And for these reasons Mr. Herbert Spencer has a great contempt for his species. Risum teneatis, amici? I must treat this as a mere outburst of ill-humor. We all know that there is folly, vice, and misery enough in the world—and for that reason all absolute "worship" of anyone or anything is out of the question. Strangely enough, Mr. Spencer, who finds this folly and vice preclude him from any respect for Humanity, does not see that it ought also to bar any "veneration and gratitude" to the Unknowable; to which he ascribes the honor of producing civilized society, in spite of all its shortcomings. For my part I am not to be shaken in my belief that the sum of civilized society is relatively worthy of honor, by such melancholy facts as that Mr. Bradlaugh cannot get his seat, and that German students slit each others' noses.

Mr. Spencer raises a great difficulty over the fact that there are and hav been very evil people in the world, who cannot be included in the Humanity which we are to honor.* And he asks why they are excluded from the notion. No one has worked out the organic unity and life of the Human Organism more clearly than Mr. Spencer himself. When we think and speak of that organism, we think and speak of those organs and elements which share in its organic life, and not of the excrescences, maladies, or excrement, so to speak, which has finally eliminated. Men hav a warm regard for their family, though there may be a blackguard in it, for whom they hav no regard at all. They feel loyalty to their profession or their party, though they know that it counts not a few black sheep. And patriotism is quite possible towards our countrymen past and present, though some of the worst men in history hav been amongst them. We are justly proud of our English race; but when we speak if its achievements we are not including in our honor King John, Guy Fawkes, and Titus Oates. If the existence of a minority of evil men makes it impossible to think of Humanity as a whole, or to honor it as a whole, the same argument would make it impossible to think of country as a whole, or to honor it as a whole. And this applies also to what Mr. Spencer calls "civilized society."

The analogies of Humanity are to be found with such minor aggregates of civilized society as Family, Church, State, Country. It has no analogy at all with God or divinity in any form. When Mr. Spencer says that we "defy" Humanity, it would be as just to say that he deifies Evolution. He thinks that Evolution is the key of our mental and moral Synthesis I think that Humanity is. But as I do not suppose that he finds "any claims to godhood" in Evolution, I beg him not to suppose that I find any in Humanity. If Family, Church, State, Country, are real aggregates worthy of gratitude and respect, à fortiori, Humanity is a real aggregate worthy of respect and gratitude. I cannot understand how the smaller aggregates can inspire us with any worthy sentiment at all, whilst the fuller aggregate of the Family of Mankind inspires nothing but contempt and aversion.

A few words on the original idea put forth by Sir James Stephen. "Suppose that it turns out," he says, "there is no possible object of Religion left to man, cannot he do very well without Religion altogether?" It is a view that is often secretly cherished by the comfortable, the strong, and the selfish; but I am not aware that it has ever been calmly argued before as a contribution to the philosophy of religion. If his meaning be that we can do without adoration of any superhuman power, without believing anything to be above human science, or out of the range of human life, of course I wholly agree with him. And if he thinks that mankind will get on very well by means of human education, human morality, and the sense of practical duty to our fellow-beings, then he is something of an unconscious Positivist himself, and no one will ask him to go on his knees to an abstract notion, or to go through any imitation of Christian or other theological practices which he may regard as mummery. For my part, I neither desire nor expect that Christian charity or Christian morality of any kind will be preserved. It will be enlarged and solidified into human charity and human morality. And adopting all that Sir James has said thereon, I claim him as speaking on my side, as he certainly repudiates Mr. Spencer.

But this human charity and human morality will never be established if the peculiar cynicism which Sir James affects about the human race were ever to prevail. He says most truly that "love, friendship, good-nature, kindness, carried to the hight of sincere and devoted affection, will always be the chief pleasure of life, whether Christianity be true or false." Comte himself never put it higher, and I am thinking of quoting this sentence as the text of my next discourse at Newton Hall. But this will not be so. Love, friendship, kindness, and devoted affection will not always be the chief pleasures of life if philosophers succeed in persuading the world that the human race are a set of Yahoos. Sir James also sees that, apart from any theology whatever, the social nature of man will itself produce "a solid, vigorous, useful kind of moral standard;" and he goes on to show that this morality will hav a poetic side; will affect the imagination and the heart by becoming idealized, and issuing in enthusiasm as well as conviction. O upright Judge! O most learned Judge!

I ask no more than this. The Religion of Humanity means to me this solid, vigorous, useful moral standard, based on the belief that sincere and devoted affection is the chief pleasure of life, cultivated and idealized till it produces enthusiasm. Only I insist that it will need the whole force of education through life, all the resources which engender habits, stir the imagination, and kindle self-devotion in order to keep this spirit alive in the masses of mankind. The cultivated, the thoughtful, and the well-to-do can nourish this solid morality in a cool, self-contained, sub-cynical way. But to soften and purify the masses of mankind, we shall need all the passion and faith which are truly dignified by the name of religion—religious respect, religious sense of duty, religious belief in something vastly nobler and stronger than self. They will find this in the mighty tale of human civilization. They will never find it in the philosopher's hypothesis of an Infinit Unknowable substratum, which "cannot be presented in terms of human consciousness," of which we can know nothing and can conceive nothing. Nor do I think they will ever find it in the common-sense maxim that "this is a very comfortable world for the prudent, the lucky, and the strong."—Nineteenth Century.

* He cannot reconcile Comte's definition of Humanity "as the whole of human beings, past, present, and future," with the statement that "the word whole points out that you must not take in all men." If Mr. Spencer would take some pains to understand Comte, he would see that the French word is "ensemble;" that is to say, Humanity includes the sum of human civilization, but does not include every individual man, who may not hav contributed at all to this ensemble or "sum."

Soreness.

From the Missouri Liberal.

There seems to exist an unpleasant ill will among some of our Liberal papers toward each other and every existing movement that they are not father of. Sometimes whole pages are devoted to severely and, it seems, unnecessarily criticising opinions of others and their movements in and out of Liberal work. Potent movements are made up of great numbers moving to secure a general benefit, which in its turn benefits the individual as a result of united effort. For this reason a general harmony is necessary to do effectiv work in Liberalism, and if it is lost in leaders using its organs to thrash each other on what seem to be personal policies or opinions in regard to the work or positions in it that they did or did not receive, and thus to a greater or less degree prejudicing the friends of one against those of the other, we will be losing our only object by the very men who should lead us to victory. Liberals hav no right to allow their personal feelings to interfere in any way with the interest of the cause generally, for it belongs to others, and destroying it is the same as anything else that is not one's own.
